[1] The ruffianly leader of the banditti who seized Samuel Seabury and destroyed or carried away the property of James Rivington, had had a public controversy with the latter, and had been most ignominiously defeated, (deLancey's Notes on Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 561–566.) The text of the Memorial of Samuel Seabury, in this place, indicated that the same disreputable habitué of Jasper Drake's Beekman's Slip unlicensed alehouse had also had a political tilt with the Rector of St. Peter's Church, in Westchester, with a similar result. The reader may gather from those facts, without resorting to that general fact of the disappointment of Sears, in his scramble for "a high office in the American Navy," of which Bancroft has made mention, just what was the reason that that ruffian was so zealous, in his pursuit of the two who had so signally defeated him.

[3] We are not insensible of the fact that Hinman, in his Historical Collections of the part sustained by Connecticut during the War of the Revolution, (page 548,) stated that Samuel Seabury "brought his petition on the "20th day of December, 1776,* to the General Assembly of Connecticut, "then sitting at New Haven;" and, further, (page 551,) that "the peti-"tion, in the Assembly, was referred to a Joint Committee of the two "Houses, with William Samuel Johnson, Esq., as Chairman, who re-"ported that a letter had been received from the President of the New "York Congress, on the subject; and that to answer said letter, a pub-"lic hearing should be had before both Houses of said Assembly." We are not insensible, also, that Mr. Seabury addressed his Memorial "To "the Honorable the General Assembly * * * now sitting in New "Haven, in said Colony, by special Order of his Honor, the Governor," (vide page 312, ante.) But the Journal of that Special Session, called by the Governor, and sitting at New Haven, shows "the General Assembly "was adjourned by Proclamation, on the 14th day of December, 1775;" and that there was no other Session of the Assembly, from the latter quently stated, "the gang who took" [him] "prisoner thought proper to withdraw their guard and "let" [him] "return" to his desolated home.[1]

It was not pretended that either the Executive, or the Legislative, or the Judicial authorities of the Colony of Connecticut, none of whom had been disturbed by the revolutionary element within that Colony and all of whom were enabled to discharge all their legitimate functions, had made the slightest movement for the relief or for the release of the captive, who, during the preceding nearly five weeks, had been held in captivity, with the entire knowledge and acquiescence and in the presence of each of those several departments of the Colonial Government, in one of the Capital-Towns of the Colony. It was not pretended that any one of the seventeen banditti, residents of the Town of New Haven and known to all in authority, had been called to account, by any one in authority, for their flagrant violation of the Law of the land. On the contrary, it is evident that his captors had become tired, since they found that an able and courageous prisoner, such as Samuel Seabury was, was not likely to be useful to either the general cause of the Rebellion or to those who held him; and, therefore, without any official action which has been recorded, either by the official pens or by the traditional stylus of history—just as similar political prisoners, within the memory of living men, have been informally and unceremoniously ejected from places in which they had been lawlessly confined by warrant of no other mittimus than the naked ipse dixit of reckless and law-defying political demagogues possessing a revolutionary power to issue such orders—the guards which had barred the outlet from his improvised prison were removed; the doors were opened; and he was permitted to depart, without hindrance, and to return, without molestation, to his home and family.

He reached Westchester, on his return, on the second of January, 1776;[2] but his private affairs were very much disturbed;[3] his School, on which he largely depended for the payment of his debts and for the more comfortable support of his family, was broken up;[4] his present means were very limited—the expense of his month's confinement, in the hands of the banditti, had amounted to the very large sum of ten pounds sterling[5]—his papers were so much scattered that he was unable to discharge his official duties with propriety and accuracy;[6] he and his family were subjected to constant annoyances and insults;[7] his house was occupied, soon after, by a Company of Cavalry, who consumed or destroyed all the products of his Glebe, on which, to a considerable extent, his family was made dependent;[8] he was thus made entirely dependent for support on his small stipend as a Missionary of the Venerable Society; and, finally, like his friend and neighbor, Isaac Wilkins, he was compelled to seek shelter and safety in flight[9]—when a favorable opportunity was afforded, he gathered such of his effects as could be conveniently carried, and, with his wife and six children, he fled, first across the Sound, to Long Island and, subsequently, to the City of New York.[10]

Need there be any surprise that, after such an experience of what, in practice, were "the Liberties of "America," Samuel Seabury's political opinions underwent a radical change—that he ceased to be of the party of the Opposition to the Ministry then in place; and that he became, decidedly and firmly, "a friend "of the Government," in other words, an unqualified and distinctive Tory?[11]

On the fourth of December, 1775, also during the period between the dissolution of the first and the organization of the second of the series of the Provincial Congresses, the Governor of the Colony, William Tryon, from his shelter, on board the ship Dutchess of Gordon, lying in the harbor of the City of New York, evidently and reasonably encouraged by the backwardness of the Deputies to the Provincial Congress; by the known inclination to peace, of a large majority, if not of nearly all, the Colonists; and by the countenance and expected support of sundry of the leaders of the Rebellion, addressed a letter to the Mayor of that City, Whitehead Hicks,[12]

In September, 1776, after reciting the disaffection of Rev. Samuel Seabury, the Committee of Safety, five of the Westchester-county members being present, directed Colonel Joseph Drake, forthwith, to remove him from his home to the house of Colonel John Brinckerhoff, at Fishkill, to remain there till the further order of the Convention or the Committee of Safety; and that he be not permitted to leave the farm of the said Colonel Brinckerhoff, except in company with the Colonel. At the same time Colonel Van Cortlandt, John Jay, and Robert Harper were directed to ascertain what property Mr. Seabury had which might be seized and sold for the payment for his board and lodging, in his involuntary exile, (Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., "A.M., September 11, 1776.")

[12] Governor Tryon to the Mayor of the City of New York, "SHIP DUTCH- "ESS OF GORDON, NEW YORK HARBOUR, 4th Dec. 1775."

This letter appeared, in print, in Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1261, NEW-YORK, Monday, December 11, 1775.

enclosed in which was another letter addressed "To "THE INHABITANTS OF THE COLONY OF NEW YORK."[1] expressive of his hope that some measure might be adopted as the basis of an accommodation between the Mother Country and the Colony. It was written in a spirit of kindness and regard for the welfare of the country, probably as a feeler, and certainly after consultation with some of the leaders of the Rebellion; and it was well-calculated to lead the revolutionary portions of the Colonists back to their duty and to peace, in which it appears to have been quite effective—"several of the Delegates" [in the Provincial Congress] "were favorably disposed," we are told; and there can be little doubt that by far the greater number of the Colonists, also, could their well-considered and honest preferences have been safely expressed, would have heartily concurred in the proposition.

It was not, then, generally known, but the revelations made by the publication of the records of that period have recently shown, that that letter was introductory to a movement toward a peaceful solution of the political troubles of the Colonies, which, if the letter should be well-received, the very able family of Smith, who had been among the originators and most earnest promoters of the Rebellion, and whose duplicity and hypocrisy are well known, was preparing to direct and lead. Thomas Smith, one of the brothers, was a member of the Provincial Congress, and, of course, in all the councils of the party of the Rebellion, enjoying the confidence of those who were concerned in them. Joshua Hett Smith, another of the brothers, whose unholy associations with General Benedict Arnold and Major John André, at a later period, are well known, was not, then, in any Committee or Congress; but, nevertheless, he was, at that time, one of the leaders of the Rebellion, out-doors, and was admitted to the inner councils of those who were its leaders. William Smith, the elder of the historical family of that period and allied to the Livingstons, by marriage, was the most influential of all those who were, at that time, engaged in the political affairs of the Colony. He had been associated with William Livingston and John Morin Scott, in the historically famous "triumvirate." He had professed to approve the usurpations of legislative authority and other questionable doings of the Continental Congress of 1774; and he is known to have been an outside adviser of the factious minority of the General Assembly, with whom and with whose inconsistency of action the reader is already acquainted. He was the life-long and confidential friend and the frequent host of General Philip Schuyler; and the correspondent, friend, and political adviser of George Clinton. He gave up his house, for the occupation of General Washington, when the latter occupied the City; and, with much ostentation, he appeared to be largely in sympathy with those, in New York and elsewhere, who were in the Rebellion. But, notwithstanding all these, William Smith adroitly avoided the placing of his name to the General Association of the Congress of 1774, that act which was made the political shibboleth, after the catchwords of "Rights" and "Liberty" had accomplished their purposes and a new issue, that of an implicit obedience to the powers which were, had been made by those who were leaders in the Rebellion. He was, also, at the same time that he was thus masquerading as a confidantè and an adviser of those who were leading the Rebellion and as a sympathiser with and promoter of the Rebellion itself, a Member of the Colonial Council of the King; an intimate friend and confidential adviser of the Governor of the Colony, William Tryon—whose leanings toward the pretensions of the Livingston family were as distinctly seen as were those of the venerable Lieutenant-governor, Cadwallader Colden, toward the pretensions of the more influential De Lancey family—and a secret schemer, aiming to promote the interest of his own family by disarming the Rebellion of its strength[2] and, thereby, effecting a reconciliation with the Home Government.

As far back as the eighth of June or eighth of July, a Report had been made by a Committee which had been previously appointed to consider the subject, provid-

[1] The following is a copy of that letter, taken from the New-York Colonial Manuscripts, ci., 123, in the Office of the Secretary of State, at Albany:

"TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE COLONY OF NEW YORK:

"I take this public Manner to signify to the Inhabitants of this Prov- "ince, that his Majesty has been graciously pleased to grant me his "Royal Permission to withdraw from the Government; and at the same "Time to assure them of my Readiness to perform ever Service in my "Power, to promote the common Felicity. If I am excluded from "every Hope of being any Ways instrumental towards the Re-establish- "ment of that Harmony, at present interrupted between Great Britain "and her Colonies, I expect soon to be obliged to avail myself of his "Majesty's Indulgence.

"It has given me great Pain to view the Colony committed to my "care, in such a turbulent State as not to have afforded me since my "Arrival, any Prospect of being able to take the dispassionate and "deliberate Sense of its Inhabitants, in a constitutional Manner, upon "the Resolution of Parliament for composing the present Ferments in "the Provinces; A Resolution that was intended for the Basis of an "Accommodation; and if candidly considered in a Way in which it will "be most probably successful, and treated with that Delicacy and "Decency requisite to the Cultivation of a sincere Reconciliation and "Friendship, might yet be improved for the Purpose of restoring the "general Tranquility and Security of the Empire.

"I owe it to my Affection to this Colony, to declare my wish, that "some Measure may be speedily adopted for this purpose; as I feel an "extreme Degree of Anxiety, in being Witness to the growing Calamities "of this Country, without the Power to alleviate them: Calamities "that must increase, while so many of the Inhabitants withhold their "Allegiance from their Sovereign, and their Obedience to the Parent "Country; by whose Power and Patronage they have hitherto been sus- "tained and protected.

"WILLIAM TRYON.

"SHIP DUTCHESS OF GORDON,
"HARBOUR OF NEW YORK, 4th Dec. 1775."

[2] The strength of the Rebellion was in the union of all the disaffected Colonies; and, had he succeeded in withdrawing New York from the existing confederation, which he and all the Smiths endeavored to do, that strength would have been impaired, and, possibly, the confederation of the Colonies effectually broken.

ing "for the dissolution of this Congress and election "of a new Provincial Congress for this Colony;"[1] but, very probably, nothing was really done and determined on, concerning the subjects referred to. There was some action, in the Provincial Congress, on collateral subjects; but it was not until a much later period that that body was dissolved—on the fourth of November, either because of the absence of a quorum or for some other reason, no record of a formal adjournment having been made, the Provincial Congress ceased to exist; and the works which it had done as well as its own existence, became matters of history. Sooner or later, History will assign each to the place to which it is justly entitled.

It has been stated[2] that, as the out-come of the various labors of that body, on that subject, an Ordinance had been adopted by the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-seventh of October, providing for the Election of new Delegations to a new Provincial Congress, on the seventh of November, and for the assembling of that new Provincial Congress, on the fourteenth of that month; but there is no record of any such action, on the official Journal of that body; and no copy of that Ordinance has been found, notwithstanding the most diligent search and inquiry have been made. Whatever may have been the form and character of the document, it is evident, however, that such an Ordinance was really adopted and promulgated, and that, agreeably to its provisions, on the seventh of November, a meeting was held at the White Plains, for the election of Delegates from the County of Westchester, to the coming Congress.[3] It is not stated in what manner nor by whom the election was made; but it is stated that Colonel Lewis Graham, Stephen Ward, Esq., Colonel Joseph Drake, Robert Graham, Esq., John Thomas, Junior, Esq., William Paulding, Major Ebenezer Lockwood, Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt, and Colonel Gilbert Drake[4] were elected; and that any three of these should have authority to represent Westchester-county in the coming Provincial Congress—Gouverneur Morris, James Van Cortlandt, Philip Van Cortlandt, James Holmes, and David Dayton, all of whom had been members of the preceding Congress having been dropped, and Major Ebenezer Lockwood and Colonels Pierre Van Cortlandt and Gilbert Drake sent in their stead.

The day appointed for the organization of the new Provincial Congress was the fourteenth of November; but, on that day, there was not even a respectable minority of the Delegates present, which may well be considered as indicative of the coolness with which the Rebellion was regarded by the great body of the Colonists, in New York, even at that early period; and of how little warrant there had been, in fact, for the outrages which had been committed by the preceding Congress and by its Committees, in their name.

Day by day, the handful of punctual Delegates met and adjourned. They amused themselves by dictating letters to the Committees of the faltering Counties, urging the attendance of their several Delegations, "in order that the business of the great cause "we are engaged in may be no longer delayed or "neglected."[5] Threats were made, in some instances, that "the Continental Congress" might "find "it necessary, for the public service and for the want of "a Congress, to put the Colony under a Military "Government, directed by a Major-General and an "Army, and that at the sole expense of this Colony," adding that "many Gentlemen present are apprehen-"sive" that such "would be the consequence if a Con-"gress [were] not speedily formed, so as to proceed to "business," etc.[6] On the first of December, the Committee of Orange-county was asked—the second request of the kind—"that you will not delay sending down your "members by next Monday morning, that the public "business may no longer suffer for the want of a repre-"sentation of your County; for such is the perilous "state of America, and this Colony in particular, that

[1] In the Journal of the Provincial Congress, of the sixteenth of October, it is said the Report was made "on the eighth of July last;" in the Journal of that body, of the eighteenth of October, it is said the Report was made "on the eighth of June last;" and in a memorandum appended to the Journal of that body, of the nineteenth of October, stating that the Report was "wanted," it is said, also, that it was "of the 8th "June last." In the Journal of the Provincial Congress, of neither of those days, however, does there appear the slightest mention of any such Report or of the subject of it.

[2] Minutes of Proceedings during the recess of the Provincial Congress, by their Adjournment on the fourth of November, 1775.

[3] The following document, copied from the original manuscript, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Credentials of Delegates, xxiv., 24, 67,) illustrates this subject:

"To the Honorable the Provincial Congress of the Colony of "New York.

"We the Committee for the County of Westchester do humbly certify "that at the Election of delegates to represent the said County in the "Next Provincial Congress to be held at New York the 14th instant, "which was this day held at the Court House of the said County, Colonel "Lewis Graham, Stephen Ward, Esq., Col. Joseph Drake, Robert Graham, "Esq., John Thomas, Junr Esq., Mr. William Pawling, Major Ebenezer "Lockwood, Col. Pierre Van Cortlandt, and Col. Gilbert Drake, were duly "elected agreeable to the resolves of the Provincial Congress, to repre-"sent this county until the Second Tuesday of May next; and that it "was voted by the people that any three of the said Deputies shall act "for this county. Dated the 7th day of November, 1775.

"By order of the Committee,

"Gilbert H. Drake, Chairman.

"A true copy from the minutes taken by

"Micah Townsend, Clerk of the Committee."

[4] It will be seen that eight of the nine Delegates thus elected carried titles with their names—the terms "Esq." and "Mr." at that time, having recognized places in the order of rank—and that only one of the nine, William Paulding, was low enough, in the social rank, to be a plain, untitled man.

[5] These words, taken from the letter sent to the Delegates-elect of Kings-county, on the twenty-second of November, represent the substance of those sent to the Committee of Orange-county, on the following day: to the Delegates from Richmond-county in the preceding Congress, on the twenty-fourth of November; and to the Delegates-elect and to the Committees in the several Counties of Tryon, Charlotte, Cumberland, Orange, Kings, and Duchess on the first of December. (Minutes of the Proceedings during the Recess of the Provincial Congress, by their Adjournment on the fourth of November, 1775.)

[6] These were sent, on the first of December, to the Committees of Tryon, Charlotte, and Cumberland-counties, respectively.

"a Convention of the Deputies is absolutely necessary, "with the utmost despatch." To these pressing words, the following threat was appended: "But if, after "such repeated applications to your County, to be in "Congress, by their Deputies, if you continue to ne- "glect a measure so necessary for your reputation and "safety, you must not complain if the Congress de- "termine upon matters relative to your County, in "common with others, although yours should, by "your inattention, be unrepresented."[1] Richmond-county was not inclined to send a Delegation;[2] and was, first, coaxed to elect a Delegation, and, finally, threatened.[3] How much more, which was not recorded, that handful of the leaders of the Rebellion, in Colonial New York, said and did, for the intimidation of those who were less zealous, in that cause, is not now known; but the careful reader will not fail to inquire, without obtaining an answer, why the Home Government failed, during that long interval of hesitation and of doubt among the greater number of the Colonists, to strengthen the Colonial Government in the maintenance of order and obedience to the Laws; why those who were not inclined to rebellion were not protected in the quiet possession of their properties and in the peaceful pursuit of their respective vocations; and why the price which would have obtained the marketable leaders of the Rebellion, for the use of the Home Government, was not paid, as the smaller and more effective investment,[4] or, if the heroic treatment of the troubles was preferred, why those leaders were not arrested and punished, as other and less distinguished violators of the peace were wont to be punished, in America and elsewhere.

On the first of December, competent Delegations appeared from the five Counties of New York, Albany, Westchester, Ulster, and Suffolk, with insufficient Delegations from Kings and Duchess, and no portions of such Delegations from Richmond, Queens, Orange, Tryon, Cumberland, Gloucester, and Charlotte-counties; and, consistently with usage and the Rules of the preceding Congress, "the Representa- "tives of a majority of the Counties not being pres- "ent," those who were present "could not proceed to "business, as a Congress."[5] On the sixth of that month, competent Delegations appeared from the five Counties of New York, Albany, Westchester, Duchess, and Suffolk, with insufficient Delegations from Kings, Ulster, and Orange-counties, and no portions, of such Delegations from the Counties of Richmond, Queens, Tryon, Cumberland, Gloucester, or Charlotte; at which time, directly in violation of the rulings, on the first of that month, they declared that "the "Deputies from a majority of the Counties appeared," —a falsehood, which, to have established its true character, needed only a reference to the Credentials which were filed, as their several authorizations, by the respective Delegations,—organized a Congress, and proceeded to the discharge of those duties to which they had respectively assigned themselves.[6] There were five Delegations present, on the first of December, when it was declared that "the Represen- "tatives of a majority of the Counties not being pres- "ent," those who were present "could not proceed to "business, as a Congress:" five days afterwards, when no more than five such Delegations appeared, with an elasticity of conscience and of action which was worthy of those who were present, what had been declared, under similar circumstances, at their former meeting, was entirely disregarded; and what, at that former meeting, was said to have been insufficient to have allowed the five Delegations who were then present, "to proceed to business, as a Congress," was declared, in this later meeting, to be sufficient to permit five Delegations—four of the five having been of the former five—to do what the former five "could not" do: with the authorized Delegations of

[3] "The evil consequences that will attend the not having a Provincial "Congress to determine on the measures necessary to be adopted and "carried into execution, at this unhappy crisis, are more easily con- "ceived than expressed; and rest assured, Gentlemen, that the neigh "bouring Colonies will not remain inactive spectators, if you show a "disposition to depart from the Continental Union. Confusion and dis- "order, with numberless other evils, you must suppose, will attend the "want of a Congress for the government of this Colony, until a recon- "ciliation with the Mother Country can be obtained," (Letter to the Committee of Richmond-county, "NEW-YORK, 2d Dec. 1775.")

[4] It is very well known that the Morrises were zealous loyalists, in Europe as well as in America, until the family lost its hold on the Colonial Government, by the removal of the elder Lewis, from the office of Chief Justice of the Colony. The appointment of Thomas Hutchinson to the Bench, to which James Otis, the elder, aspired, transferred the weight and influence of the Otis family from the side of the Government to the leadership of the Opposition, in Massachusetts. Israel Putnam was too highly appraised for the Royal shambles, and so remained in the market, until, on the demand of the Livingstons, he was placed where he could do no further harm. The greater success of Benjamin Pratt, of Boston, and, subsequently, that of Daniel Horsmanden, in the race for the place of Chief Justice of the Colony of New York, when James De Lancey died, added fresh bitterness to the Morrises, in the disappointment of Robert Hunter Morris; and the disappointment of William Smith, on the same occasion, threw the Smiths into the front rank of the malcontents, in New York. Egbert Dumond, of Ulster-county, is said to have become informer of Congre-sional secrets to Governor Tryon, provisionally, with a hankering after the Shrievalty of Ulster-county, as James Duane had communicated the secrets of the Congress of 1774, to Lieutenant-governor Colden, undoubtedly for an equivalent, present or prospective. Who supposes that Captain Gilbert Livingston, of Arnold's American Legion, and Robert G. Livingston, Junior, that Philip John Livingston, the Royal Sheriff of Duchess-county, and his brother, John W. Livingston, Captain in Fanning's King's American Regiment, were not the better exponents of the real opinions of that office-seeking family of Livingstons; and who can doubt, with the roster of subsequent office holding Livingstons before him, that much of additional influence, in favor of the Home Government, might have been secured from that family and its adherents, had that Government been as g-nerous in the disposition of offices to members of that peculiarly office-seeking family, as the revolutionary authorities and the subsequent State Government, in New York, unquestionably were?

only five of the fourteen Counties then present, the Journal of the Provincial Congress bearing testimony to that fact, it will be seen and understood that the record which stated that "the Deputies from a ma-"jority of the Counties appeared," is a false record; that there was, really, no quorum present, even under the rule and usage of that revolutionary body; and that, tested by that rule and that usage, even from the convenient standpoint of rebellion, the Congress was not properly constituted and was without due revolutionary authority—of course, it possessed no other authority, in the slightest degree.[1]

What was thus called a Provincial Congress, elected Colonel Nathaniel Woodhull, of the County of Suffolk, to be its President; and John McKesson and Robert Benson, the Secretaries of the former Provincial Congress, were elected Secretaries of that.[2] It assembled, day by day, until the twenty-second of December, when it took a recess, leaving a Committee of Safety to discharge some of the duties which it had undertaken to perform.[3] That Committee, of which Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt, of Westchester-county, was the Chairman, continued in session, until the twelfth of February, 1776, when the Provincial Congress was again assembled;[4] and that Congress continued in session, until the sixteenth of March, in that year, when it took another recess, leaving, as before, a Committee of Safety, to discharge some portions of its self-imposed duties, during its absence.[5] That Committee, of which Joseph Hallett, of the City of New York, was the Chairman, continued in session, until the 8th of May, 1776, when the Provincial Congress was again assembled—it is written that "several matters of the utmost importance, "as well to the United Colonies, in general, as to this "Colony, in particular, rendering it necessary for a "speedy meeting of the Provincial Congress of this "Colony, the Committee of Safety, therefore, or-"dered Circular Letters to be sent to all the mem-"bers, requesting their attendance, in Provincial "Congress, at New York, on the first day of this inst. "May. On that day, and every day, since, many "members attended, but not a sufficient number to "make a Congress,[6] until this afternoon" [May 8, 1776,][7] when a quorum was found to be present, and the business was resumed and continued until the afternoon of the thirteenth of that month, when the Congress was dissolved.[8]

During that short period of about six months, the progress of events, in America, was peculiarly remarkable.

* * * * * * * *

The entire Colony, as far as Commerce, Trade, and the Mechanic Arts were concerned, was plunged into the greatest distress:[9] the seamen were idle, in the Ports, because there was an interdiction of Commerce with foreign Ports; and commercial Non-intercourse prevailed:[10] the Mechanics and Working-men in the Cities—some of whom had been the ever-ready and noisy tools of the demagogues of faction, in the earlier days of the disturbances—were suffering, unemployed:[11] to add to

[1] John Leffertse appeared in the Congress, nominally from Kings-county; but he did not pretend to offer a Credential, nor any other, even the slightest, evidence that he had been appointed, by any one, to appear as a representative from Kings-county or in any other capacity, in the Provincial Congress or elsewhere.

Peter Clowes was said to have represented "Goshen Precinct in Orange-"county;" but the Credentials which were filed from Orange-county declared that two Delegates should be required to represent that County; and that only when one such Delegate should appear in the Congress from "the North side of the Mountains" [the Highlands] and one from the "South side" of those Highlands—Orange-county, at that time, including what, now, is Rockland-county - should that Delegation be complete and authorized to represent the County. As there was only one, instead of two, Delegates; and because those Towns which were below the Highlands were entirely without a representative, there was no Delegation from Orange-county, in the Congress.

Thomas Palmer and Moses Cantine were the only Delegates, out of the seven who had been elected, and who were present, to represent Ulster-county; but those who had elected them and given to them all the authority which it was said they possessed, had declared that three of those seven should be required to constitute a duly authorized Delegation from that County. The two, therefore, left Ulster-county without a competent Delegation.

[6] That old story of the dilatoriness of the country members, even in the face of the most pressing necessities and of the most urgent calls, certainly confirm the reports that the great body of the Colonists, especially that of the country-people was lukewarm and indifferent, if they were not positively unfriendly, to the Rebellion. If the leaders among the disaffected, and surely no others were sent to the Provincial Congress, were as tardy, in their attendance, even when the most urgent appeals for their attendance were sent, as these were, in the preceding December and in May, 1776, how much more indifferent must those have been, who had other and legitimate demands on their time and attention, and by whom an office was neither looked for nor desired.

There is no record of a formal adjournment; and it looks very much as if the end of this Congress was like its beginning, without a quorum.

[10] The action of the Continental Congress of 1774, concerning the Commerce of the Colonies, may be seen in the Association which it "recom-"mended."

"We beg leave to hint, that in the present declension of Trade, the "seamen of this Port ought to be employed upon this article of service" [batteaux-men, for the Northern Army,] "as well as that of building "batteaux," (Committee of Safety to General Schuyler, "In Committee of "Safety, New-York, 17th Jany., 1776.")

[11] "We would beg leave to mention it as necessary to employ as many "of the Carpenters of this City, as possible" [in the construction of batteaux, for the Northern Army] "to prevent them and their families "from starving by means of the stagnation of business, which is more "severely felt in this City than in any other part of the Province," (The Committee of Safety to General Schuyler, "In Committee of "Safety, New-York, 17th Jany., 1776.")

"I can easily conceive that it is very difficult, at New-York, for arti-"ficers to procure a subsistence for their families—the like difficulty "prevails here," (General Schuyler to the Committee of Safety, "Albany "January 25, 1776.") their troubles, the troops from Connecticut, who had been unnecessarily brought to the City of New York —"the movement seemed to have for its end to coerce "rather than to defend New York[1]"—who were unemployed, endeavored to make additions to their military pay, by underbidding the local mechanics, for work to be done, in that City:[2] and the Provincial Congress was compelled to seek employment, for both classes, elsewhere;[3] to establish manufactories for the employment of them;[4] and to supply provisions and firewood, to prevent their families from starving or perishing from the cold.[5] As many as could do so, said to be one-half of the population, abandoned the City of New York, with their families, to find safety and employment and charity, elsewhere;[6] and many, driven by necessity[7] and the neglect of the Government to protect them,[8] as well as for the promised pay in what was circulated as money,[9] were led to enlist in the short-term levies which then constituted the Continental Army, carrying into that service no greater sympathy for the Rebellion than they had previously possessed, and discharging the duties which were thus imposed on them, with perfect unconcern and with no greater animus than was produced by the expectation of receiving the stipulated payment for the services which were promised. Indeed, the extent and character of the sympathy with the Rebellion, as a matter of principle, which prevailed among the Colonists, generally, may be seen, very clearly defined, in their hesitation to take the field in support of it, even where no enemy was and where none was expected,[10] and in their precision of movements, homeward, when the terms of service of those who had been induced to enlist had expired. There appears to have been a foundation in fact for what Governor Tryon wrote to the Home Government, that "was it not from the awe of the inhabit-"ants of the neighboring Colonies and the controul-"ing influence of the Continental Congress I am per-"suaded there would be an immediate End, in this "province, to all Committees and Congresses."[11]

As the period of time which is now under review [November 4, 1775, until May 14, 1776,] included the later Autumn, the Winter, and the Spring, the farmers of Westchester-county, as far as they were permitted to do so, undoubtedly pursued their usual vocations, with their usual diligence and quietness—they certainly harvested their various agricultural productions, and marketed the surplus of their crops,[12]

[2] "The Regiment here, from Connecticut, can turn out many Carpen-"ters, who consent to work upon much more reasonable terms than the "artificers of this City. It would, I imagine, be worth while to pro-"vide, if possible, a sufficient number of tools: when the present work "is done, these tools cannot be considered an idle purchase: they will "always be useful," (General Charles Lee to the Provincial Congress, "NEW-YORK, February 22, 1776.")

Already provided with quarters, rations, and pay, as soldiers, and without tools, these men could well afford to underbid the local Mechanics, whose houserents, food, and other expences, including their expensive tools, must be provided for, by themselves. But how dreary the times must have been, even in Connecticut, when her Artisans, were compelled to go into the Army, in order to gain their needed shelter and their daily bread.

The great quantities of Wheat, Flour, fresh and salted Beef and Pork, Hams, smoked Beef, Tallow, Lard, Poultry, and other products of the farms in Westchester-county, which, notwithstanding the disturbances which the farmers sustained, were marketed, exclusively of the supplies sent on the multitude of Market-sloops to the City of New York, during sometimes in the neighboring City; sometimes for the uses of distant communities, who sent there, for supplies; sometimes for the uses of the Armies, in the field; and, whenever an opportunity was afforded, to the men-of-war, in the harbor. The local Committees, sometimes, consequentially assumed to interrupt their traffic;[1] and the Committee of Safety, in order to prevent "sundry persons from Connecticut" from purchasing, for the evident purpose of forestalling the market, "requested the Committee of the County "of Westchester to take effectual means to prevent "the sale and transportation of any barrelled Beef "or Pork out of Westchester-county, to any person or "persons residing out of this Colony, or for the use of "any person or persons residing out of this Colony, "until the further order of the Provincial Congress "or of the Committee of Safety of this Colony;"[2] but, nevertheless, the fertility of the County and the patient industry of the greater number of those who lived therein were known and utilized, throughout the entire seaboard.

The same local terrorism which had prevailed, throughout the County, under the auspices of the former Provincial Congress, was continued, with the sanction of this;[3] numbers of the inhabitants of the County were seized, only on information secretly conveyed by unseen accusers, and cast into prison, without a hearing;[4] and some of them were severely treated, while they were prisoners.[5] They were plundered of their Arms, again and again, sometimes by Connecticut-men called in by the County Committee[6] or by the brutal General Charles Lee,[7] and sometimes by orders from the Provincial Congress or its Committee of Safety;[8] levies were made on her Militia, for the construction of the defensive works in the City of New York;[9] and two Companies of the new Regiments in the New-York Line of the Continental Army were assigned to be raised in Westchester-county.[10] It is also noteworthy, as a portion of the history of that period, that Westchester-county afforded the first evidence of the alteration of a Provincial Bill of Credit—one of the last emission, for five dollars, having been altered so that it appeared to have been one of ten dollars.[11]

The opening of the new year—the exact date does not appear, if it was ever definitely known—witnessed a transaction by which the lower portion of the County of Westchester, especially the Towns of Mamaroneck, Eastchester, Westchester, and Yonkers, was greatly disturbed; and yet it was an occurrence the period now under examination, prove, beyond a question, and apart from every other consideration, how short-sighted the leaders of the Rebellion were, when, through the violence of their lawlessness, they impaired the productiveness of so fruitful a source of supplies, both for the City and for their Armies.

These may serve as specimens of the whole number.

Colonel Waterbury, who accompanied General Lee, through Westchester-county, acknowledged his possession of thirty Guns, two pairs of Holsters, nine Cutlasses, and three Pistols—how many more he had seized, and retained or sent back into Connecticut, are now unknown; and no record was taken of the names of those who had been thus plundered. They must have been taken, however, on the line of march of his Regiment, between the Sawpits and Kingsbridge; and there was not the slightest shadow of even revolutionary authority for the seizure, except the law of the stronger and that of thieves.

which might have been certainly foreseen and easily prevented, had those who were immediately concerned in preventing it possessed the foresight and caution which are usually attributed to intelligent men.

We have already noticed the fact that, at the beginning of the active revolutionary movements which followed the receipt of intelligence that General Gage had unwisely commenced active military operations in the field, many of the Cannon which belonged to private individuals, in the City of New York, were drawn to Kingsbridge;[1] and, subsequently, as the political feeling became more intense, every gun in the City, no matter how useless for any other purpose than for old metal it might have been, was ordered to the same place.[2]

It is not clear what good was expected to be derived from those movements of the guns; but it is very clear that, before the close of the year 1775, between three and four hundred Cannon, of all calibres, grades, and conditions—some of them good and serviceable; others, less valuable and less useful; the greater number, honeycombed and worthless, unless for old iron; and all of them, unmounted and without carriages—were accumulated in three large gatherings, one, of about fifty guns, being at "John Wil-"liams's,"[3] the Williams-bridge of the present day; one, "at or near Kingsbridge;" and the third, or larger, parcel within two hundred and fifty yards of Isaac Valentine's house, the Valentine's-hill of that period, as well as of this.[4] They were entirely unguarded; and it is very evident that they were lying side by side, presenting an apparently formidable array, notwithstanding their actually existing harmlessness.

In view of the seeming importance of that imposing park of artillery and of the entire absence of the slightest care for its safety—in retaliation, also, it may have been, for insults offered and wrongs and injuries inflicted—somebody, early in January, 1776, effectually spiked all the guns and plugged many of them with large stones forced into them, and escaped without having been discovered. The exploit was soon made known, however; and, as may be reasonably supposed, not only Westchester-county, but the Committee of Safety, in the City of New York, the Provincial Congress having taken a recess on the twenty-second of December preceding, was thrown into the greatest excitement.

The local Committee of the County of Westchester, amply endowed, by its own lawless zeal and by the equally lawless grace of the Provincial Congress, with entire authority to arrest anybody and everybody on whom its whims or its animosities might rest, very promptly exercised its ill-founded prerogatives; and a large number of the residents of the three Towns of Westchester, Eastchester, and Mamaroneck, and some of those of Yonkers, was seized, and carried before it, and examined. Many of these were evidently discharged, because nothing was shown to sustain the suspicions or antipathies which had prompted those who had seized them; but there were others, a considerable number, who were filtered out from the great mass of the suspected, because of their seeming or construed connection with the spiking of the guns, and sent down to the City of New York, to be disposed of, by the generally relentless Committee of Safety, agreeably to the dictates of its stern, imperious will. Among those who were thus selected to face the ordeal of that Committee, in which the great professional experience of John Morin Scott was combined with the savage coldness of Alexander McDougal and John Brasher, were John Fowler, Peter Valentine, William Lounsberry, James Lounsberry, Joseph Purdy, William Armstrong, William Sutton, John Flood, Isaac Purdy, John Gedney, John Haines, Joshua Gedney, Josiah Burrell, William Haines, James Haines, Junior, Thomas Haines, Isaac Gedney, Isaac Valentine, William Dicken, Isaac Valentine, Junior, and Cornelius McCartney—the latter a schoolmaster, in Yonkers—and several of these were subjected to great hardships and cruelty, in the confinement to which they were subjected.[5]

On the thirty-first of January, 1776, the Committee of Safety directed Jacamiah Allen to remove those of the guns which were near Kingsbridge, as well as those which were near John Williams's, "to the "larger parcel at Valentine's, so as to have them all "brought together, for the greater convenience of "guarding them and drilling out the spikes;" and, at the same time, the Committee agreed to give Allen twenty shillings apiece for clearing and unspiking the whole of the guns and for removing those at Williams's; but those at Kingsbridge were to be removed at the expense of the Commitee.[6]

But, lest upon the arrival of the British Army, they "should be retaken, he ordered them to be carried up to King's Bridge, "about 14 miles from New York. The persons employed in this service "wanting horses, applied to the General to supply the defect. On the twenty-second of January, one of the Independent Companies of the City of New York,[1] probably "THE BROWN BUFFS," commanded by Captain Jonathan Blake,[2] was ordered into the service of the Colony, for the protection of the guns; but a draft was subsequently made from the Minute-men of the County, to discharge that service,[3] a Captain, a Lieutenant, two Sergeants, a Corporal, fourteen privates, a Guardhouse, and all the surroundings of a permanent outpost having been provided for that easy purpose.[4] It might have been expected that that favored party of White Plains Minute-men would very soon excite feelings of envy among those, surrounding its position, who were not enjoying the feast of fat things which it had secured; and it was so—David Barclay, recommended by Stephen Ward, the latter a Tavern-keeper, near where Tuckahoe is, and a deputy in the Provincial Congress,[5] applied for the job of guarding the guns, offering to do so for thirteen pounds per week, which was less than one half the amount which had been expended on the skeleton Company of Minute-men who had previously discharged that duty;[6] and the offer was promptly accepted.[7] Jacamiah Allen, who was drilling the spikes from the guns, appears, however, to have been unwilling that any others should poach on his manor; and, very promptly, he underbid Barclay, offering to do the same guard-duty which Varian and Barclay had successively done, the former at a cost of more than twenty-six pounds and the latter at thirteen, for only six pounds, ten shillings per week; and, of course, Barclay was superseded and the coveted job was given to the last comer.[8] Very reasonably, Barclay complained to the Congress, and made a counter-offer which was more favorable than the offer on which Allen had been employed; and, of course, the latter was ousted, leaving him in possession[9]—an illustration of what material the new-created controlling power, ("the Ring," if the reader pleases,) in Westchester-county, in 1776, was composed; and in what the "patriotism" of that controlling power consisted.

In the latter part of January, 1776, burning with anxiety to be at the head of a separate command, away from General Washington, and availing himself of the rumor that a heavy military force had been sent from Boston, probably to New York,[10] the infamous Charles Lee, who was, then, second in command of the Continental Army and in the zenith of his evanescent fame, induced the Commander-in-chief[11] to despatch him, from Boston, to the latter City, "with "such volunteers as he" [could] "quickly assemble, "on his march, in order to put the City of New York "in the best posture of defense the season and circum-"stances will admit of."[12]

In the prosecution of the duties to which General Lee had been thus assigned—in his enlistment of men into the service of the Continent; in his appointment of the ruffian, Isaac Sears, to a high military office; in the barbarities inflicted on the inhabitants of Queens-county, by his authorized representative, Sears; in his haughty disregard of the local authorities, legal or revolutionary, in New York; and in his personal and official intercourse with those authorities and with the inhabitants of the City—the Instructions which General Washington had given to him, as well as the superior enactments of the Continental Congress and his own knowledge of the proprieties of intercourse between individuals and of the character of obligations in business relations, were entirely disregarded; and he permitted himself to be controlled, instead, by his own vile and ill-controlled passions and by the promptings of those, as ill-constituted as himself, who were gathered around him and who pandered to his vanity and his malignancy, for the promotion of their own evil purposes. It is not within the purposes of this publication, however, to take more than a passing notice

"I hereby acquaint you that I have taken an account from Capt. "Varian what the expense of guarding the guns at Valentine's and "Williams' will be, this week, vizt.: 1 Capt., 1 Lieut., 2 Sergeants, 1 "Corporal, and 14 Privates. 6 of the above men board at 10s. per "week, and the others draw provisions from the Commissary, with a "Guard room and firewood, at £3. per week, besides items, making in "the whole about £26., and last week it was considerably more." (Stephen Ward to the Provincial Congress, "March 5, 1776.")

It will be remembered that James Varian, the favored commander of the Guard, in this instance, with eighteeen others, had been constituted a full-fledged Company of Westchester-county Minute-men, on the fourteenth of February preceding (vide pages 284, 285, ante;) and it will be seen, from that letter which has been quoted, how soon and in what manner those nineteen Westchester-county "patriots" reached the sweets to which they had aspired—five held offices of greater or less dignity, while the fourteen who held no offices enjoyed the comforts of drawing their support from the Commissary or from the Treasury of the Provincial Congress, in addition to the pay of soldiers and what, by hook or by crook, they could pick up, in the neighborhood of their quarters.

This was only a moderate specimen of what constituted the greater portion of the "patriotism" of the Westchester-county revolutionists, at that period of any of these transactions of that early military power, in Queens-county or in the City of New York; but those outrages which were inflicted by his authority, on the farmers of Westchester-county, while he was marching through the County, on his way to New York, may be noticed, in its pages—in his progress over the well-known Post-road, between the Byram-river and Kingsbridge, the same line of march which had been traversed by Sears and his banditti, a few weeks previously, he appears to have regarded himself as the legitimate possessor of despotic powers, while those among whom he was, were considered as only base creatures who were absolutely subject to his unbridled caprices and to the most extravagant exactions of those who surrounded him. Notwithstanding, within the preceding six or seven weeks, the farmers who lived along or near the line of the Post-road had been visited by Sears and his gang of Connecticut banditti, both on their way to the City of New York and on their return, thence, to Connecticut, by whom, on each occasion, they had been ruthlessly plundered,[1] they were again visited, during that march of Connecticut-men, under General Lee, by that new detachment of New England freebooters, and robbed, to the full extent of the hungry desires of their brutal visitors. Indeed, notwithstanding the recent visitation of his ruffianly countrymen to each of these peaceful families and the reckless depredations of those cowardly banditti, Colonel Waterbury, who commanded the Regiment whom General Lee had mustered into the Continental service—himself, as was subsequently seen and heard, in the City of New York, as fine a specimen of the same class as was needed to perpetuate it[2]—under the direct sanction of the General and with his orders, but without the slightest authority, legal or revolutionary, of either the local or the general Committees or of either of the Congresses, forced his way into every house he reached, ransacked them, and carried away, without even a memorandum of the names of those from whom they were taken, everything which bore the semblance of Arms,[3] leaving his victims, as far as he could possibly do so, entirely without the means of defense, easy prey for whomsoever might next appear, on an errand of similar pillage and outrage.

An amusing instance of the consequential airs assumed by the petty local Town-committees, in Westchester-county, in whom had been vested such extraordinary powers over the persons and properties of those who lived within the several Towns in which those Committees were respectively located, was seen in the action of "the Committee of Observation for "the united Town of Bedford and Precinct of Pound-"ridge and Salem, in Westchester," on the tenth of January, 1776, in which that pompous body, "con-"ceiving that bad consequences do arise to this dis-"tressed country from supplying the markets, at New "York, on supposition that the common enemy may, "by that means, be furnished with Provisions," for the purpose of regulating that grave irregularity, as its narrow and bigoted understanding presented the subject to its official censorship, bravely, "RESOLVED, "That from and after the date hereof, the said Com-"mittee do hereby strictly forbid any of the inhabit-"ants of the said Town and Precincts, directly or, "indirectly, to carry or cause to be carried, by land "or water, provision of any kind to the said markets; "and do hereby direct the Minute-men and all others "that are friends to their country, to do their utmost "to stop all drovers of fat Cattle, Sheep, Hogs, Poul-"try, or any other Provisions whatsoever, and from "being drove or carried through either said Town or "Precincts, for the purpose aforesaid, without leave "of the said Committee," on the penalty of being deemed enemies to their country.[4]

In obedience to that local law, it appears that Jonathan Booth, a drover, while on his way to New York with a drove of Cattle, was detained at Bedford, by the Committee of that Town; but, personally, he evidently pushed forward to the City of New York; and, on the twenty-fifth of January, 1776, he laid the subject before the Committee of Safety, which was then in session, and solicited its more powerful interposition. Very promptly, that body took the subject into consideration; and, without much, if any, discussion, the Committee "came to a "Resolution," which was delivered to the anxious drover, for his comfort and relief—the Committee of Safety was not inclined to concur in the questionable theory of "patriotic" economy which was maintained by its subordinate Committee in Bedford; and, after having recited, in a Preamble, the facts and the Resolution which have been already presented, together with the additional declaration that "this "Committee, not doubting the good intentions of the "said Committee met at Poundridge, do nevertheless "conceive that the said Resolve has a manifest ten-"dency to distress, in the article of Provisions, the "inhabitants of this City and other friends to Liberty "whose business may call them thither," it therefore "RESOLVED, That it is the opinion of this Commit-"tee, that no Committee of any City, Borough, Town, "or Precinct in this Colony ought to prevent any "such supplies of Provisions to this City as aforesaid, "unless they shall have due proof that such supplies "are intended to be furnished to persons engaged in

[2] The associations and conduct of Colonel Waterbury, while he was in the City of New York, to say nothing of his acknowledged thefts in Westchester-county, afford ample evidence of his ruffianly personal character.

"service against the Liberties of America; nor in "such case any longer than until such Committees "respectively shall, in cases where such proof shall "have been made, have duly certified this Committee "or the Provincial Congress thereof, and until order "shall have been made thereon, by this Committee "or the Provincial Congress."[1]

The Committee of Bedford was undoubtedly served with a copy of this enactment by the Committee of Safety; and Jonathan Booth and his drove of fat Cattle were surely permitted to pass through that Town and to New York, without further molestation; but that very zealous Committee did not appear to have become entirely reconciled to the abridgement of its pretensions, made more reasonable by recent action of the Committee of Safety, when, a short time afterwards, it stopped another drove of Cattle, belonging to Joseph Booth, of Newtown, in Connecticut, while, like that which had been previously stopped, by the same Committee, it was on its way to the New York market.

In the latter instance, the obstructed drover returned to Newtown; procured a Certificate from the Committee of that Town, declaring that he "had "lately served his country as a faithful friend and "soldier in the northern Army, under General Schuy-"ler; that he had suffered by the stoppage of his "Cattle, at Bedford, on the way to the New-York "market; that he is the owner of the said Cattle; "and that the said Committee take pleasure in recom-"mending him as a friend of his country;" and, with that Certificate, he proceeded to the City of New York, and presented the case to the Provincial Congress, which was then in session. It is said "the "Congress took the same into consideration, and "came to the following determination, to wit:

"Whereas a large supply of fresh Provisions will "be required for the Continental Army, in and near "the City of New-York:

"RESOLVED AND ORDERED, That no obstruction "whatsoever be given to any person or persons in "passing and re-passing through any of the Counties "in this Colony, with fat Cattle, Sheep, Hogs, or any "kind of Provisions, for the purpose of supplying the "inhabitants of the said City of New-York or the "Continental Army, in and near the said City, unless "such person or persons shall have been adjudged to "be, or held up, as inimical to this country."

In addition to that general action of the Provincial Congress, which controlled or assumed to control every other revolutionary body within the Colony, the Congress also gave to the complaining drover, a copy of the following ORDER: "That the bearer "hereof, Joseph Booth, be permitted to pass, with "his drove of Cattle, to the City of New-York;"[2] and he evidently returned to Bedford, a happier man than when he had left that Town, a few days previously.

In the same connection, it may be proper for us to remind the reader that, about a fortnight before the Committee of Bedford made its second attempt to lay a local embargo on what was intended for the New York market, the Committee of Safety itself had interfered with the disposition of the surplus of the products of the farms in Westchester-county to residents of the neighboring Colony of Connecticut, in which, very probably, Bedford, one of the border-towns of the County, had materially suffered. The facts are thus related in the official records of the Committee of Safety;[3] and the reader may judge therefrom, something concerning the animus of the Committee of Bedford, when, on the second occasion, it interfered with the disposition of the products of Connecticut, within the Colony of New York, while the disposition of the products of farms in Bedford and its vicinity, in Connecticut, was interfered with and stopped, summarily, by a higher authority.

"Col. Gil. Drake informed the Committee that "sundry persons from Connecticut are purchasing "up" [for speculative purposes?] "the barrelled Beef "and Pork in Westchester. Thereupon the Commit-"tee came to the following Resolution, to wit:

"'WHEREAS the Continental Congress, by their "'Resolution of the first day of November last, have "'resolved that no produce of the United Colonies "'be exported, except from Colony to Colony under "'the directions of the Committees of Inspection and "'Observation, and except from one part to the other "'of the same Colony, before the first day of March "'next, without the permission or order of the Con-"'tinental Congress;

"'AND WHEREAS this Committee of Safety for the "'Colony of New York conceives that it is necessary "'to prevent the sale of all the barrelled Beef and "'Pork in the County of Westchester, and to retain "'the same for the Continental service in this Col-"'ony, as such Provisions may be necessary for the "'Continental Army in this Colony:

"'RESOLVED, That the Committee of the County "'of Westchester be requested to take effectual "'means to prevent the sale and transportation of "'any barrelled Beef or Pork out of Westchester-"'county, to any person or persons residing out of "'this Colony, until the further order of the Provin-"'cial Congress or of the Committee of Safety of this "'Colony.'

"A draft of a letter to the Committee of West-"chester-county was read and approved of, and is in "the words following, to wit:

"'GENTLEMEN:

It will be seen that the farmers of Westchester-county, at the time of which we write, were prohibited from finding a market for the surplus of their products, beyond the limits of the Colony or, at their own doors, to those who were not of New York, and that, in consequence of that prohibition, they were limited to those local purchasers, forestallers, or speculators, who should incline to purchase, and at prices which were not regulated by competition. At the same time, as has been seen, the surplus products of the farms in Connecticut were brought into the Colony, in open disregard of the provisions of that Resolution of the Continental Congress which was used as the warrant for the prohibition of the reciprocal trade of Westchester-county with Connecticut; and the market of New York, for nothing else than the products of the Colony of New York, which the Resolution would have guaranteed, if it had been impartially enforced, was recklessly destroyed, in favor of the greed of New England. Need there be any wonder that the Committee of Bedford objected, and embargoed those who had come into the Colony, from Connecticut, in violation of the Resolution of the Continental Congress and in derogation of the interests, if not of the Rights, of the farmers of that Town? Need there be any surprise, when doubts are raised against the integrity of those who had thus hampered the farmers of Westchester-county, when the latter had sought a market for their surplus products, compelling them to either accept a purely local market and a depreciated price or to hold, indefinitely, what they had for sale? Can any one say, honestly, that those who made those enactments, purely in the interest of the farmers of Connecticut, at the expense of those of Westchester-county, notwithstanding they were unquestionably "patriotic," were anything else than corrupt legislators and roguish, dishonest men? Will not those who know the character of Gilbert Drake, before and during and after the War, entirely understand that his motive, in moving and securing the embargo on the products of Westchester-county, without imposing a similar embargo on the products of Connecticut, was corrupt and roguish?

In the same connection, and with the same results, a few weeks subsequently, the Committee of the County of Westchester, of which the same Gilbert Drake was the Chairman and the master-spirit, undertook to prevent Abraham Livingston, the Contractor for supplying the Continental Army with Provisions, from taking any Pork from that County, the Committee of the County of Duchess, of which Egbert Benson was the Chairman, having published a similar manifesto, to control the market after a fashion of its own creation, in that County.

The Contractor encountered so much of trouble from these interfering causes, that he was constrained to seek the interposition of the Committee of Safety; and, on the twentieth of March, that Committee, responsive to the Contractor's complaint, ordered "that "the respective Committees of the Counties of West- "chester and Duchess permit Mr. Abraham Living- "ston to export Provisions of any kind whatsoever, "from either of those Counties to New-York, on his "giving, or any other such proper person as is em- "ployed on his behalf giving, such security as the "Committees approve of, to land and store such Pro- "visions in New-York or Kings-county."[1]

The facts that the Contractor for supplying the Continental Army with Provisions was subjected to the hindrances invented by these local Committees, and that the farmers within those Counties were thereby prevented from selling their surplus supply of Provisions, even for the known use of the Continental Army, like those similar prohibitions of trade, by similarly arbitrary authority, already noticed, at once so remarkable and so unaccountable, would have become stumbling-blocks in the way of the careful student of the history of the men of that period and of their doings, had not time and the opening of previously concealed records revealed the explanation of this, among others of the mysteries of the politics of the American Revolution. That explanation of the restrictions of trade, in this instance, will be noticed hereafter.

Early in January, 1776, while the conservatism of the inhabitants of Queens-county was occupying the attention of the leaders of the Rebellion; while the inhabitants of that County, because of their decided and outspoken opposition to the Rebellion and to the various Committees and Congresses which the Rebellion had called into existence, were subjected, by the Provincial Congress, to a sentence of outlawry;[2] and while, in consequence of that savage enactment and the unaccountable negligence of its duty to do something for their protection, by the naval force which then occupied the harbor of New York and commanded all the neighboring waters, that populous and thickly-settled County was overrun and pillaged and the inhabitants subjected to all classes of barbarities, by inroads from Connecticut and New Jersey, the latter accompanied by amateur banditti from New York City, the leaders of the Rebellion in Westchester-county, also, were anxious to join in the crusade of "patriotism," against their neighbors on the other side of the Sound—they had had practise in such a service as that, in the work of harrying their conservative neighbors, in Westchester-county; they knew that it was a profitable occupation; and they were anxious to participate in a similar service, elsewhere, where even greater profits were promised. To secure that much-desidered employment, on the eighth of January, 1776, the Committee of the County addressed the following note to the Committee of Safety, in the City of New York:

"WHITE PLAINS, 8th Janry, 1776.

"SIR:

The Committee of West Chester County having seen in the public prints that many of the "Inhabitants of Queens County are thrown out of the "Protection of the Provincial Congress; and having "been informed that they are Arming in their De-"fence, are greatly alarmed at their Conduct, and beg "leave to assure your honorable House, that the "Friends of Liberty in this County are willing strenuously to exert themselves to reduce the Enemies to "their Country before they are supported by the "Regular Troops If it shall be thought most advisable by the Committee of Safety, or the Provincial "or Continental Congress. We are Sir Your most "Humble Servants

"WM. MILLER, D. Chairman.

"To Mr. Pierre Van Cortlandt, President of the "Committee of Safety." [1]

As the original letter remained among the papers of the Military Committee of the Provincial Congress and has been preserved, to this day, among the multitude of other inedited and unexplained manuscripts, in the office of the Secretary of State, at Albany, it is very evident that it was duly referred to that Committee; that the unholy desires of the "patriots" of Westchester-county, to join in the spoliation of fellow-colonists, in a neighboring County, without lawful reason, without any process in law, and in time of Peace, were not reciprocated by the members of that Committee; and that the application was filed, without having received any other attention whatever. In short, very appropriately, the Committee of Westchester-county was told, by that inattention, either to attend to its own business, at home, or to play the parts of freebooters, if it should continue to hanker after the spoils to be acquired in such an occupation, on its own responsibility.

In February, 1776, a movement was made by the Committee of Westchester-county, to consolidate the several Troops of Horse which were then within that County, evidently several in number and mere phantoms in weakness, the aggregate of their strength having been less than forty men; and, on the thirteenth of that month, these assembled at Wilsey Dusenberry's, in "Harrison's Precinct," and arranged themselves into a single Troop, electing their Officers, and duly reporting their doings to the Provincial Congress. The following is the official report of the Election of its Officers, made by two members of the County Committee and transmitted to the Provincial Congress:

"On the 13th of February, 1776, The Troops of "Horse in the County of Westchester was Called to-"gether at the House of Willsey Dusinberry in Har-"sons Precinct and There being Present between "Thirty and fourty went into an arrangement for the "Choice of officers under the Inspection of Colnl "Thomas, Samuel Haviland, and William Miller "Three of the Committee where Samuel Tredwell "was Unanimously chose Capt. and Thaddeus Avory "was chose Leut unanimously Likewise Abraham "Hatfield was Chose Corneth by a majority and Uy-"tendall Allair was Chose Quartermaster by a ma-"jority also. "WM. MILLER." [2]

The Return was laid before the Provincial Congress on the twenty-first of February, when the Commissions were issued to the officers-elect; [3] and thus, probably, a beginning was made of that notable Troop of Horse, in Westchester-county, of which so much has been said, in romance, if not in history.

Early in February, 1776, General Lee, then chief in command, in the City of New York, informed the Committee of Safety, then in session, that he was "of opinion that the two Connecticut Regiments "and Lord Stirling's would not be sufficient for the "services he will have to perform; and he desired to "know whether it would be agreeable to the Com-"mittee that he should send to Pennsylvania for a "Regiment from thence." After due consideration, the introduction of troops from other Colonies having been found unsatisfactory, because of outrages inflicted by them on the inhabitants, the Committee of Safety adopted the following Resolution:

"RESOLVED, That if General Lee shall think it "necessary to call in the aid of any other troops than "the two Connecticut Regiments and Lord Stirling's "Regiment, that he be authorized and, in such case, "he is hereby authorized, to call in as many of the "Minute-men of this Colony as he shall, at any time, "think necessary." [4]

In accordance with the authority which was thus delegated to General Lee, on the following day, [February 9, 1776] a letter was addressed to Colonel Samuel Drake, ordering the skeleton Regiment of Westchester-county Minute-men into active service. That letter may properly find a place in this narrative: it was in the following words:

"NEW YORK, Feb'y 9th 1776.

"SIR:

"You will see by the enclosed Resolution "that Major General Lee now at New York is author-"ized to call in as many of the Minute Men of this "Colony as he may think necessary.

"I am directed by the General to have some Regi-"ments of Minute Men called here directly.

"Your Regiment is fixed on by the Committee of "Safety of this Colony as proper to be called.

"You are therefore on receipt hereof to march with "your Regiment to New York with all possible dis-"patch. Take care that your men have their knap-"sacks and Blankets with them & provisiens for their "march.—The Quartermaster ought by all means to "come with the Regiment.

"It is not doubted but you will give orders that "your Troops observe the greatest regularity in their "march, and if you order the several Companies to "proceed" [precede?] "each other a few miles in their 'march they will be more easily accommodated.

"Suffer no Delay in bringing in your Regiment.

"I am respectfully Sir your very humble serv[t]

"P.S.—It is expected that Col[o] Drake will leave a "sufficient Guard of his Regiment at the cannon be-"yond Kings-bridge.—He will be a proper judge how "many may be necessary for that small service." [1]

As Captain Varian and his eighteen companions, facetiously regarded as one of the Companies of Minute-men of which Colonel Drake's Regiment was subsequently composed, were, then, unknown as soldiers,[2] that Regiment could not have possibly mustered more than two Companies commanded, respectively, by Captains Slason and Seely [3]—that commanded by Captain Gray was not organized until six days after the Regiment had been ordered into the service;[4] and no record appears of any attempt having been made to organize the two Companies, in the Cortlandt's Manor, for which blank Commissions had been issued, in advance of any organization, in the preceding October [5]—although it is understood that those Companies which were commanded by Captains Gray and Steinrod subsequently joined it. There is no known Return of the actual strength of the Regiment, at any time; but within a few days after it had entered the Continental service, and after its reinforcement had joined it, it numbered not more than a hundred and fifty men;[6] and about two weeks subsequently, little more than a month after it had been mustered in, it was made ridiculous and the propensity to office-holding among "the friends of Liberty," in Westchester-county, was forcibly illustrated by the following paragraph, which appeared in the General Orders of the commanding Officer of the Continental Army in New York:

"HEAD-QUARTERS, March 16, 1776.

"As Colonel Drake's Regiment of Minute-men "consists of one hundred and eleven private men, "present, and yet have no less than four Field "Officers, two Captains, and thirteen other Commis-"sioned Officers, and twenty Non-commissioned "Officers, it is unreasonable to put the Continent to "the enormous expense of maintaining so many "Officers for the use of so few men; and it is there-"fore ordered that one Field-officer, two Captains, "four Lieutenants, two Ensigns, the Adjutant, and "Quartermaster, eight Sergeants, eight Corporals, or "Drums or Fifes, and no other Officer do remain with "that small part of the Regiment; the other Officers "are to return to their County, in order to complete "their Corps. Colonel Swartwout [7] and Lieutenant-"colonel Humphreys [8] are to observe the same rule in "proportion to their numbers; and they are all of "them to send into Headquarters, Returns of their "respective Corps, present." [9]

The reader will become better acquainted with this portion of the history of Colonel Samuel Drake's Regiment of Westchester-county Minute-men, by-and-by.

The Regiment, when it reached the City of New-York, was employed in the construction of a redoubt, on Hoern's Hook, at the mouth of the Harlem-river, for the defence of the pass of Hell-Gate as well as to command the ferry to Long Island, which, even at that early period, had been established at that place;[10]

[6] Captain Gray's Company probably marched from Bedford, on the sixteenth of February, agreeably to the promise that it should do so; and on the twenty-ninth of the same month, General Lee said of the Regiment and of a Company detached from another Regiment, together forming the garrison at Hoern's Hook, "Drake's Regiment of Minute-"Men and one more Company, (in all about two hundred,) are stationed at "Horn's Hook, which commands Hell-Gate. They are employed in "throwing up a redoubt, to contain three hundred men," (General Lee to General Washington, "NEW-YORK, February 29, 1776.")

[7] Jacobus Swartwout was Colonel of one of the Regiments, so called, of Duchess-county Minute-men, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, XXVI., 3.)

[8] Lieutenant-colonel Cornelius Humphreys evidently commanded the Regiment of Duchess-county Minute-men, of which John Van Ness was Colonel and Robert G. Livingston, Junior, one of the Majors. (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, XXVI., 3.)

At the period referred to in the text, that was known as "Waldron's "Ferry."

but it was composed of men of notorious poverty and meanness,[1] by no means representative men of the yeomanry of Westchester-county; "many of them" were, "destitute of "arms"[2] and, therefore, useless for soldiers; and it appears that, as such characters were apt to be, they were recklessly destructive of the private property of those who were richer than they, not sparing, even, the property of those who had endeavored to make them more than ordinarily comfortable.[3] The Lieutenant-colonel of the Regiment, who was, also, a Deputy from Westchester-county in the Provincial Congress, complained to that body that the Regiment "lodged in an uncom-"fortable manner for the want of Cribs for its beds;" and he insisted that it was "necessary that a car-"penter be sent to make Cribs for their beds;" and a carpenter was accordingly sent to Hoern's Hook, for the purpose of making "Cribs" for the greater comfort of Westchester-county's "patriotic" Minute-men.[4]

It does not appear how long that particular Regiment remained in the service of the Continent; but it was evidently mustered in for only a short term of service; and that, at the expiration of that brief term, it was discharged and mustered out, disappearing, for ever, from the field of military service.

On the nineteenth of January, 1776, the Continental Congress ordered four Battalions to be raised for the defence of the Colony of New York;[5] and, on the twenty-sixth of the same month, the experiment of starting the work of enlistment, for those four Battalions, by jobbing out the Offices which would be required, among the several Counties, with invitations for estimates of the numbers of men who could "be "speedily raised and armed," in the respective Counties, by that proffered bait of Offices, was the first action which was taken by the revolutionary authorities, in New York, on that important subject.[6]

On the following day, [January 27, 1776,] the Committee of Safety issued its Instructions for the Recruiting Officers who should be employed in the enlistment of men for the service referred to, in that new Order —the pay of the Privates was to be five dollars per month; each was to receive, as a bounty, a felt hat, a pair of yarn stockings, a pair of shoes, and, if they could be procured, a hunting-shirt and a blanket; and the men were to provide their own Arms. There was no specified term of service; but the Privates—not the Officers—were "liable to be discharged at any "time, on allowing them one month's pay extraordi-"nary."[7]

There appears to have been great backwardness in enlisting, however—those who were expected to step into the ranks and to do the fatigue duty and the fighting, while the more favored ones of the Rebellion had occupied all the offices, in advance, and were predestinated to enjoy all that was comfortable and to issue all the orders and to be implicitly obeyed, were slow in their responses; only those who were extremely poor, and whose actual necessities obliged them, or those whose morals were questionable, and who enlisted either to retire from adverse observation or to secure a wider field for their unholy practices, appearing to have been willing to support "the Liber-"ties of America," in the field, even where there was no enemy and where none was really expected.[8] Indeed, so discouraging were the reports from those who had been entrusted with the Warrants for recruiting, that, on the fifteenth of February, the Provincial Congress, on the recommendation of a Committee who had been appointed to consider the subject, determined to apportion a specified quota of Officers and Privates to each of the Counties in the Colony, in order that the organization of the required Battalions might be effected in the shortest possible period.[9] Three days subsequently, [February 18, 1776,] another Committee who had been appointed to apportion the different quota of Officers and Privates to be raised in the several Counties, made a Report, which was adopted, two Companies, as we have already stated, being apportioned to Westchester-county;[10] and, on the afternoon of the same day, a Circular Letter was sent by the Provincial Congress to each of the County-committees throughout the Colony, informing it of the arrangement and urging its attention to the matter of the enlistments. As that Circular Letter is peculiarly interesting, in its details of the terms of enlistment into the Continental Army of 1776, a place may properly be found for it, in these pages. It was in the following words:

"In Provincial Congress,

"of the Continental Congress, for the defence of this "Colony, have resolved that blank Warrants for the "Officers of the same shall be sent to your Com- "mittee.

"You will observe by the enclosed Resolves that "you are restrained in the appointments to give the "preference to such persons as have served their Coun- "try in the last Campaign; but it is not, by any "means, the design of Congress that men who have "misbehaved themselves should be any further em- "ployed.

"It is expected that the people will readily enlist "in these Regiments, as they are raised for the ex- "press purpose of defending this Colony; and unless "we raise them from among ourselves, in all proba- "bility they will be sent from other Colonies, which "will be to our everlasting disgrace.

"We have great confidence in your zeal for the "common cause, and trust you will exert yourselves "that these levies be completed with all possible de- "spatch.

"We are, Sir, your very hble. servants,
"By order,
"NATHANIEL WOODHULL, Pres't."

"It is expected that each man furnishes himself "with a good gun and bayonet, tomahawk, knapsack "or haversack, and two bills. But those who are not "able to furnish themselves with these arms and ac- "coutrements will be supplied at the public expense, "for the payment of which small stoppages will be "made out of their monthly pay, till the whole are "paid for; then they are to remain the property of "the men."[1]

Notwithstanding all the inducements which the Provincial Congress and its various office-seeking recruiting agents could offer, however, the staid and conservative farmers of Westchester-county were slow to enlist into the Continental service—there had been much discontentment among those who were in the service, under Colonel Holmes, in the preceding year;[2] and on the return of those malcontents, they had undoubtedly told the story of their respective grievances to their surprised and sympathetic neighbors; besides which hindrance, the conservatism of the County had been too barbarously treated by those who were in rebellion, to permit it to extend to that "common cause" the slightest favor, while the wounds, which it had thus received were yet bleeding. It was, indeed, true that Warrants had been sent with the Circular Letter, in February; and it is undoubtedly true, also, that the favored ones, throughout the County, Warrants in hand and Offices in prospective, had employed all their powers of conciliation and persuasion to ensure a successful enlistment of the quota and the consequent reward to themselves; but Westchester-county would not be conciliated far enough to send her well-to-do sons into the Army; and the Warrants were returned to the Congress and the proffered Offices were not secured by those who had hankered for them. The prospect for the four Battalions, as far as Westchester-county was concerned in it, was not promising; and the Committee of Safety was already entertaining the proposal to call back the Warrants which had been sent into the County, more than two months previously, when a letter was received by that body, from Gilbert Drake, the Chairman of the Committee of the County, stating that one, Ezekiel Hyatt, or Haight, with his associates, had enlisted seventy men in Westchester-county, for a Connecticut Regiment; but was inclined to take them, as a portion of the quota of that County, into a New York Regiment, if Commissions could be assured to those who were designated as their Officers.[3]

Subsequently, it was seen that the men whom Ezekial Hyatt, or Haight, or Hait—for by each of these several names that "patriotic" gentleman was known, at different times—had enlisted into his Company had been entrapped, by false representations;[4] and the revelations of unopened records of that period, more recently opened, reveal the fact that Commissions had already been issued, by the Continental Congress, to Ezekiel Hait, Esquire, as Captain,[5] to Caleb Hobby, Gentleman, as First Lieutenant,[6] to Joseph De Groet, Gentleman, as Second Lieutenant,[7] and to Isaac Poineair, Gentleman, as Ensign,[8] all dated on the eighth of April, more than a fortnight before Gilbert Drake wrote to the Committee of Safety, asking Commissions for the same Officers from the Provincial Congress of New York; and that each of those Commissions had specifically described the Company to which the holder of the Commission was attached, not as belonging to a Connecticut Regiment, but as "the Company of the First "Regiment of New York Forces." But, whatever schemes may have been laid to carry the Company into the Connecticut Line of the Continental Army, and notwithstanding the men enlisted into the Company had been fraudulently entrapped into a service which they did not intend to enter,[9] Captain Hyatt

[9] "There are good reasons for believing that that Company, like the similar Company commanded by Cornelius Steenrod, of which mention will be made, hereafter, had been really enlisted for Colonel Samuel Drake's Regiment of Minute-men, then at Hoern's Hook, as already stated; and that a system of schemes had followed, first with Alexander McDougal, of the first New-York Regiment; then with some Connectic and his command were accepted by the Committee of Safety, as one of the two Companies required from Westchester-county;[1] and it subsequently constituted the Fifth Company of the First Regiment of the New York Line, commanded by Colonel Alexander McDougal.[2] It was said of the Company, afterwards, that the Captain "has deceived the Convention" [the Provincial Congress?] "in Enlisting the men "for 6 & 12 months instead of doing it for the "war;"[3] that the men, who had, also, been deceived by their Captain, deserted in large numbers;[4] that the Regiment was greatly reduced by the desertions, of which those from this Company were part;[5] and the Company was thereby disgraced, through all time. Of Captain Hyatt, it was stated that he was "unfit" to be retained in the service,[6] as "he wants authority "to make a good Officer:"[7] of the three Subalterns, the same record stated, "These three wish to de-"cline the service; they will be no loss to it."[8]

Two days after Ezekiel Hyatt, through the Chairman of the Committee of Westchester-county, had secured a place for himself and his command, in the New York Line of the Continental Army, [April 27, 1776,] Cornelius Steenrod appeared, personally, before the Committee of Safety, in the City of New York, and informed that Committee "that he can enlist a "complete Company of men for the Continental ser-"vice, in fourteen days;" and the Committee, after due consideration of the proposal, adopted a Resolution giving to him "full assurance that he and his "Subalterns, with the said Company, will be em-"ployed as part of the troops raising for the defence "of this Colony," provided a full and complete Company of able bodied men should be enlisted and made ready to join a Regiment, within the designated period of fourteen days.[9]

That Cornelius Steenrod was a Miller, on the Cortlandt's Manor; evidently a man of some property;[10] and an intimate friend and confidante of Stephen De Lancey, a son of the late distinguished Chief-justice De Lancey, who was also one of the Proprietors and a resident of that Manor,[11] there can be no doubt. He was peculiarly anxious to obtain an office, no matter what, nor on what terms;[12] he was particularly zealous in his desire that he might administer test-oaths to his neighbors;[13] and it is more than probable that he was, in fact, a "friend of the Government," in disguise, notwithstanding all his official disclaimers.[14] He had been in command of one of the skeleton Companies of Minute-men of which the skeleton Regiment of Colonel Samuel Drake had been nominally composed[15]—it is more than probable that one of those two blank Commissions, for Captains of Companies, which had been issued in advance of the formation of those Companies,[16] was held by him; and it is far from impossible that the men whom he and his Subalterns had evidently on hand, when he applied to the Committee of Safety for admittance into the service of the Continent, in a different Regiment, had been really enlisted for the re-inforcement of the former Regiment, then at Hoern's Hook.

He evidently completed his Company, in season to take a place, as the second Company of the apportionment to Westchester-county, in the First Regiment of the New York Line, in the Continental Army of 1776, commanded by Colonel Alexander McDougal, of which it was the Sixth Company, Isaac Titus having been his First Lieutenant, Isaac Ruyckman, Junior, his Second Lieutenant, and Benjamin Jones his Ensign.[17] But, like Captain Hyatt, Captain Steenrod had deceived his men and the Congress, in his enlistment of his command for six and twelve months instead of for the entire period of parties; and finally with the Committee of Westchester-county—each scheme having been an improvement on those which had preceded it—for the disposition of the Company, just as schemes were formed for the promotion of personal interests of Officers, and just as Enlisted Men were trucked and bartered into Regiments which were foreign to them, for the promotion of those schemes, in another service, within the memory of living men.

(Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxiv., 401.)

Cornelius Steenrod had only recently joined that Regiment, at the head of a Company, when that statement was made.

the War;[1] his command reciprocating, like that of Captain Hyatt, by deserting, in great numbers, and, thereby, seriously crippling the Regiment;[2] and, also like Captain Hyatt, personally, he was reported as "unfit" for his command.[3] The similarity of that Company and its Officers and that commanded by Captain Hyatt and its Officers is singularly continued in the fact that the Second Lieutenant who was with Captain Steenrod when the Company was mustered into the Continental Service, was subsequently cashiered,[4] assuredly for conduct which was more than ordinarily bad; and in the Report, concerning First Lieutenant Titus and Ensign Jones, that "These two are unfit for the service."[5]

Captain Ambrose Horton, who commanded one of the Companies from Westchester-county, in the Campaign of 1775, appears to have returned to the service, probably from another County, in 1776;[6] but nothing more than a mere mention of his name was made, without the slightest additional information. Neither Captain Daniel Mills nor Captain Jonathan Platt, each of whom had commanded a Company from Westchester-county, in the Campaign of 1775, appears to have returned to the service, in 1776.

It will be seen, from the respective records of the fraudulent practices of Ezekiel Hyatt and Cornelius Steenrod and their respective associates, in their enlistment of men for their respective commands; from the records of the questionable manner in which their respective Companies were carried, without their consent, into a line of the Continental Service for which they were not enlisted; from the records of the personal unfitness for their respective offices of the several Officers of both these Companies; and from those of the consequent disaffection and desertions of the enlisted men, that Westchester-county's quota, in the Continental levy of 1776, was of questionable usefulness to the country or the cause in which it was nominally engaged. Whatever may have been the character and conduct of the Non-commissioned Officers and Privates of which those Companies were respectively composed—and it is due to the memory of those unknown men that it should be said of them that no record of bad conduct, on their parts, has come down among the debris of that period, since it cannot be regarded as a crime that some of them, unbidden, in that era of disregard of law, helped themselves to the freedom, belonging to themselves, of which their Officers had fraudulently deprived them—it cannot be consistently pretended, by any one, that the Officers of those Companies were reasonably representative men of the great body of the farmers of Colonial Westchester-county, of that or of any other period: whether or not they may be regarded as representative men of that other and smaller class of the inhabitants of that County, in 1775–76, of those whose "patriotism" was only ill-concealed selfishness, of those whose devotion to "the common cause" was graduated with nothing else than with the promised profits of the investment, of those whose zeal was tempered with nothing as effective as with an Office of some sort, the reader can determine for himself, from the evidence which has been already adduced, illustrative of the character and conduct of the revolutionary faction, within that County, during that later Colonial Period.

Among the multitude of requirements, made by General Lee, either on his own motion or at the prompting of those who pandered to his baser inclinations, and which were obsequiously obeyed by the Provincial Congress, was one, made early in March, 1776, for "a Magazine of Provisions and Military "Stores, to be established in Westchester-county," the requisition being supplemented with a recommendation that "the Deputies of Westchester-county "purchase and deposit, in different stores in that "County, twelve hundred barrels of good salted Pork, "wherever it is to be bought; and that the said "salted Pork be repacked and pickled by a sworn "Packer of New York; and that the Deputies of "Albany-county purchase eighteen hundred and fifty "bushels of good Peas, and send them to the Depu-"ties of Westchester-county, to be by them stored in "the same manner."[7]

The proposed test of the quality of the Pork to be purchased was, however, not satisfactory to those who were manipulating the Congress, in the interest of the job; and, on the ninth of March, when that body resumed the consideration of the proposition, it was led to suppose that the Resolution which had been adopted, approving the same, was "imperfect, "inadequate to the end, and that the method thereby "proposed will create unnecessary expense." It also appointed a Committee of three Deputies, two of whom were John Thomas, Junior, and Colonel Joseph Drake, both of them Deputies from Westchester-county, "to reconsider the method of establishing a "Magazine of Provisions, and to report thereon."[8]

[6] Recruiting Warrants were issued to him, on the tenth of March, 1776, and to Thomas Le Foy, on the twenty-eighth of the same month, for the Ninth Company of the First Regiment of the New York Line of the Continental Army of 1776; but the record says, also, "Captain Horton "and Officers' commissions not made out," (Recruiting Warrants issued by the Convention to the First New York Continentals—Historical Manuscripts, etc., Military Committee, XXV., 165, 676;) and it is probable that they were among those whose blandishments were unsuccessful in obtaining recruits, as has been stated in the text, (page 321, ante.)

[8] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., A.M., March "9, 1776."

The whole subject had evidently been considered, informally, before it was laid before the Congress—in the expressive phrase of practical men, it had been "cut and dried"—and the Committee "speedily re-"turned and reported" a substitute for the original Resolution, which was more "perfect," more "ade-"quate to the end," and less expensive, although it was, also, less favorable to the Congress—it did no more than to omit the provision for the employment of a Packer from New York, by whom, also, the quality of the Pork could have been accurately ascertained, leaving every other portion of the original Resolution, in the form in which it had been adopted, five days previously. The evidently pre-arranged Report and Resolution were promptly approved, without a dissenting voice;[1] and the scheme was, so far, a complete success.

There does not appear to have been a doubt concerning the entire safety of such a Magazine, nor of such a series of Magazines, notwithstanding the known hostility of by far the greater number of the inhabitants of Westchester-county, within which they were to be established, against all which pertained to the Rebellion—an hostility, too, which had become intensified by reason of the repeated and ruinous outrages to which the Conservatives among them, and few were not Conservatives, had been subjected; and if anything were wanted to establish the fact of the quiet, law-observing, and upright personal character of those much abused and much persecuted farmers of Colonial Westchester-county, it may be found in that voluntary tribute to their integrity, thus unwittingly, but freely, paid by their most virulent enemies. A Military Magazine established in the midst of a community who was hostile to those who gathered and established it, without ample provision for its protection, and depending, largely, if not entirely, for its safety, on the forbearance of those among whom it was placed, was an anomaly in Military Science; but the farmers of Westchester-county were not inclined to retaliate; and those who were leaders in the Rebellion could, therefrom, have learned something which would have been useful to themselves and to their "common cause," had not they been besotted in their greed for Office and its emoluments and for the authority and the opportunities for personal aggrandizement which office-bearing, in a revolutionary era, always affords to those who are the greater zealots.

The Deputies from Westchester-county were not slow in their movements, homeward, as soon as that Report and that Resolution had been adopted, leaving the Deputation in the Congress without the requisite quorum, in their eager pursuit of the advantages, to themselves, which were offered in their purchases of barrelled Pork. The reason for the embargo which had closed the foreign markets against the producers and which had monopolized the trade in favor of the local buyers and at their own prices, was then made manifest to all observers; and the favored Deputies, who were the official buyers, and their personal friends were provided with an outlet, at favorable prices, not only for the surplus of their own products, but for those additional stocks which the rigidly enforced embargo and their more accurate knowledge of what the future was to develope, had placed within their control; and that without any limitations concerning prices to be paid, and without any danger, concerning the quality of the article to be sold, from the adverse reports of a sworn Packer and Inspector, from the City of New York.

On the thirteenth of March, a letter was received from General Washington, expressing to "the Com-"manding Officer of the American Forces, New "York,"[2] the suspicions of the Commander-in-chief that the Royal Army which was then enclosed in Boston would soon be transferred to New York, and appealing to the Provincial Congress for its best efforts "to "prevent their forming a lodgment before" [he, General Washington,] "can come or send to your assist-"ance."

The intelligence thus communicated to the Provincial Congress, for General Lord Stirling immediately submitted the letter to that body, led to another revision of the Resolution authorizing the establishment of a Military Magazine in Westchester-county, already referred to, which resulted in the adoption of the following Resolution, not necessarily as a substitute for the other, nor probably regarded as such a substitute, in practise:

"ORDERED, That Colonel Gilbert Drake repair "immediately to Westchester-county and purchase "twelve hundred barrels of the best Pork, and "have the same safely stored, agreeable to the "Resolves of this Congress, of the ninth day of "March instant; that he take with him, from New-"York, a sworn Inspector and Repacker of Pork, to "inspect and re-pack the same; and that he purchase "and store, at the cheapest rate in his power, Flour "sufficient for the use of five thousand men for a "month."[3]

Notwithstanding the adroitness of Colonel Gilbert Drake, in concentrating within his own person the sole authority to purchase all the Pork and all the Flour which were considered necessary, when the last-named Resolution was adopted by the Provincial Congress, his associates in the Deputation from Westchester-county were already in the field, bargaining for barrelled Pork, under the provisions of the former Resolution; entering into competition with him, among the sellers of Pork, who were not slow to take advantage of that circumstance, in advancing the prices of the goods; and, to a corresponding extent, intercepting, advantageously to themselves, the profits of those particular transactions which, but for their interference, would have fallen into his basket.

The Provincial Congress had adjourned, leaving its Committee of Safety to discharge its ordinary duties;[1] and William Paulding was the only Deputy from Westchester-county who remained in the City of New York. But, on the afternoon of the first day of the existence of that Committee, [March 18, 1776,] Mr. Paulding, whose hand was evidently clean while those of all his fellow Deputies were seriously smirched, "informed the Committee that several of the "members from Westchester-county, conceiving that "they were directed to purchase Pork for a Magazine, "were purchasing quantities for that purpose; that "Colonel Gilbert Drake, by a late Order of the "Congress, was also purchasing the whole quantity "directed to be stored in that County, whereby there "is danger that the said article of Provisions may "be purchased at an exorbitant price."[2]

After due consideration of the subject, the Committee of Safety determined to limit the price to be paid for the Pork, leaving the rival buyers undisturbed, which was undoubtedly done for political reasons—it would not have been prudent to have arrested the Deputation of a County, while it was so eagerly engaged in a still-hunt for some of the pickings which had been placed within its reach, by the revolutionary leaders. The enactment of the Committee of Safety was in these words:

"Whereas different appointments have been made "by the Provincial Congress, for the purchase of "barreled Pork, in Westchester-county; it is there-"fore

"ORDERED, That no person employed in that ser-"vice pay more for that article of Provision than four "pounds per barrel, subject to the expense of the "sellers for cartage to the place of delivery in the "County."[3]

On the first of April, 1776—ample time having elapsed, since the two Orders were made, to enable all which could be done in the way of purchases and sales of Pork and Flour, to have been done, satisfactorily to those who were originally in the secret—the Committee of Safety discovered what it regarded as a fact, that such a Military Magazine as General Lee had called for and which the Provincial Congress had deliberately established, would "not be absolutely necessary;" and it accordingly "ORDERED, That Colonel "Gilbert Drake and the other members of West-"chester-County do not purchase any more Pro-"visions, until farther order; and that they return "with all convenient speed to this Committee, an ac-"count of all the Provisions they have purchased, and "in what stores they are placed."[4]

It required eight days for the Committee's letter and Order to reach the busy Deputies and to arrest their eager searches for Pork and Flour; but on the eighth day, [April 9, 1776,] Colonel Drake reported that he, and John Thomas, Junior, and Major Lockwood, three of the migratory Deputies, had bought about one thousand barrels of the former and six hundred barrels of the latter;[5] from which one may learn something of the productiveness of Colonial Westchester-county, in 1775, notwithstanding the disturbances, already referred to, to which its inhabitants had been so frequently and so seriously subjected—the usual Autumn and Winter sales of these two staple articles had been undoubtedly made; extraordinary sales had been made for the Northern Army and for distant places, many of them having been made matters of official record; the home-consumption had been supplied, freely, during the Autumn, the Winter, and the early Spring; and the necessary supplies, also for the home-consumption, until the following Autumn, had been undoubtedly reserved; but the supply was not exhausted; and a thousand barrels of salted Pork and six hundred barrels of Flour had been found and purchased, on the account of the Provincial Congress, within the limited period of three weeks, and within the limits of that single County. The Westchester-county farmers of our own period, with their greater numbers and greater area of tillable ground, with their modern appliances of artificial manures and improved implements—none of them, at that time, even hoped for—and with all the improved facilities of transit and of transportation which they now possess, may reasonably hang their heads, in humiliation, on a comparison of the results of their labors with the results of the labors of those industrious, prudent, and thrifty men who preceded them, with smaller numbers and none of the advantages which are now accessible to every one.

Reference has been made to the action of the Provincial Congress encouraging the establishment of Powder-mills, and offering loans for that purpose, without interest, to proper persons, in specified Counties, of which Westchester was one. Although no mention was subsequently made of the establishment of such a Mill within the limits of Westchester-county, the fact that such an offer was made affords another testimony to what has been already adduced concerning the peaceful disposition of the farmers, throughout that County, even in the face of the greatest aggravations, since the want of the Arms of which they had been robbed would not have been a hindrance to any one who had desired to destroy a Powder-mill; and it shows, also, how unwise that revolutionary policy had been, which had tended not only to impair the industrial usefulness of such a community, at a time when the results of its agricultural and other industrial labors were most needed, but to make that element, in the Colony, permanently antagonistic, which, under a peaceful and conciliatory policy, might have been made passive and useful, if not friendly and co-operative.

After the autocratic General Lee was ordered to the South, in March, 1776, the military command of the Continental forces in the City of New York was vested in General Lord Stirling; and, on the thirteenth of that month, that commanding General requested the Provincial Congress to appoint a Committee, to confer with him on various subjects connected with the defense of the City and Colony.[1]

On the following day, [March 14, 1776,] for the purpose of putting the City into a proper condition to sustain an attack, "all the male inhabitants, capable "of fatigue," were ordered to "be immediately em- "ployed on the fortifications of the City, and as well "all the negro men in the City and County of New "York" were similarly ordered; and, at the same time, the inhabitants of Kings-county were ordered to be similarly employed on the defences of that County; while levies were made on the southern part of Orange, or what now constitutes Rockland, County, and on the County of Westchester, for detachments from the Militia of those Counties, respectively, for the support and assistance of the working parties in the City of New York.[2]

That portion of the Regulations, thus agreed to between General Lord Stirling and the Committee of the Provincial Congress, which related particularly to Westchester-county, is in the following words:

"7thly. Resolved and Ordered, That Colonel "Joseph Drake and Colonel Thomas Thomas, of "Westchester-county, do draft out of their Regiments "two hundred men, in the following proportions, to "wit; Two Companies of sixty-five Privates each, "besides the Captains and other inferior Officers, out "of Colonel Joseph Drake's Regiment, and one Com- "pany of sixty-five Privates, with the Captain and "other inferior Officers, of Colonel Thomas's Regiment, "and as many more men out of those two Regiments "as will turn out, Volunteers for that service, to be im- "mediately sent to the City of New York, armed and "accoutred in the best manner possible, and to be "joined to Colonel Samuel Drake's Regiment, and to "receive the same pay and provisions as the other "Continental forces in this Colony."

As what was called the Regiment of Westchester-county Minute-men, commanded by Colonel Samuel Drake,[3] was then at Hoern's Hook, opposite Hell-gate, it will be seen that Westchester-county was largely depended on; but no record has been found which indicates which of the Companies of the Militia of that County were thus drafted and sent to throw up the defensive works within the City of New York, nor is it now known who, if any, of the farmers of that County, volunteered their services, for that laborious duty.

As has been already stated, early attention was paid by the Provincial Congress to the subject of the election of Deputies to a new Congress and to that of its own dissolution. To that end, on the sixteenth of December, 1775, the Congress adopted the following Resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Safety be and "hereby are fully empowered to issue orders to the "respective Counties in this Colony, to elect Deputies "for a Provincial Congress of this Colony, to meet "on the second Tuesday in May next. The said "Committee, by their Order, appointing the day of "Election, in each County, to be at least twenty-one "days before the said second Tuesday in May next."[4]

Notwithstanding that Resolution, there appears to have been some other "plan for the election of Depu- "ties to form a Provincial Congress to meet when the "present Provincial Congress will expire." It is not now known what that other "plan" embraced nor by whom it was introduced or supported; but it was evidently intended to limit the right of voting for Deputies to the new Congress, to those who had signed the Association, and to have the vote taken by ballot. It appears, also, to have been resolutely and successfully opposed, at least as far as the limitation of the right of suffrage was included in its provisions; and its evidently radical supporters, after their defeat on that portion of the "plan," abandoned the project for an election by ballot.[5] The entire subject was then referred to a Committee, for further consideration; and, on the afternoon of the same day, after the said "plan" had been "read, and again read, "paragraph by paragraph, amended, and corrected," it is said to have been "approved," subject, however, to a further consideration, on the following morning.[6]

The obscurity of the Journals of the second Provincial Congress, on the subject under consideration, is relieved, to some extent by the Journals of the third of those Congresses in an occasional reference to the subject.

Besides that almost unintelligible entry in the Journals of the Provincial Congress, no mention appears to have been made on the subject, if any thing further was done with it. It is probable, however, that an Election was ordered to be made for Deputies, on the third Tuesday, which was the sixteenth day, of April;[1] and that the fourteenth day of May was designated for the meeting of the new Provincial Congress.[2]

The Provincial Congress itself appears to have been disbanded, informally—its Journal makes no mention of a formal adjournment—on the afternoon of Monday, the thirteenth of May, 1776;[3] and, thus the second Provincial Congress of the Colony of New York and its doings, for evil or for good, became subjects for the pens of those who should thenceforth assume the grave and responsible duties of historians.

We mentioned, in another part of this narrative,[4] the election of "a Committee for the County of West-"chester," on the eighth of May, 1775, and the appointment of Gilbert Drake for its Chairman, and Micah Townsend for its Clerk. It appears that, either by pre-determined limitation or otherwise, the term of service of that County Committee expired in May, 1776; and, in order that the succession of that body might be continued, notice to that effect having been given, on the sixteenth of April, 1776, "a Number "of the Freeholders and Inhabitants of Westchester-"county appeared at the Court House," and "chose "the Persons hereafter named to serve as a Committee "for the said County from the 2nd Monday in May, "1776, to the 2nd Monday in May, 1777—any twenty "whereof to be a Quorum, vizt:

Of this second County Committee, John Thomas, Junior, of Rye, was made the Chairman, and Edward Thomas was appointed its Clerk.

The day after the dissolution of the second Provincial Congress, [May 14, 1776,] was the day which had been appointed for the organization of the third of that series of Congresses.[6] There was, however, on that day and on the four succeeding days, an insufficient number of members of the several Deputations to form a quorum of the Counties; but, on the fifth day, [May 18, 1776,] the Counties of New York, Richmond, Suffolk, Westchester, Kings, Charlotte, and Tryon—those of Albany, Queens, Ulster, Gloucester, Cumberland, Duchess, and Orange were either entirely unrepresented or were without the requisite numbers to make their several Deputations complete—assumed the consistent, counter-revolutionary responsibility of organizing the Congress and of proceeding to transact business.[7] It continued in session, without tak-

[1] The elections in the Counties of New York, Westchester, Duchess, Kings, Queens, Tryon, Ulster, and Orange were held on that day; while Albany-county appears to have elected her Deputies on the 25th; Suffolk, on the 18th; Richmond-county, on the 23rd; and Charlotte-county, on the 1st May.

Ulster, Gloucester, and Cumberland-counties were entirely unrepresented; instead of the requisite three, only Messrs. Cuyler and Glenn appeared from Albany-county; instead of the requisite three, only Messrs. Blackwell and Lawrence appeared from Queens-county; instead ing any recess, until the thirtieth of June, when, because of supposed danger, in the City of New York, it adjourned to meet at the White Plains, on the following Tuesday, [July 2, 1776]; [1] but the Journals very clearly indicate that no such adjourned meeting was attempted—the Deputies had more important business requiring their personal attention; and the third Congress was permitted to pass away, without further ceremony.

The third Provincial Congress was distinguished by the entrance into it, among the Deputies from the City and County of New York, of John Jay, James Duane, John Alsop, Philip Livingston, and Francis Lewis, notwithstanding all of them were, also, Delegates from the Colony to the Continental Congress, then in session, in Philadelphia; and because three of those five are now known to have resisted the earlier movements toward Independence, in that Congress,[2] and to have, also, resisted the later movements in that direction, in the Provincial Congress, it is a reasonable conclusion that the hegira of those three, if not that of the whole number, had been made for the purpose of obstructing the adoption of that increasingly popular measure, as well as that of the establishment of a new form of government, through the Provincial Congress of New York, at least long enough to enable the Royal Commissioners for effecting a reconciliation with the Colonies, who were then approaching New York, to exhibit their powers and their inclinations, in that better desired measure. How successfully the scheme was carried out, in the latter body, will be seen, hereafter.

* * * * *

The deputation from Westchester-county to that third Provincial Congress, said to have been "duly "elected to represent the said County in Provincial "Congress for twelve months, with such powers and "authority as was recommended in the Resolutions "of the late Provincial Congress to be given them, "any three of whom to be a quorum," were Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt, Colonel Lewis Graham, Colonel Gilbert Drake, Major Ebenezer Lockwood, Gouverneur Morris, William Paulding, Jonathan G. Tompkins, Samuel Haviland, and Peter Fleming.[3]

During the less than two months which intervened between the organization and the untimely dissolution of that third Provincial Congress, [May 18 to June 30, 1776,] the Northern Army was effectually driven from Canada; and all which had been promised and hoped for, in that very well planned, but premature and expensive, expedition, produced nothing else than disappointment and disaster, the latter as serious to those of the resident Canadians who had favored the invading Colonists, as it was to the latter. In South Carolina, the superior bravery of Colonel Moultrie and his handful of Carolinians, even when hampered by the superior authority but inferior practical knowledge of General Lee, had secured lasting honor to himself and to his gallant command and renewed safety to his own country; and "though not "of much magnitude, in itself, it was, like many "other successes attending the American Arms, in "the commencement of the War, of great importance "in its consequences: by impressing on the Colonists "a conviction of their ability to maintain the con-"test, it increased the number of those who resolved "to resist British authority and assisted in paving "the way to a declaration of Independence." The Continental Congress had yielded to the teachings of its experience, and directed enlistments to be made for three years, instead of for six months; but "that "zeal for the service which was manifested in the "first moments of the War, had long begun to abate; "and though the determination to resist became more "general, that enthusiasm which prompts individuals, "voluntarily, to expose themselves to more than "equal shares of the danger and hardships to be en-"countered for the attainment of a common good, "was sensibly declining"—in other words, there were more of those who were willing that somebody of the requisite three, only Mr. Schenck appeared from Duchess-county; and of the requisite two from Orange-county, only Mr. Little appeared.

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Sunday morning, June 30, "1776."

Mr. Bolton, (History of Westchester-county, original edition, ii., 359; the same, second edition, ii., 564,) said of the imaginary journey of the Deputies, from the City of New York to the White Plains, between the adjournment of the Congress and the day on which it was to be re-assembled, "The journey between New York and the Plains was per-"formed by the members on horseback, Pierre van Cortlandt, the Presi-"dent, riding at their head. As expresses overtook them from General "Washington, the House was called to order, on horseback, and several "Resolutions passed."

As has been already stated, there was not the slightest attempt made to keep up the organization of the Congress, after its hurried and informal dissolution, on that eventful Sunday; that there was, therefore, no such funereal procession as Mr. Bolton has described, nor any such official acts, on horseback or on foot, as he has imagined; and that there was no such meeting of the Provincial Congress, at the White Plains, on Tuesday, the second of July, as he has left his readers to suppose.

As Mr. Bolton has not named any authority for his statement, although he was not the first to print it, he must be regarded as authorially responsible for it; and, therefore, it may be proper to say, further, that Pierre Van Cortlandt was not the President of the Congress, nor had he been such, at any time, General Woodhull having been elected its President, and John Haring, of Orange-county, occupied the Chair, as President pro tem., on the last day of its session. In the same connection, it may be said that, although Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt was elected as one of the Deputies from Westchester-county to the third Provincial Congress, that under notice, he never occupied a seat in it, even for a single day.

[2] The Resolution of July 2, 1776, separating the Colonies from the Mother Country, was not the earliest declaration of Independence, in the Colonies, by any means. The correspondence of John Adams is well filled with evidence of his correct judgment of the real character of the earlier enactments of the Continental Congress; but the Resolution which was introduced into that Congress, early in May, 1776, and adopted on the tenth of that month, and the Preamble to that Resolution, which was adopted on the fifteenth, recommending the adoption of new forms of Government, in the several Colonies, was, assuredly, nothing else than a Resolution of Independence, thinly disguised by the prefix of another name.

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., A.M., May "18, 1776."

else than themselves should do whatever fighting might become necessary; but, on the other hand, those who were expected to do the fatigue duty and to hazard their lives, had begun to see that the offices and the benefits to be derived from their expected labor and exposure were to be converted mainly to the benefit of others; and their enthusiasm for "the "Rights of Man and of Englishmen," which was formerly proclaimed by multitudes of earnest men, with scarcely one holding back, was, also, "sensibly "declining," as Marshall has aptly said—indeed, enlistments were made only among those who were desperately poor or among those whose moral characters were not unstained; and even these had to be bribed by bounties, that certain indication that something else than simple, unadulterated patriotism inspired the act. General Washington was at New York, with the main body of the Continental Army, strengthening the defences and seeking means to prevent the passage of ships of war up the Hudson-river or, through the East-river, into the Sound; urging the increase of his Army on those who did no more than call on others, as unwilling as themselves, to enter the ranks; and begging for Arms and munitions of War, of which he was almost destitute, from those who had neither Arms nor munitions of War to bestow on him nor on any other. A large body of Militia, as will be seen, hereafter, was ordered into the field, for the support of the Army, to be mustered in until the close of the year; a "Flying Camp," so called, was ordered to be composed of ten thousand men from Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland; and, on every hand, were seen the active preparations, by an unwilling and bounty-bought or poverty-driven Army, to settle the dispute in which it possessed no direct, if any, interest, by the arbitrament of Arms.

During that brief period, also, the movements of some of those who had assumed to be the leaders of the masses, throughout the several Colonies, were more frequent and more decided in their tone, in favor of Independence—movements, however, both within and without the Congress of the Continent, and more especially from the Delegations from New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, which encountered the most determined and vigilant opposition. It were useless to pretend, with any respect for the truth, that the great body of the inhabitants of the Colonies was favorably inclined to or particularly interested in, a change in those who ruled them or in the manner of that rule, since it was perfectly evident that they would not be permitted to exercise any greater political authority nor to have their labors lessened nor their wants better supplied, under one than under the other form of Government; or, in New York, under the administration of the Livingston régime instead of that of the De Lancey, under the last of which they had hitherto lived; but the leaders of the Rebellion, elsewhere than in New York, seeing before them a semblance of greater consequence to themselves, in the proposition for Independence, were rapidly concentrating their efforts to accomplish that end. The desire for such a change was, also, sometimes promoted by the consciousness, among those whose consciences had not become charred by their hankering for offices, of that evident hypocrisy in pretending to an earnest loyalty toward a monarch against whom they were waging an open and recognized public War, with which the Committees and the Congresses of the Rebellion had continued to affront the common sense and the morality of Christendom; and that moral inclination to Independence, and those other inclinations, in the same direction, which were prompted by less holy influences, were all strengthened by the alarm which was produced by information that the Colonies had been formally declared to be in rebellion; that mercenaries had been employed to assist in reducing them to subjection, in which all classes would be subjected to a common ruin—a repetition, on a larger scale, but on the other side, of what had been done, already, by the leaders of the Rebellion, in New York, against the peaceful, agricultural inhabitants of Westchester and Duchess and Queens and Richmond-counties; that the Indians were to be employed by the Home-Government, for the purpose of harassing the frontiers and threatening the inland settlements and villages; and that the Slaves were to be withdrawn from their masters, as far as possible, and armed in the service of the King. All these influences had culminated in the submission to the Continental Congress of a Resolution, "That "these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, "free and independent States, that they are absolved "from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that "all political connection between them and the State "of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dis-"solved. That it is expedient forthwith to take the "most effectual measures for forming foreign Al-"liances. That a plan of Confederation be prepared "and transmitted to the respective Colonies for their "consideration and approbation." It encountered, however, the most serious opposition, among which the Livingstons and their supporters, Delegates from New York, were peculiarly conspicuous; and, when the third Provincial Congress came to its untimely end, it was still pending, that Delegation, as far as the paucity of its numbers went, appearing conspicuously among those who were not its supporters.

While these various important matters were occupying the attention of the Colonists, General Howe came into the harbor of New York, and occupied Staten-island with his entire command; and the inhabitants of Richmond-county, as that beautiful island was then called, politically, and as it is still called, as might have been reasonably expected, since they were still smarting under the sentence of outlawry and the consequent outrages to which they had been recently subjected by the Provincial Congress and its Committee of Safety, received the new-comers, it is said, "with great de-"monstrations of joy, took the Oaths of Allegiance to "the British Crown; and embodied themselves, under "the authority of the" [Colonial] "Governor, Tryon, "for the defense of the Island. Strong assurances were "also received from Long Island and the neighboring "parts of New Jersey, of the favorable disposition of "the people to the Royal Cause," it was said; and those who had been harried from their homes, and who had sought refuge in the swamps and thickets of the country, victims of the rapine and outrages of lawless and ruthless "patriots," their own countrymen, quite reasonably, hastened to seek the protection of those by whom, under a more judicious policy, they would be enabled to occupy their own homes and to pursue the ordinary routine of their peaceful lives, in quietude and safety. A large and well-provided force, for the reinforcement of General Howe's command, was known to be on the ocean and not distant, convoyed by a strong naval force, under the command of Admiral Howe—the latter a brother of the General and, with him, a half brother of the King—and it was already known that, thenceforth, New York would be the base of all the military and naval operations, on the Atlantic seaboard, in the next campaign.

On the day after the King's forces came into the harbor, [June 30, 1776,] after it had provided for the removal "of all and singular the public papers and "money" which were then in the possession of its Secretary and its Treasurer, to the White Plains, the Provincial Congress was hastily adjourned to that place, as has been already stated, in order that it might escape from the possibly sudden attack on the City, by the Royal forces—an attack by them, on the seat of the local Government of the Rebellion in the Colony of New York, and that at an early day, having evidently been a feature in the pre-constructed plans of General Howe. The anxious Provincial Congress resolved, however, that it would re-assemble at the Court-house, at the White Plains, on the following Tuesday, the second of July, to resume its official business, which was thus interrupted by the appearance, in the distance, of danger; and it resolved, also, that the next Provincial Congress should meet at the same place, on the succeeding Monday, the eighth of July.

In the brief Session which was thus interrupted, and which was not continued, at the White Plains or elsewhere, the third Provincial Congress continued the injudicious and unjust, to say nothing of the barbarous, outrages inflicted on those who were not inclined to accede to every measure of the Congresses and Committees, no matter how passive those Colonial Non-jurors of America might have been; and those pains and penalties were inflicted, directly, by its own authority;[1] and indirectly, by the several local Committees;[2] the Congress, meanwhile, acquiescing in, if not approving, the most barbarous treatment of its prisoners;[3] winking at the barbarities practised by mobs, on those whom it had proscribed;[4]

[3] Henry Dawkins, accused of counterfeiting, was ironed so heavily, within the prison, that he was reported to have been "injured by his irons "so that his legs swell;" and Henry Youngs, accused of the same offense, also confined in the Jail, was so much injured by the irons with which he was additionally secured, that it became necessary to remove them. (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Friday morning, 9 ho., A.M., "June, 1776;" the same, "Tuesday morning, New York, June 11, "1776.")

[4] About the middle of June, 1776, mobs were raised by John Lasher, John and Joshua Hett Smith, Peter Van Zandt, and other leaders of the extreme revolutionary faction, in the City of New York, by whom several citizens who were of the Opposition, but not of the Rebellion, were seized by these revolutionary "patriots," who placed them on "sharp "rails," and carried them on men's shoulders, around the City, amidst the huzzas of the mob. The progress of one of these parties was said to have been stopped by General Putnam; but not until the victim had sustained serious injuries, (Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 101–103; de Lancey's Notes on Jones's History, i., 596–598.)

Peter Elting, a brother-in-law of Richard Varick, wrote of these transactions, "We had some Grand Toory Rides in this City this week & in par-"ticular yesterday. Several of them were handeld verry Roughly Being "Caried trugh the streets on Rails, there Clooths tore from there backs "and there Bodies pritty well mingled with the dust. Amongst them "were C——, Capt. Hardenbrook, Mr. Rapllje, Mr. Queen the Poticary, "and Lessly the barber. There is hardly a toory face to be seen this "morning." (Peter Elting to Captain Richard Varick, "New York, 13th "June, 1776.")

On the twelfth of June, in the afternoon, Generals Putnam and Mifflin, who had evidently witnessed the outrages to which Elting alluded, "complained to the Provincial Congress of the riotous and disorderly "conduct of numbers of the inhabitants of this City, which had led this "day to acts of violence towards some disaffected persons;" but what had shocked Israel Putnam, by reason of its barbarism, even while the "complaint" of those two Officers urged the Congress to condemn the offenders, one of whom was then occupying a seat in the Congress, that body winked at, and, at the same time, it screened the offenders, and qualified the offense—its words were these: "Resolved; That this Con-"gress by no means approve of the riots that have happened this day; "they flatter themselves, however, that they have proceeded from a real "regard to Liberty and a detestation of those persons who, by their "language and conduct, have discovered themselves to be inimical to "the cause of America. To urge the warm friends of Liberty to de-"cency and good order, this Congress assures the public that effectual "measures shall be taken to secure the enemies of American Liberty in "this Colony, and do require the good people of this City and Colony to "desist from all Riots, and leave the offenders against so good a cause to be "dealt with by the constitutional representatives of the Colony"—the subsequently infamous "Committee to detect Conspiracies," then in embryo, having been, undoubtedly, the "constitutional" agency referred to, (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Wednesday afternoon, June 12, "1776.")

It has been said, apologetically, that the Congress was intimidated; and that the mob was the controlling power; but the overwhelming military force which was then in the City, with General Washington at its head, indicated no such state of affairs; and it is undoubtedly true that that series of Mobs, directed by leaders of the Rebellion—one of whom, if no more, was a member of the Provincial Congress—against those of the Colonists who were not of the Rebellion, was intended to give to the new-formed "Committee to detect Conspiracies," subsequently so obnoxious to every honorable man, a good set-off in its work of persecution and outrage.

and compelling the latter to seek safety in flight.[1] It assumed judicial functions, in putting some of its victims on "trial," before itself or a Committee of its members;[2] sometimes it graciously absolved those whom it had seized on mere "informations;"[3] and, occasionally, it honored a victim of a local Committee, by listening to an Appeal from the decision of that inferior tribunal,[4] although it was not always exempt from an appearance, at least, of partiality to the Respondent in the Case.[5] In the same connection, it called into existence and inaugurated the "Committee to detect Conspiracies," that powerful inquisitorial agency of the Rebellion, in New York, whose doings will be noticed more fully, hereafter.

* * * * * * * *

Those who had been hoist with their own petard, in becoming the speculative holders of Dutch Tea, which they had smuggled into the Colony, and which they could not, now, dispose of, unless on terms and at prices which would have been disastrous to them, pestered the Provincial Congress with appeals for relief from the enactments of their own friends; and some of them—one of them a member of the preceding Provincial Congresses, and another a Delegate of the Colony in the Continental Congress—were charged with violating those enactments, in their efforts to "work off" some portions of their stocks of the article; but, of course, in such instances as Isaac Sears and John Alsop, the offenders sustained no evil consequences from the exposure of their commercial peccadillos.[6]

There were other subjects, of greater general interest than these, which received the hurried attention of that very busy body of men; and to some of these, places in this narrative may properly be given.

The first of these is that "Committee to detect "Conspiracies," already alluded to, which originated in that much talked-of "Hickey Plot,"—the latter, a partisan bugbear which, before long, will descend to the low level of "the Negro Plot," in the same City of New York, in which the conspiracy against the helpless victims was greater than any which had possibly existed among them, against others; or to the lower level of that "Witchcraft" excitement, in Salem, led by clerical narrowness and bigotry, which had brought so much shame on the Mathers and on Colonial Massachusetts.

Sometime between Monday morning and Tuesday afternoon, [May 20, 21, 1776,]—as no entry of its appointment was made on the Journals of the Provincial Congress, nothing is known concerning the time nor the circumstances of the appointment, unless from inference[7]—that body appointed a Committee "to consider of the ways and means to prevent the dangers "to which this Colony is exposed by its intestine "enemies." Beyond the single fact that John Alsop, one of the most determined enemies of Independence and subsequently a recognized Loyalist,[8] was a member, if not the Chairman, of that Committee, there is no record of the names of those who constituted it; and, beyond the information which was contained in its title, there is quite as much obscurity surrounding the purposes for which it was created.

On Tuesday afternoon, [May 21, 1776.] as we have said, Mr. Alsop submitted the Report of the Committee;[9] and it was duly debated, with several motions for amendments, until the following Friday, [May

[1] The Continental Congress having authorized the employment of Continental troops for such a purpose, a Regiment was sent to Hempstead, for the purpose of seizing those who were disaffected to the Rebellion. The proposed victims having been disarmed, by order of the Provincial Congress, during the Winter of 1775–'6, they had no means for their defense, and, therefore, they fled and hid themselves in swamps, in woods, in barns, in hollow trees, in corn-fields, and in the marshes. Numbers took refuge in the pine barrens of Suffolk-county; others, in small boats, kept sailing about the Sound, landing in the night and sleeping in the woods, and taking to the water again in the morning. They were pursued like wolves and bears, from swamp to swamp, from one hill to another, from dale to dale, and from one copse of wood to another. Numbers were taken; some were wounded; and a few were killed—all that, too, on a peaceful, unarmed, passive community; unable to defend itself, because it had been stripped of its arms; in advance of any adverse movement; and only to promote the individual purposes of a handful of ambitious and reckless men: all that, too, in the name of "Liberty" and the "Rights of Man." [5] In the Appeal of Thomas Harriot from the decision of the General Committee of the City and County of New York, the latter of whom was, also, very evidently the Complainant in the original Case, on the sixth of June, the Provincial Congress, without any application from either party, voluntarily offered to give its aid to the Respondent, "for the attendance of "their witnesses," leaving the Appellant without any such favor. As might have been foreseen, in such an instance of pre-entertained partiality in the Appellate body, the decision which the General Committee had made in its own Case, was sustained by the Provincial Congress; and the Appeal therefrom, of Thomas Harriot, was promptly dismissed.

[7] John Alsop did not take his seat in the Provincial Congress until Monday morning, May 20th; but on Tuesday afternoon, May 21st, he presented the Report of the Committee to the Congress. The Committee, of which he was evidently the Chairman, must have been created during that brief interval.

24, 1776,] when it was approved, not, however, without several very important omissions, if the record of the approved Report may be relied on.[1] In its amended form, the Report was in the following words:

"Your Committee do report: That there is great "reason to believe that the enemies of American Liberty have a general communication with each other "through this and part of the neighbouring Colonies, "by reason whereof the influence of the British Government is much extended and the minds of the "people poisoned by false reports and suggestions.

"That many ill-disposed people have lately resorted "unto, and a great number dwell in, the southern and "eastern parts of Queens-county; that there are also "several ill-disposed persons in the City and County "of New York, and in Kings County, and in sundry "other parts of this Colony, many of whom will most "probably take up arms on the part of our foes, when-"ever they shall see a prospect of success.

"That from the various reports and the best intel-"ligence which can be obtained from Europe, as also "from the positive assertions of the disaffected through-"out this and the neighbouring Colonies, and from "such of their measures as have come to the knowl-"edge of your Committee, there is no room to doubt "that a large hostile armament will soon arrive in "this Colony.

"That the greater part of those who now hold Of-"fices and Commissions under the Crown, and many "others who are generally reputed inimical to Amer-"ican Liberty, will be liable to suffer injuries from "the resentment of the people,[2] and the Colony in "general exposed to great danger from the active ex-"ertions of those among us who are determined to "assist in the subjection of America.

"Your Committee are, therefore, of opinion that, "as well out of regard to the safety of individuals as "for the general welfare of America, it is highly and "indispensably necessary to take speedy and effectual "measures to prevent the hostile intentions of our "foes, to stop the channels of intelligence and com-"munication among the disaffected, and to quell the "spirit of opposition which hath hitherto prevailed.

"Your Committee do propose that, for these pur-"poses, the following persons be apprehended by the "assistance of the Continental troops, now stationed "in and near this City, to wit,

[The names were not entered on the Journals.]

"That a Committee be appointed to confer with the "Commander-in-chief, now here, upon the subject of "apprehending the persons above-named, and to su-"perintend the taking of them. That upon and after "the apprehension of the said persons, such of them as "shall give good and sufficient security, on oath, and "otherwise, as the said Committee shall think proper, "that they will not be concerned in any measures "taken or to be taken against the United American "Colonies, or any or either of them, and that they "will discover all measures taken or to be taken "against the said Colonies, or any or either of them, "as far as the same shall come to their knowledge, re-"spectively be permitted to go at large; and that as "to such persons as shall refuse such security, it shall "be in the discretion of the said Committee to admit "on their parol of honour, to be given to the said "Committee or to the Continental Congress, as many "of the said persons as may, in the judgment of the "said Committee, safely be trusted on their said "parol, to reside in some part of one of the neigh-"bouring Colonies, such as shall be chosen by the "said respective persons, and approved by the said "Committee; and that all such persons as, in the "opinion of the said Committee, cannot safely be "trusted on their said parol, or if to be trusted shall "refuse to give such parol, shall be reported to this "Congress, to be severally dealt with, as this Congress "shall think proper.

"That it be recommended to all the General County "Committees, in the several Counties in this Colony, "to apprehend all persons holding Military Commis-"sions under the King of Great Britain, and also all "such persons holding Civil Offices under the said "King, or, being possessed of influence in their re-"spective Counties, as are suspected of holding prin-"ciples inimical to the said United Colonies; and "after they shall have apprehended, to deal with them "in such manner as is prescribed for the conduct of "the Committee above named.

"All which is, nevertheless, most humbly sub-"mitted.

"JOHN ALSOP, Chairman."[3]

When that Report was presented, read, and approved, there were, throughout Westchester-county, the entire body of officers of the Colonial Militia, including some of the members of the Van Cortlandt and other leading families; the entire number of the King's Justices of the Peace; the entire bodies of the Court of Sessions and Court of Common Pleas, at the [1] On Tuesday afternoon, on motion of Mr. Sands, Richmond-county was ordered to be named as one which was especially proscribed; and on motion of John Morin Scott, an oath of some kind was ordered to "be "extended to all such as refused to sign the Association," to which only Gouverneur Morris, to his honor be it said, objected. On Wednesday morning, an attempt to authorize the seizure and detention of residents of Queens-county, as hostages, to secure the submission of those who were left within that County, was rejected, only Westchester and Tryon-counties having supported the proposition. "Sundry other amendments "having been made therein," an attempt to commit the mutilated paper to its parent Committee, to re-model it, was rejected. It is evident, from the final entry on the subject, that other important changes had been made during a session of the Congress, on Thursday evening; but the Journal of that Session makes no mention of any action on that subject; and on Friday morning, the amended Report, from which many peculiarly obnoxious features had been removed, was adopted.

[2] The connection of the Mobs, in the City of New-York, already referred to, with the purposes of the authors of this enactment, is distinctly seen, in these words.

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 9 ho., A.M. May 24, "1776."

head of the last-named of which was John Thomas, who is already known to the reader as, also, one of the members of the former General Assembly and as the head of that prolific family of office-holders bearing that Welsh surname; and the entire body of County Officers, including those of the Prerogative Court, the Sheriff, the County Clerk, etc. All these, together with those who were especially obnoxious and all those whose social standing did not warrant the admission of them into the first class, were to be apprehended—the more prominent by detachments of the Continental Army, the less prominent by the County Committee—and "dealt with," after a "manner" which was "prescribed for the conduct" of those under whose directions the several "apprehensions" should be made. No overt act was charged against any one: it was sufficient that "suspicions" were entertained by some one in revolutionary authority, that one of the inhabitants of the County, no matter whom, was "holding principles inimical to the "said United Colonies," whatever those "principles" might have been; and the unfortunate victim, for nothing else than his opinions' sake, was liable to be exiled or subjected to any other penalty, personal or pecuniary or both, as his captors, unrestrained by any Statute or any enactment of the revolutionary authorities, should incline to impose on him. It is not stated in the annals of that period, however, that either Major Philip Van Cortlandt or Judge John Thomas or any other of those officeholders under the Crown who were also officeholders or supporters of the Revolutionary party, sustained any injury from the provisions of that enactment.

Although there is no entry on the Journal of the Provincial Congress which makes mention of the creation of such a Committee, it is very evident the Committee was appointed, with instructions "to report a "Law or 'set of Resolutions of this Congress, to "'prevent the dangers to which this Colony is ex-"'posed by its internal enemies,'" since, on the twenty-eighth of May, such a Committee made a Report to the Congress, through John Morin Scott, who was probably its Chairman. It is not shown what that Report provided for; but Richmond-county voted against it,[1] which may afford some evidence of the character of the paper, since that County and Queens-county were always the especial objects of the resentment of those who were in rebellion, a feeling, as far as Richmond-county was concerned, which was amply reciprocated within the succeeding six weeks.

The work of proscription did not cease with the action of the Congress which has been already referred to. On the fifth of June, in the unexplained words of the Journal of that body, "the Congress proceeded to "hear the Resolutions relative to persons dangerous "and disaffected to the American cause and to per-"sons of equivocal character." There is not the slightest allusion to the origin of the Resolutions; but it is very probable they proceeded from the Committee of which John Morin Scott was the mouthpiece, to whom allusion has been made in the preceding paragraph; and, possibly, they may be the Report therein referred to. Notwithstanding the great length of these Resolutions, the notice which was taken of Westchester-county and of Westchester-county interests, in their several provisions, render it necessary that they shall find a place in this narrative. They were in these words:

"WHEREAS the Continental Congress, by their Re-"solve of the sixth day of October last, did recom-"mend to the several Provincial Assemblies, and "Conventions, and Councils or Committees of Safety, "to arrest and secure every person in their respective "Colonies, whose going at large might, in their opin-"ion, endanger the safety of the Colony or the lib-"erties of America:

"AND WHEREAS, from sundry informations and "evidences exhibited to this Congress, it appears "that the enemies of American Liberty, in this and "the neighbouring Colonies, have a general com-"munication with each other, by reason whereof "the influence of the British Ministry, however "feeble, is, in some measure, sustained, and the "minds of the people frequently alarmed and poi-"soned by false reports and misrepresentations, pur-"posely framed and propagated with design to pro-"mote the views and machinations of the enemies of "America.

"AND WHEREAS certain persons in Queens-county, "Kings-county, the City and County of New York, "Richmond-county, and Westchester-county have "been represented to this Congress as disaffected to "the American cause, and, together with others in "various parts of this Colony who, having little or no "property in it, or regard for its Rights, may be in-"fluenced, by the hope of plunder and confiscation, "to take an active part with our enemies, whenever "it may, in their opinions, be done with success:

"AND WHEREAS, from various reports and the best "intelligence which could be obtained from Europe, "as well as from the positive assertions of the dis-"affected throughout this and the neighbouring Col-"onies, there is great reason to expect that an hostile "armament will soon arrive in this Colony, whereby "it hath become highly expedient and necessary to "provide that the inhabitants of this Colony, while "employed in repelling a foreign invasion, be not "injured or annoyed by domestic enemies:

"hereby are authorized and required to cause such "persons to be summoned or apprehended, as they "may think proper, and to proceed against them, in "the same manner as is herein before directed, with "respect to the persons herein particularly mentioned.

"AND WHEREAS employing detachments of the "Militia of this Colony, in arresting the said persons, "will not only be expensive, but the assembling of "them may alarm the suspicions of the said persons "and their adherents, and, thereby, tend to defeat "the design of these Resolutions; and as the Con-"tinental troops quartered in and near the said three "Counties of New-York, Queens, and Richmond, may "be employed in the said business, with little trouble "to themselves and with greater prospect of success:

"RESOLVED, THEREFORE, That the said Committee "be and they hereby are authorized to confer with "the Commander-in-Chief of the said troops, and to "request of him such detachments of them as may be "necessary for the purpose aforesaid; and that he "give orders that the said detachments, while so em-"ployed, be under the direction of the said Committee "or of discreet persons to be by them appointed.

"AND WHEREAS there may be, and doubtless are, "in other Counties of this Colony, divers dangerous "persons at present unknown to this Congress:

"RESOLVED, That it be recommended to the Com-"mittees of all Counties in this Colony, to be vigilant, "and to use their utmost endeavours, from time to "time, to discover and summon or apprehend them, "in like manner as herein before described with "respect to the persons hereby ordered to be arrested, "and to report their proceedings therein to the Con-"gress of this Colony for the time being.

"AND WHEREAS it may often happen that the "Committees of Towns and other districts in a County "may discover many dangerous persons whom it would "be proper, immediately, to secure, in which case an "application to the County Committee would not only "be attended with great delay, but would also afford "such dangerous persons an opportunity to escape:

"RESOLVED, THEREFORE, That the said Commit-"tees of the different Towns and Districts in the "several Counties in this Colony be and they hereby "are authorized and required to cause all persons "whom they may esteem dangerous and disaffected to "appear before them, either by arrest or summons, as "the said Committees, in their discretion, may think "proper, and take from the said persons respectively, "good and sufficient security to appear before the "General Committee of the County, at such time and "place as they shall order him to attend, and, then "and there, to answer such matters as shall, before "the said General Committee, be alleged against him; "and, on refusal to give such security, to commit to "safe custody the said person or persons so refusing, "until the next meeting of the said General Com-"mittee, with whom the accusation against the said "dangerous and disaffected person or persons ought, "forthwith, to be lodged by the Committee of the "Town or District by whom they may be apprehended, "summoned, or committed, as aforesaid.

"AND WHEREAS there is, in this Colony, divers "persons who, by reason of their holding Offices from "the King of Great Britain, from their having neg-"lected or refused to associate with their fellow citi-"zens, for the defence of their common Rights, from "their having never manifested, by their conduct, a "zeal for and attachment to the American cause, or "from their having maintained an equivocal neutral-"ity, have been considered by their countrymen in a "suspicious light, whereby it hath become necessary, "as well for the safety as for the satisfaction of the "people, who, in times so dangerous and critical, are "naturally led to consider those as their enemies who "withhold from them their aid and influence:

"RESOLVED, That the following persons, who are "generally supposed to come under the above descrip-"tion, to wit:

[1] Thomas Jones, one of the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the Colony, was the author of that exceedingly valuable History of New York during the Revolutionary War, to which so many references are made, in this narrative. His wife, Anne, was the third daughter of Chief-justice and Lieutenant-governor James De Lancey, which was largely the ground of his offence before the leaders of the Rebellion.

[2] The smallness of the list of the proscribed in Westchester-county may, probably, be accounted for by the fact that Judge Thomas, and Major Van Cortlandt, and the greater number of the Colonial Office-holders, in that County, were masquerading, locally, with the revolutionary party.

[3] Solomon Fowler appears to have been of Eastchester.

[4] Richard Morris was the Judge of the Colonial Court of Admiralty the jurisdiction of which extended over Connecticut, New York, and New Jersey. His father had occupied the place, before him; he had occupied it since August 2, 1762; and he was, also, Clerk of the Courts of Nisi Prius and General Jail Delivery. He was a brother of Lewis Morris, the Delegate in the Continental Congress, and of Staats Long Morris, an officer in the Royal Army, and husband of the Dowager Duchess of Gordon; and Gouverneur Morris was his half-brother. He was, also, the grandfather of Lewis G. Morris, of Fordham Heights.

Although he was classed, in these Resolutions, among those who occupied "an equivocal neutrality"—he preferred to retain his hold on the Royal Treasury as long as possible; and the studied denunciation of him, in these Resolutions, was admirably adapted to secure the steady payment of his Salary and Fees, and to secure the family estates, in case the Rebellion should be suppressed—just eight weeks after the presentation of this Report, he was appointed, by the same Provincial Congress who had received and adopted this formidable series of Resolutions, to the Bench of the new-formed revolutionary Court of Admiralty; and, three years subsequently, when John Jay ceased to be Chief-justice of the new State, this Richard Morris was appointed to succeed him, in that honorable and influential position. He held the latter office until September, 1790.

The controlling power among the revolutionary elements, in the Colony as well as in the new-formed State, was not slow to reward the Morris family with offices and emoluments; and the latter was equally watchful of its own interests, in accepting whatever was offered.

[1] Of these, Gouverneur Morris and Lewis Graham were from Westchester-county; Henry Remsen and Joseph Hallett were from the City and County of New York; John Ten Broeck was from Albany-county; John Haring was from Orange-county; and Thomas Tredwell was from Suffolk. Subsequently, as will be seen hereafter, Henry Remsen was excused from serving on the Committee; and John Jay, of the City and County of New York, and John Sloss Hobart, of Suffolk, were added to it. At a still later date, Philip Livingston, of the City and County of New York, was also added; and Leonard Gansevoort, of Albany-county, was substituted for John Ten Broeck. After the Committee had become organized, John Haring retired from it, Thomas Randall, of New York, taking his place. A few days before the Congress was disbanded, Joseph Hallett left the Committee.

"Resolutions into execution severally take an oath, "diligently, impartially, without fear, favour, affec- "tion, or hope of reward, to execute and discharge "the duties imposed on them, by the aforegoing "Resolutions.

"RESOLVED, That the said Committee appoint "such persons as they may think proper, to repair to "the said Counties [1] to inquire for and procure the "witnesses against the persons herein directed to be "arrested or summoned to appear, and give evidence "against the said persons, before the said Committee; "and that the said persons be paid for their trouble at "the rate of fifteen shillings for each day they shall "respectively be employed on that service; and that "the witnesses they may direct to attend, as afore- "said, be paid their reasonable expenses for travelling "charges and subsistence, to be certified and allowed "by the said Committee; which Certificate shall be "a Warrant to the Treasurer of this Congress, to pay "the persons in whose favour such Certificate shall "be given, the sum or sums therein allowed, as afore- "said." [2]

On the fourteenth [3] and fifteenth of June,[4] those who were members of the Committee, took the oath required of them; on the last-named day, John McKesson, who was one, the principal one, of the Secretaries of the Provincial Congress, was made the Secretary of the Committee, also; [5] and, with a full retinue of Assistant-secretaries, Messengers, Door-keepers, and other Officers,[6] on the same day, Philip Livingston, Joseph Hallett, John Jay, Thomas Tredwell, Gouverneur Morris, Lewis Graham, and Leonard Gansevoort—Livingston, Jay, and Gansevoort having been meanwhile added to the Committee—being present, the Committee proceeded to the discharge of the duties which had been laid on it.[7]

This secretly acting, inquisitorial body, of which John Jay was made the Chairman, held secret sessions on the fifteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, and twenty-ninth of June,[8] beyond which period we do not propose, at this time, to follow it; and on the following day, when the Provincial Congress itself was disbanded and fled, every member of this mighty Committee, with the single exception of Gouverneur Morris, had, also, left the City.[9] Besides receiving an anonymous information that William Sutton, of Mamaroneck, had been heard to say "that, in case "Independency was declared by the Continental Con- "gress, there were three Colonels in the Service who "would join the Ministerial Party;" [10] and the issue of Summonses to Frederic Philipse, of Yonkers, Richard Morris, of Scarsdale, and Samuel Merritt, of the Manor of Cortlandt, to appear and answer before the Committee, on the third of July; the issue of similar Summonses to Solomon Fowler, of Eastchester, Nathaniel Underhill, of Westchester, and James Horton, Junior, and William Sutton, both of Mamaroneck, to appear and answer, on the fourth of July; the issue of similar Summonses to Peter Corne and Doctor Peter Huggeford, both of Westchester-county, to appear and answer, on the fifth of July; and the issue of similar Summonses to William Barker, Joshua Purdy, and Absalom Gedney, all of Westchester-county, to appear and answer, on the sixth of July,[11] the Committee appears to have done nothing which particularly concerned Westchester-county, during the period now under consideration; and, for the present, its doings are dismissed.[12] It may not be

[1] It appears from the words in the text, that Richmond, Kings, Queens, New York, and Westchester-counties were all which were to be favored with the attention of that revolutionary Inquisition; and, as far as the proceedings of that infamous body have been permitted to be exposed to the scrutiny of honest and earnest inquirers, no evidence appears that residents of other Counties were subjected to its despotic practices.

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., June "5, 1776."

There are internal evidences, in the two papers, that the Resolutions which the Provincial Congress had adopted, on the twenty-fourth of May (page 342, ante) and those which are now under consideration, were written by the same hand; and there is evidence which cannot be misunderstood, that that hand was not John Jay's, as some have supposed, but Gouverneur Morris's. It is true that Doctor Sparks made no mention of the subject, in his Life of Gouverneur Morris—it was not his purpose to expose the weaknesses and the wrong doings of his aristocratic and pretentious subject, but to magnify the man and his doings, and to eulogize them—and all those who have preceded us in narrating the events of that period, have, also, preferred to know nothing of this infamous enactment and of its consequences; but it was really enacted, in New York, for the promotion of the purposes of intended confiscations of individual and family properties; and, unquestionably, Gouverneur Morris was the author of it, and one of the master-spirits in the execution of its provisions.

Of the Minutes of the Meetings referred to in the text—and, in this place, we do not propose to refer to any of subsequent dates—carefully made copies, from the scattered originals, have been examined, in every instance.

On that day, Judge Jones, who had been summoned before the Committee and had come to the City of New York, to answer the Summons, found only Gouverneur Morris; and by the latter, he was paroled and permitted to return to his home, in Queens-county.

[12] Those who are interested in the methods of this Committee, the subsequently much eulogized Chief-justice of the State of New York and Chief-justice of the United States being the presiding officer, may see the forms of its Summons and its Parole, in Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, ii., 295, 296; the forms of its Warrants, in its Minutes of June 19, 22, and 24, 1776; and those of its various Bonds, in its Minutes of June 24, 25, 26, and 27, 1776.

The future eulogists of John Jay and Gouverneur Morris may advanimproper for us to state, however, that, thirteen days after its sessions were interrupted, in the general panic which was produced by General Howe's arrival, there remained twenty-seven prisoners, confined in the cells in the City Hall, and forty-three, including the Mayor of the City, in those of the new Jail.[1]

It would appear incredible that such a relentless spirit of partisan bitterness could have been entertained, at such a time, in such a body as the Provincial Congress of New York; but the records of the Congress which clearly avowed such bitterness, and those of the Committee which it created for the purpose of executing its malignant enactments, to say nothing of the unwritten and other informal testimony of the terrorism which was at once revived, and the renewed activity, in persecution, of every petty Precinct, District, and Town Committee, all bear ample testimony to the fact that personal animosities and partisan malignity had so entirely overwhelmed the reason and the judgment and the humanity of the aristocratic leaders of the Rebellion, in their haughty demands for uniformity of opinion as well as of practice, in religion as well as in politics,[2] that not even the near approach of an avowed and powerful enemy nor the severely pressing necessity of preparing to receive and to successfully oppose that not distant enemy could check their headlong and reckless work of arousing those, among themselves, victims of their former oppression and plunder and outrage—many of whom, nevertheless, would have remained passive spectators of the struggle—and of forcing them, in retaliation and self-defence, to become earnest and active, if not desperate, belligerents, on the side and in support of the Crown.

As portions of the general subject of proscription, mention may be properly made, in this place, of two or three instances which occurred in Westchester-county.

It appears that it had become the practise of several of the local Committees—those in Westchester-county, in some instances, having been of the number—of sending those who were offensive to them, without the slightest authority, revolutionary or conservative, to the Forts in the Highlands, which were then garrisoned with Continental troops, "with orders "to the commanding Officers to keep them at hard "labor, until further orders," no matter what the disability of the victims to sustain such hardships may have been—a process concerning the propriety of which even General Putnam, who was then the Officer in command of the Army, in the absence of General Washington, entertained some very reasonable and very clearly expressed doubts;[3] and the Provincial Congress, in consequence of those doubts and of other considerations, was constrained to countermand those portions of the commitments to those Forts, which had imposed hard labor on the prisoners.[4]

Another instance of that spirit of persecution was seen in the movement of Egbert Benson, one of those who were controlled more by their haughty and ill-controlled wills than by any enactment of Committee or Congress or by any requirement of personal or political integrity, for the employment of a local force, in the service and pay of the Colony, for the purpose of "keeping the peace and order and to suppress the "disaffected in Duchess-county."[5] The "requisi-"tion," for by that expressive word the call of Benson was then known, was duly referred to the Deputations from Duchess, Westchester, and Ulster-counties, for consideration and report—Gouverneur Morris, Samuel Haviland, Jonathan G. Tompkins, and Lewis Graham, representing Westchester-county;[6] and, on the following day, that Committee recommended the employment of one hundred men in Duchess-county and fifty men in Westchester-county, "the said men "to be raised in the said Counties respectively, and "confined to the service of those Counties, and to "continue in pay until the first day of November "next, unless sooner discharged by this or a future "Congress."[7]

There appears to have been a serious opposition to the adoption of the Report, New York City and County leading in the opposition, but it was, nevertheless, adopted;[8] and, two days afterwards, [June 22, 1776,] tageously read, from these Minutes, what those distinguished lawyers were capable of doing, judicially, when they were within closed and closely guarded doors; what they, then, regarded as offences before the law; the methods which they adopted, in their inquisitorial process; and what their judgments were and what penalties they inflicted..

With these instances of the capabilities of those two men before us, we have been enabled to understand, more clearly than ever before, some of actions of the Chief Justice and of the Ambassador which, previously, had needed additional explanation.

[2] It will be remembered that the opinions of its victims, on questions of Law, of Legislation, and of Political Economy, were regarded as matters of offence, even where no act which was obnoxious had been charged against them; and that, for those opinions, only, in many instances, those victims were subjected to punishment. It will be remembered, also, that the leaders of the Rebellion assumed the right of determining when and in what manner religious services should be conducted by the Churches, in the Colonies, and those for whom Churches and individuals should and should not offer their prayers to Almighty God. In Connecticut, every Episcopalian Church, except one, was closed, because the Clergy would not submit to the requirements concerning their prayers to God; and in that single exception, the courageous preacher maintained his relations with his Master, notwithstanding the opposition; and the cowards did not seriously disturb him.

after various manipulations, in a second Committee,[1] by "one of the Secretaries,"[2] and by the Congress itself,[3] the subject was disposed of, in a series of Resolutions, which, it is said, "were unanimously ap-'proved of."

As that entire subject relates to the local history of Westchester-county, at that period, and to the establishment of a military police force, in that County, evidently for the more effectual prosecution of the proposed operations of the recently created "Committee to detect Conspiracies" among the peaceable conservative residents of that County—as no complaint had been made, by any one, of the slightest breach of the peace, in that County, and as its local County Committee had made no application for the establishment of such a military police force, for any purpose, there can be no doubt that, as far as the Company in Westchester-county was concerned, the project was a creation of the Deputation from that County, and for no other purpose than that of assisting the "Committee to Detect Conspiracies," of which Committee two members of that Delegation were also members, in harrying the conservative farmers of the County, in the interest of "the cause of America" and that of the leaders of the Rebellion, in New York—for these reasons, the Resolutions may properly find a place in this narrative. They were in these words:

"WHEREAS, there are sundry disaffected and dan-"gerous persons, in the Counties of Dutchess and "Westchester, who do now greatly disturb the peace "of the said Counties, and will most probably take up "arms, whensoever the enemy shall make a descent "upon this Colony, to the great annoyance of the said "Counties, in particular, and of others the good peo-"ple of this Colony:

"AND WHEREAS, by reason of the several drafts "which have been made in the said Counties, accord-"ing to the late recommendation of the Continental "Congress, the Militia thereof are rendered incapable "of keeping peace and order in the said Counties, "without great inconvenience to themselves and much "injury to and neglect of their private property; and, "inasmuch as the interest of this Colony may be ma-"terially affected by any dissentions which may pre-"vail in the said Counties, while the Continental "troops are engaged in the defence of those Counties "more immediately exposed to the inroads of the "enemy: therefore

"RESOLVED, That one hundred men, Officers in-"cluded, be raised in Dutchess-county, and that fifty "men, Officers included, be raised in Westchester-"county, and taken into the pay and service of this "Congress, and confined to the service of those Coun-"ties, and to continue in pay until the first day of "November next, unless sooner discharged by this or "a future Congress of this Colony:

"That the one hundred men to be raised in Dutch-"ess-county be divided into two Companies, each "Company to consist of one Captain, one Lieutenant, "three Sergeants, three Corporals, one Fifer, one "Drummer, and forty Privates; and that the fifty "men to be raised in Westchester-county consist of "one Captain, one Lieutenant, three Sergeants, three "Corporals, one Fifer, one Drummer, and forty Pri-"vates; that the pay of those three Companies be "the same as the pay of the Continental troops; that "the Captains be allowed eighteen shillings each, "per week; the Lieutenants be allowed twelve shil-"lings each, per week; and the Sergeants, Corporals, "Fifers, Drummers, and Privates, eight shillings "each, per week, in lieu of all rations and subsistence:

"That Melancton Smith be appointed Captain of "one of the said Companies to be raised in Dutchess-"county; and that John Durlin be appointed Cap-"tain of the other; and that Micah Townsend be "appointed Captain of the said Company to be raised "in Westchester-county:

"That the General Committees of the said Coun-"ties be authorized to nominate and appoint the "Subaltern Officers to the said Companies, in their "Counties, respectively:

"That the said three Companies be deemed one "Corps; and that Melancton Smith be Captain Com-"mandant; that Micah Townsend be the second "Captain in rank; and that John Durlin be the "third Captain in rank, in the said Corps:

"That the General Committees of the said Coun-"ties be authorized and requested to appoint a Mus-"ter-master in their respective Counties, to muster "the said Companies; and that they transmit the "names of such Muster-masters to the Committee "appointed to audit the accounts of this Congress, "without delay:

"That the said three Companies be subject to the "order and direction of the General Committee of "their respective Counties or such other person or "persons as this or a future Congress of this Colony "shall direct.

"ORDERED, That a certified copy of the aforesaid "Resolutions be transmitted to the General Commit-"tees of Dutchess and Westchester-counties. And "ORDERED, That Commissions be immediately "issued to the Captains, and that blank Commissions "be sent to the said Committees, to be by them issued "to the Lieutenants."

It will be seen that no provisions were made by the Provincial Congress for either the recruiting, or the equipment, or the quarters, or the transportation of these men; and there will be some among the readers of this narrative who will say that if fifty unarmed, scattered men, on foot, could surely ensure the peace of so large and so widely extended a community as Colonial Westchester-county—and if those men could not surely preserve that peace, their appointment were useless—the inhabitants of that County could not have been as "dangerous" and its peace could not have been as "greatly disturbed" as the authors and promoters of these Resolutions had falsely pretended, among the recitals of their Preamble: others will suspect, not without reason, that the entire movement was a purely political job, gotten up for the purpose of affording political sop, at the expense of the Colony, for hungry adherents of the Bensons and the Morrise—suspicions which would be well-founded, since neither of the Duchess-county Companies were subsequently known in history, exceptthrough the requisition on the Treasurer of the Colony, for their Pay and Subsistence;[1] while the Westchester-county Company, without having become known to history, in its capacity of an armed police, is known, in the military annals of the State,[2] for having done nothing else than changed its Lieutenant,[3] for asking for greater Pay,[4] and for drawing the Pay which was legitimately due to it.[5]

Another instance of the spirit of partisan bitterness which prevailed, at that time, in Westchester-county, and of the unholy zeal with which the Town Committees urged forward the work of persecution and plunder, among their conservative neighbors, may be seen in the following note which was addressed by the Chairman of the Committee of the Town of Salem, in that County—that Committee which, a short time previously, had laid an embargo on Cattle intended for the supply of the inhabitants of the City of New York[6]—to the Provincial Congress:

"To the Honble. the Provincial Congress,
"New York:

"The Committee of Salem, in Westchester-county, "have the unhappiness of having a large number of "the inhabitants very much opposed to the measures "of the United Colonies, and numbers of them are "determined not to comply nor adopt the doings of "the Congress, which makes a great deal of trouble "for said Committee. Said Committee has adver-"tised some, obliged others to give bonds, some of "one or two hundred pounds, some of which have "forfeited their bonds and run off, and have made "considerable costs, one in particular, in sending "after him. We desire to know what shall be done "with the forfeitures, and likewise how to proceed in "taking of it, and how to turn it into money if taken "in stock or whatever else, or whether or no the Con-"gress wont take the forfeitures and pay the cost; "we desire you would give us some rules and direc-"tions how to proceed. And likewise, those men "that still behave inimical, and put the Committees "to so much trouble, whether or no we might not "take cost of them to pay us what is reasonable for

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, Novr. 1, 1776, 4 "o'clock, P.M."

[2] The only allusion to military duty discharged by this Company, which we have found, is that Order of the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-fifth of July, "that Captain Townsend of Westchester-county "return to duty, with his Company, at the mouth of Croton-river and "such places adjacent as the Officer or Officers commanding the Ameri "can troops or Militia, there, shall direct," (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Thursday morning, July 25, 1776;") which was certainly beyond the line of duties for which it had been specifically raised.

[3] The County Committee, agreeably to the Resolutions of the Provincial Congress, presented in the text, appointed Samuel Townsend to the Lieutenantcy of this Company. Subsequently, Lieutenant Townsend was promoted to the command of another Company; and, on the sixteenth of August, Zephania Miller was appointed to the vacant Lieutenantcy, (The General Committee of Westchester-county to the Convention of the State, "August 16, 1776;" Journal of the Provincial Convention, "Die Veneris, "9 ho., A.M., August 16, 1776.")

"That the Honorable the Provincial Congress of this Colony when "they gave Instructions for raising Captn Townsend's Company allowed "the Lieutenant 12s. per week, and the non commissioned officers and "privates 8s. per week in lieu of Rations and Subsistance.

"That at and near the White Plains (which is the head Quarters of "the Company) the allowance for their subsistance does not amount to "near enough to support them, they being unable to get victuals for "less than 1s. per Meal, or to hire their Board at any tolerable rate but "by the week; that your Petitioners entered the Company & Did duty "in the most busy season of the year before & during Harvest time & "have had a harder share of duty than the Troops who were allowed by "your honorable House 20 Dollars Bounty & who have generally "received near 40 Dollars.

That letter was laid before the Provincial Congress, on Saturday evening, the eighth of June; and the Journal of that body states that it was "read and "filed,"[2] the Congress itself, as will be seen in its subsequent proceedings in the matter, hesitating, in view of its atrocious propositions, to give the authority which its writer had so unblushingly solicited.

With the fact before him, that the "large number "of the inhabitants" of the Town of Salem which was referred to, in that letter, was composed of farmers, neighbors of the writer of it, and peacefully and industriously pursuing their usual vocations; and, with the additional fact before him, that none of these were even pretended to have committed any other offense, against either the King or the Congress, than the entertainment of political opinions which were different from those entertained by Ezekiel Hawley and his handful of "patriotic" confederates, thereader will be enabled to judge, with some degree of accuracy, concerning the really diabolical character of the letter and that of him who had written it.

The number of those who were thus proscribed and whose properties were so eagerly hankered for, was said to have been "large;" the proposed victims were "inhabitants" of Salem, and neighbors of Hawley and his confederates; they were quietly pursuing their usual rural occupations, doing no harm to any one, and violating no law, although their opinions, on partisan political questions, were not in accord with those which the latter professed to hold; both, at the same time, concurring, however, in the recognition of the King of Great Britain as their legitimate Sovereign; both professing to be equally and entirely good and loyal subjects of that reigning Monarch; both owing obedience to the Laws of the Land; and both, alike, recognizing the duty of that obedience,[3] although only one of the two discharged that duty, in its every day practice. Against those unoffending farmers—as their accusers have shown, they were nothing else—with a malignant zeal which betrayed its selfish, puritanic origin, the writer of that letter prayed that they should be arrested; that their properties, real and personal, should be seized, and escheated, and confiscated; that "costs" should be paid, therefrom, into the willing hands of those who should have thus invaded their individual Rights—Rights which had been guaranteed to each of them, by the Constitution and the Laws of the land—that their homes should be violated and destroyed; that their families should be made beggars, and be cast penniless on the world; and that, except among those who thus sought warrants to become local despots, nothing else than individual and domestic misery and general devastation and ruin should be aimed at and obtained. Can anything more atrocious be conceived? Can those who could calmly and deliberately devise such outrages, to be inflicted on a peaceful community, and that community their own immediate neighbors and townsmen, be regarded as anything else than monstrosities, in human form, in which only the baser and most brutal passions had found places? But, after all, these—the letter and the passions which had inspired it and the hand which had written it—were only the legitimate outcome of the barbarous propositions which John Jay and Gouverneur Morris and their partisan associates, taking advantage of a short period of peculiar anxiety and of labors of more than usual variety and importance, had led the jaded and almost exhausted Provincial Congress, it may

[1] Mr. Bolton said this Hawley was a grandson of Rev. Thomas Hawley, Paster of the Congregational-church at Ridgefield, Connecticut; that he was one of the proprietors of the Oblong; that he held a Commission in the Continental Army; and that he was taken off by death, suddenly, in 1788. (History of Westchester-county, original edition, i., 474; the same, second edition, i., 738.)

The "Continental" Commission referred to, by Mr. Bolton, was nothing else than that of First Lieutenant in Captain Truesdale's Company of Colonial Militia, "for the North End of Salem"—a local Company of notoriously very little account, (Returns of Election of Officers, December 18, 1775, in the Historical Manuscripts, etc: Military Returns, xxvii., 245.)

[3] "To do justice even to rebels, let it here be mentioned that * * * Nay, "so far were they from interfering with the law, that the Magistrates "continued in full possession of the Civil powers and the Courts of Jus- "tice were open in the usual manner until the Declaration of Indepen- "dence. In April Term, 1776, several rebel soldiers were indicted for "some Petty Larcenies, tried, convicted, and punished by order of the "Court without any interference of the Military; their Officers at- "tended the trials, heard the evidence, and upon their conviction de- "clared that ample justice was done them, and thanked the Judge for "his candor and impartiality, during the course of the trials."—Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 137.

Judge Jones, the writer of the above paragraph, was, at that time, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the Colony, and personally acquainted with the facts stated. His practice was, in matters in which he was personally concerned, to mention no name; and the context certainly seems to indicate that the Trial was in the City of New York; but the learned Editor of that remarkable work, has stated, in the Index, (ii., 691.) undoubtedly on competent authority, that the Court referred to was held at the White Plains, in Westchester-county; and that the presiding Judge of that Court was Thomas Jones, the writer of the work from which this paragraph was taken.

have been unwittingly, to establish as the formal enactments of that revolutionary body.[1]

As we have said, the letter which Ezekiel Hawley, in behalf of the Committee of the Town of Salem, wrote to the Provincial Congress, was laid before that body, on Saturday evening, the eighth of June; when it was read and filed.[2] On the following morning, [Sunday, June 9, 1775,] the Congress directed the following answer to be made to that remarkable letter:

"IN PROVINCIAL CONGRESS,
"NEW-YORK, June 9, 1776.

"SIR:

"Your letter by Mr. Chapman, of the 5th inst., was "laid before the Congress, who are of opinion that "the contents require the most serious consideration, "and have directed me to acquaint you that whenever "several matters of importance for the general defense "and preservation of the Colony, now under consider- "ation, are despatched, the Committee of Salem may "be assured a proper attention will be made on their "application, the Congress not doubting that Commit- "tee will still persevere, with zeal in the cause of "their country.

"By order,
"NATHANIEL WOODHULL, President.

"To EZEKIEL HAWLEY, ESQR., Chairman
"of the Committee of Salem, Westchester."[3]

Had Gouverneur Morris or John Jay been present, when the Provincial Congress received or when it answered that letter, the answer would probably have been of a different tenor; but John Morin Scott, who was present on both occasions, and whose master mind probably controlled, wisely halted, and evidently induced the Congress to halt, in the work of proposed persecution and devastation and ruin. The Committee of Salem was coldly dismissed, without even a word of sympathy; and the Provincial Congress paid no further attention to the subject.

With a persistency which was worthy of a better purpose, notwithstanding the rebuke which the Provincial Congress had thus administered, the Committee at Salem was not disposed to be thus relegated to the obscurity of a rural Town; and, subsequently, two other letters, relating to the same general subject of "the disaffected persons who were under bonds to "that Committee," were addressed by it, to the Congress. The first of these letters is in these words:

"GENTLEMEN:

"As our civil and religious privileges all lie at "stake, we that are friends thereto desire to lend a "lifting hand in trying to preserve them; and as the "tories grow more and more disaffected, and are daily "going off on to Long island—four men last week "from my neighborhood, several more from other "parts, Capt. Theal and his son John Lobdin, and "Stephen Delance" [De Lancey ?] "some of them "laid under £500. bonds and also the solemnity of an "oath—but they regard not any thing the Commit- "tee does with them, so long as they have their lib- "erty. It is supposed numbers are concealed on "Long island. Please to take it into your wise con- "sideration, whether or no it will not be best to send "and purge Long island; and as I wrote to you a "little back by Mr. Chapman, one of the members of "Salem Committee, to know what we should do with "those that forfeit their bonds, and how we should "get pay for the last, as there is since many more, we "should be glad of an answer.

"By order of the Committee,
"EZEKIEL HAWLEY, Chairman.

"SALEM, June 22d, 1776.

"To THE HONOURABLE THE PROVINCIAL CONGRESS "OF NEW-YORK."[4]

Two days after that letter was written, [June 24, 1776,] the Sub-committees of Cortlandt and Salem united in the following letter, also addressed to the Provincial Congress; and in order to expedite the consideration of the subject to which it was devoted, by that body, Ezekiel Hawley was formally directed to forward it, "with all convenient speed."

"SALEM, 24th of June, 1776.

"GENTLEMEN:

"Whereas sundry persons of note have lately ab- "sconded from our part of the country, and we have "reason to think, from several circumstances, are "(with numbers of others) assembling together on

[1] The question of the extent to which the several Provincial Congresses, uninfluenced by the outside pressure of homemade partisan demonstrations or by the inside domination of those who assumed to social or intellectual superiority, would have given their authority for the enactment and execution of such violent measures, against those of their fellow Colonists who did not concur in all which was done by the Continental Congress of 1774, as we have noticed, is worthy of the examination which it will some day receive at the hands of an intelligent, industrious, and fearless student.

If we do not mistake, and we incline to the belief that we do not, when that examination shall have been made, very much of the responsibility for the multitude of atrocious acts which were done in behalf of "the cause of America" and of "the Liberties of America," will be shifted from the shoulders of sensible, but modest and less energetic, men, where it now rests, to those of men who are now represented as having been incapable of such enormities.

History tells of more than one instance in which a mere handful of enthusiasts, more or less honest in their professions, has fastened itself on a great political party which entertained none of those enthusiastic dogmas which the others assumed to believe and maintain, and which, having thus fastened itself on the larger body, taking advantage of favorable opportunities, artfully adapting itself to existing tempers and circumstances, and persistently—sometimes, impudently—thrusting itself into every seat of influence and authority to which it could possibly gain access, has succeeded in re-moulding the policy of the party which it has invaded; and made it appear to be what, originally, it was not; to maintain opinions which, originally, it disclaimed and opposed; and to do, or permit to be done, in its name, what, originally, it would have honestly shrunk from, as improper and unjust. Such an instance, if we do not mistake, occurred in this Colony, in 1775 and 1776: we were personally acquainted with a similar instance, vastly more important in its consequences than the other, which occurred within the United States, at a comparatively recent date.

"TO THE HONOURABLE THE PROVINCIAL CONGRESS."[1]

These two letters were presented to the Provincial Congress, on the afternoon of the twenty-fourth of June; read before that body; and ordered "to remain "for further consideration;"[2] and there, as far as we have knowledge, they have remained, from that day until this—the Provincial Congress certainly paid no further attention to them.

Closely connected with it, if it was not really the basis of that policy of proscription and persecution and devastation which peculiarly distinguished the entire series of Provincial Congresses and Committees of Safety of the Colony of New York, as well as the early Conventions and Legislatures of the State, after the Colony had ceased to exist, was the series of Tests, known as Associations, which were enacted, first, by the Continental Congress of 1774 and, subsequently, in various forms, by the Provincial Congresses of New York, by the latter of whom and by their several Committees of Safety they were, also, rigidly enforced, as we have seen, in other portions of this narrative.

One of these Tests, or Associations, adopted by a Provincial Committee of Safety, was proved to have been so entirely subversive of the personal Rights of those to whom it was offered, that numbers who had previously favored or acquiesced in the Rebellion, peremptorily declined to sign it, preferring rather to be considered as disaffected and to be disarmed, as such,[3] and to suffer all the other pains and penalties and insults to which those who were known as "disaffected" were continually subjected.

The disaffection referred to must have been quite extended, seriously impairing the prospects of a political uniformity throughout the Colony, to which the leaders of the Rebellion had constantly aspired, or the Provincial Congress would not have turned aside from its daily routine to have noticed it. As it had reached those proportions which entitled it to respect, however, on the eighteenth of June, three days after the organization of "the Committee to detect Conspiracies," the Provincial Congress adopted the following Resolution, on the subject:

"WHEREAS doubts have arisen respecting the true "construction of a certain Association ordered by the "late Committee of Safety of this Colony, to be presented for subscription to the inhabitants thereof:

"RESOLVED, That all doubts respecting the true "construction of the said Association ought to be removed; and that a Committee be appointed to "prepare and report a Resolution for that purpose."[4]

On the twentieth of June, the Committee which had been appointed to consider the subject—a Committee composed of Thomas Tredwell and John Sloss Hobart, of Suffolk, and John Jay, of the City of New York, all of whom were distinguished for their rigid and intense partisan feelings—submitted its Report, evidently the work of John Jay, by whom it was presented. As it was intended to be submitted to the inhabitants of Westchester-county, and to be employed as the basis of fresh outrages against their persons and properties, it may properly find a place in this narrative:

"IN PROVINCIAL CONGRESS,
"NEW-YORK, June 20, 1776.

"WHEREAS, the Continental Congress, on the "fourteenth day of March last, did recommend to the "several Assemblies, Conventions, and Councils or "Committees of Safety of the United Colonies, immediately to cause all persons to be disarmed within "their respective Colonies, who were notoriously disaffected to the cause of America, or had not associated, and refused to associate to defend, by arms, "these United Colonies, against the hostile attempts "of the British Fleets and Armies:

"AND, WHEREAS, the late Committee of Safety of "this Colony did, thereupon, on the twenty-seventh "day of March aforesaid, recommend it to the Committees of the several Cities, Counties, Manors, "Townships, Precincts, and Districts in this Colony, "forthwith, to cause to be disarmed, all persons "within their respective districts, who were known "to be disaffected to the cause of America, and also "all such persons as should refuse to sign the following Association, viz.:

"'We, the subscribers, inhabitants of . . . . ,
"'in the County of . . . . . , and Colony
"'of New York, do voluntarily and solemnly engage,
"'under all the ties held sacred among mankind, at "'the risk of our lives and fortunes, to defend, by "'arms, the United American Colonies, against the "'hostile attempts of the British Fleets and Armies, "'until the present unhappy controversy between "'the two Countries shall be settled.'

[3] Recital in the Preamble of the new Association, adopted by the Provincial Congress, on the twentieth of June, 1776.

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Tuesday morning, June 18, 1776."

"AND WHEREAS it hath been objected to the said "form of an Association, that, by obliging the sub- "scribers or associators, in such general and express "terms, to defend the United Colonies, by arms, "against the hostile attempts of the British Fleets "and Armies, it deprived them of the Rights reserved "by the Militia Regulations, and imposed on them the "necessity of marching to the most distant of the "Colonies, whenever called upon, which construction "of the said Association, however nice and casuistical, "is inconsistent and fallacious, it being manifest that "the Militia Regulations could, by no rules of construc- "tion, be supposed to be repealed and abrogated by "any subtle implications drawn from the said Associ- "tion. But, as some of the friends to the American "cause have been influenced, by this objection, to "refuse signing the said Association, and, in conse- "quence thereof, been disarmed, it hath become ex- "pedient that the said Association should be so ex- "plained as to render it free from specious as well as "solid objections; and, therefore,

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, That nothing in the "said Association contained, shall extend or be con- "strued to extend to deprive those who have sub- "scribed it of any Rights reserved to them, in and by "the said Militia Regulations; and to the end that all "the Freemen of this Colony may associate for the "preservation of American liberty, in a form entirely "unexceptionable;

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, That the following "form of an Association be and it is hereby recom- "mended to them, viz.:

"'We, the subscribers, inhabitants of . . . . , "'in the County of . . . . , and Colony of New "'York, do most solemnly declare that the claims of "'the British Parliament to bind, at their discretion, "'the people of the United Colonies in America, in "'all cases whatsoever, are, in our opinions, absurd, "'unjust, and tyrannical; and that the hostile at- "'tempts of their Fleets and Armies to enforce sub- "'mission to those wicked and ridiculous claims "'ought to be resisted by arms.

"'And, therefore, we do engage and associate, "'under all the ties which we respectively hold "'sacred, to defend, by arms, these United Colonies, "'against the said hostile attempts, agreeable to such "'Laws and Regulations as our Representatives in "'the Congresses or future General Assemblies of "'this Colony have or shall, for that purpose, make "'and establish.'

"And that all persons who have been disarmed for "refusing to associate with their countrymen, for the "defense of the United Colonies, in the form pre- "scribed by the late Committee of Safety, as afore- "said, may have no pretence to complain of injus- "tice, and that they may have a fair opportunity of "convincing the public that their refusal to sign the "said Association did not arise from a disinclination "to defend the Rights of America, but merely from "objections to sign to the form of the said Association, "and thereby be restored to the privilege of bearing "arms in support of a cause so important and so "glorious;

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, That all persons, "other than those whom the Committees of the sev- "eral Counties shall adjudge to be notoriously disaf- "fected to the American cause, who have not asso- "ciated in the form prescribed by the late Committee "of Safety, as aforesaid, be called upon, by persons "to be appointed by the said Committees of the sev- "eral Counties, and requested to subscribe the Asso- "ciation contained and recommended in and by these "Resolutions. And

"RESOLVED, FURTHER, That all such of the said "persons as shall subscribe the same, other than "notoriously disaffected persons, as aforesaid, ought "to be considered and treated as friends to their "country; and that all arms taken from them and "not disposed of to the Continental troops, be re- "stored to them; and that care be taken that they "respectively be paid the full price allowed, for such "of their arms as may have been delivered to the "Continental troops, as aforesaid.

"AND FURTHER, that all such of the said persons "as shall refuse to subscribe to the same, together "with all notorious disaffected persons, be forthwith, "if not already done, disarmed, and required on oath "to declare and discover whether the arms so to be "taken from them be all the arms they respectively "have or had, and if not, where the residue thereof, "to the best of their knowledge and belief, are depos- "ited and may be found; and that such of them as "shall refuse to take such oath, be committed to safe "custody till they will consent to take it.

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, That it be and it is "hereby recommended to the Committees of the sev- "eral Counties in this Colony, to carry the aforesaid "Resolutions into execution, with diligence and "punctuality."[1]

It is said that the Report and Resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Provincial Congress, evidently without the slightest consideration of their characters and probable result, and certainly during the latter portion of an afternoon session of the Congress, in which, both before and after the presentation of them, that body was crowded with other and very important matters of business; and it is said to have ordered, at that time, that the Resolutions should be printed in all the newspapers which were then published in the City of New York and in handbills; and "that the Resolutions be read to every "person to whom the Association thereby recom- "mended shall be offered for subscription."[2]

Whatever the real motives of those who had declined to sign the Association which the Committee of Safety had prescribed, had been, they were such as had led the Provincial Congress to notice them, respectfully, and to lead that body to move for the removal of the objections which had been thus reasonably raised against that Association, by those whom the Provincial Congress's Committee was constrained to recognize as "friends to the American cause;" and it ill became John Jay, therefore, to display so many of the idiosyncrasies of his generally unamiable character, in the contemptuous and singularly insulting words which he applied to those of his fellow "friends of the American cause" who had presumed to take their knowledge of the legal obligations contained in that objectionable Association from some one else than from himself and his Congressional confrerie; and an impartial examination of the two forms of Association, and a careful comparison of that revised form, which he induced the Provincial Congress to substitute for that against which the objections had been raised, with the latter, will clearly indicate to the reader that the writer of that revised form had permitted his evil passions to get the better of his personal integrity, when he belittled himself by reporting an Association which was even more objectionable in its provisions than that which had been objected to, dressed and decorated with a meaningless Preamble, evidently intended for the beguilement of the unwary, but without containing a single word of provision, either in the Preamble or in the Association itself, that the signers of that revised instrument, by that act, would not deprive themselves of their Rights as Militia, and subject themselves to be taken beyond the limits of the Colony, even to the extent of the most distant of the confederated Colonies, whenever some body, over whom they could exercise no control, should incline to order them thither. Indeed, instead of relieving the Association which the Committee of Safety had recommended, from the uncertainties of its provisions, the only duty which had been assigned to John Jay and his two rustic associates, these astute partisans, in the bitterness of their animosities, did nothing else, in the way of the duty which had devolved on them, than to indulge in contemptuous sneers and inuendoes against those who had objected to the terms of the Committee of Safety's Association, without including, in their revised form, the provisions of safety which the Provincial Congress had evidently intended to have inserted; and, by the addition of words which were not in the former, they actually made the signers of the revised Association, more than before, the helpless subjects of two absolutely despotic bodies, over neither of whom could they bring any, even the slightest, restraining influence, no matter how objectionable and oppressive the Orders and enactments of either or both of those bodies might be.

As a man thinketh in his heart, so he is; and it will be difficult, in the light of such actions as this, to convince any honest man that, whatever he may have been after he had reached that place in the office-bearing ranks of his countrymen which he so greatly coveted and of which he was so exceeding fond, while John Jay was still struggling for place, it mattered little under what master, he was neither more nor less upright, in what he said and did for the advancement of his individual or his party's purposes, than are office-seekers of our own day, with whom the end in view is generally made to justify the means.

On the twenty-sixth of June, the Provincial Congress received a letter from the President of the Continental Congress, dated on the preceding day, and enclosing a Resolution of that body,[1] the latter of which, because of its remarkable character, is entitled to a passing notice, in this place. The Resolution referred to was in these words:

"In Congress, June 24, 1776.

"Resolved, That all persons abiding within any "of the United Colonies and deriving protection from "the Laws of the same, owe allegiance to the said "Laws and are members of such Colony; and that all "persons passing through, visiting, or making a tem-"porary stay in any of the said Colonies, being en-"titled to the protection of the Laws during the time "of such passage, visitation, or temporary stay, owe, "during the same time, allegiance thereto.

"That all persons, members of or owing allegiance "to any of the United Colonies, as before described, "who shall levy war against any of the said Colonies, "within the same, or be adherent to the King of Great "Britain or others, the enemies of the said Colonies, or "any of them, within the same, giving to him or them "aid or comfort, are guilty of treason against such "Colony.

"That it be recommended to the Legislatures of "the several United Colonies to pass Laws for punish-"ing, in such manner as to them shall seem fit, such "persons, as before described, as shall be proveably "attainted of open deed, by people of their condi-"tions, of any of the treasons before described.

"That it be recommended to the Legislatures of "the several United Colonies, to pass Laws for pun-"ishing, in such manner as they shall think fit, per-"sons who shall counterfeit, or aid or abet in coun-"terfeiting, the Continental Bills of Credit, or who "shall pass any such Bill, in payment, knowing the "same to be counterfeit.

"By order of Congress,

"John Hancock, President."[2]

The Journal of the Continental Congress tells us that this remarkable paper formed a part of the Report of the Committee on Spies, to that body; and that Committee appears to have been composed of John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Edward Rutledge, James Wilson, and Robert R. Livingston;[1] but the character of those who framed the Resolution only increases our surprise, and, more clearly than before, indicates the desperate straits into which, even at that early date, the Continental Congress had been crowded, unless the "spies" against whom the Committee fulminated its Report were those Commissioners whom the Ministry had authorized to treat for Reconcilation and Peace,[2] and who were, at that time, nearing and not distant from New York; and unless, also, the Continental Congress, by these Resolutions, proposed to naturalize Admiral Howe, and General Howe, and the forces which were respectively under their command; and to transform all these, on their arrival within the harbor of New York, into "members of "the Colony" of New York, "owing allegiance to "the Laws of the United Colonies," and subject to be tried on a charge of "Treason against such Colony" of New York, should they become prisoners of war.

Whatever the purposes of the Continental Congress may have been, in the adoption and promulgation of these Resolutions, no one can attribute to the learned lawyers who reported them the slightest sincerity, since none knew better than they, that "allegiance," under any possible circumstances, was not and could not become due to what was nothing else than a mere "Law," and that the "Law" of a mere "Colony," which might be enacted on one day and be repealed on the next; that "allegiance" was, then, and would always be, due to nothing else than to the Sovereign of whom the person was or should become, legitimately, a subject; that an avowed sojourner, "pass-"ing through" a Colony or merely "visiting" it or "making a temporary stay" within it, at the same time owing "allegiance" to the Sovereign of another country, while he would certainly owe obedience to the local Law, during the entire period of his journey through or of his visit to or of his temporary stay within that Colony, by no Law nor by any possible interpretation of a Law which would have been entitled to the slightest respect, only by reason of that journey or visit or temporary stay, could have been said to have surrendered his "allegiance" due only to his own Sovereign, and, instead, only for the same reason, to have become a subject of, owing "alle-"giance" to, the authority which controlled the place of his journey or visit or temporary stay, and especially so while that place was or should continue to be only an acknowledged dependency of a foreign Prince, to whom it was or should be, itself, avowedly subject, and by whom no such enactment or order had been made; that no mere Colony, dependent on another and superior political power, could possibly have been said, sincerely, by such a Committee, to have possessed a political Sovereignty, nor that, in the absence of such a Sovereignty, there could possibly have been a respectable and competent charge of Treason against it, in any instance whatever; and, more than all, that such a pretense and threat of charges of Treason against a Colony, made by the Committee, in its Resolutions, was simply a harmless thunderbolt, before the Law, since the King of Great Britain, against whom and against whose authority the Resolutions were specifically directed, was, at the time of the adoption and promulgation of those Resolutions, actually the Sovereign of all those Colonies and of all those who were thus denouncing him, openly and generally recognized, throughout the former, as the source of all their legitimate political authority and as their King; and, by the members of that Committee and the authors of those Resolutions, themselves, specifically recognized as the Sovereign to whom each and every of them was himself proud to owe allegiance.[3]

"Allegiance" and "Treason" presupposed Sovereignty existing in the Colonies, without which Sovereignty there could not have possibly been any "Allegiance" due to either of them nor "Treason" committed against them or either of them; but it would require a bold man, possessed of a very vivid imagination, to maintain, seriously and honestly, that any such Sovereignty existed in the Colonies, or in any or either of them, on the twenty-fourth of June, 1776, when the Continental Congress adopted these Resolutions, whatever there might have been or not have been, in the several States, a fortnight afterwards.

What the result of this action of the Continental Congress was, will be seen, hereafter.

Another very important subject which was introduced to the notice of the third Provincial Congress, during its very brief existence, was that of supplanting the existing Colonial Government by the establishment of a new form of Government which would more nearly represent the current spirit of those who were leaders in the Rebellion, and which, more than anything else, would indicate a determination to sever the political connection of the Colony with the Mother Country.

On the tenth of May, 1776, the Continental Congress, after a very severe and very protracted consideration of the subject, had adopted a Resolution;[4] and on the fifteenth of the same month, it had pre-

[3] See, in the Address to the King, by the same Continental Congress and signed by each of its members, individually, (Journal of the Continental Congress, "Saturday, July 8, 1775,") what, at the date of these Resolutions, contained, unaltered, all which had been said, formally, of the disposition, toward the King, of either the Congress or of its individual members.

fixed to that Resolution, a Preamble,[1] which, together, were in these words:

"WHEREAS his Britannic Majesty, in conjunction "with the Lords and Commons of Great Britain, has, "by a late Act of Parliament, excluded the inhabi- "tants of these United Colonies from the protection "of his Crown;

"AND WHEREAS no answer whatever to the humble "Petition of the Colonies, for redress of grievances and "reconciliation with Great Britain, has been or is "likely to be given, but the whole force of that King- "dom, aided by foreign mercenaries, is to be exerted "for the destruction of the good people of these Col- "onies;

"AND WHEREAS it appears absolutely irreconcilable "to reason and good conscience for the people of these "Colonies, now, to take the Oaths and Affirmations "necessary for the support of any Government under "the Crown of Great Britain, and it is necessary that "the exercise of every kind of authority under the "said Crown should be totally suppressed, and all the "powers of Government exerted under the authority "of the people of the Colonies, for the preservation of "internal peace, virtue, and good order, as well as for "the defence of their lives, liberties, and properties, "against the hostile invasions and cruel depredations "of their enemies, therefore

"RESOLVED, That it be recommended to the re- "spective Assemblies and Conventions of the United "Colonies, where no Government sufficient to the "exigencies of their affairs hath been hitherto estab- "lished, to adopt such Government as shall, in the "opinion of the representatives of the people, best "conduce to the happiness and safety of their constit- "uents, in particular, and America, in general.'

The careful reader of that Preamble and Resolution will not fail to see, in every portion of them, only Independence very thinly disguised;[2] and he will not be surprised to learn that those, within the Continental Congress, who were most desirous of effecting a Reconciliation with the Mother Country, were most resolute in opposing the adoption of them;[3] nor that, after they had been adopted, those of the Delegation from the Colony of New York who had been among those who had opposed that favorable action, very soon retired from their seats in the Continental Congress and occupied seats in the Provincial Congress of New York,[4] where, by means of a similar line of action, adverse to the adoption of a new form of local Government and to the evidently approaching question of Independence, both those radical measures might be successfully opposed, at least until the Royal Commissioners whom the Home Government had sent to effect a Reconciliation, should have arrived and presented their proposals, and until those who were anxious to figure, in New York and at London, as diplomatists and as peace-makers, rather than as friends or promoters of Independence, should have had an opportunity to dispense with Independence; to restore the old order of the Colonial Government, with here and there a revision which would be favorable to themselves or to their faction; and to establish for themselves, at least, such a substantial claim on the gratitude of the Crown and of the Nation, as would ensure to them the control of the restored Colonial Governments, at home, if not something more acceptable, abroad.[5]

[1] Journal of the Continental Congress, "Wednesday, May 15, 1776."

[2] "Great Britain has at last driven America to the last step: a com- "plete separation from her, a total, absolute Independence, not only "of her Parliament, but of her Crown, for such is the amount of the "Resolve of the 15th. Confederation among ourselves or Alliances "with foreign nations are not necessary to a perfect separation from "Britain; that is effected by extinguishing all authority under the "Crown, Parliament, and Nation, as the Resolution for instituting "Governments has done, to all intents and purposes. Confederation "will be necessary for our internal concord, and Alliances may be "so for our external defense."—(John Adams to Mrs. Adams, "PHILA- "DELPHIA, May 17, 1776.")

As the writer of this paragraph was the Chairman of the Committee who framed the Preamble, and as he probably wrote it, there need be no better authority concerning the intent of him who framed it, as well as concerning his understanding of the meaning and of the consequences of it.

See, also, Stephen Hopkins to Governor Cooke of Rhode Island, "PHILA- "DELPHIA, May 15, 1776."

[3] The Delegation from Pennsylvania, subsequently such determined opponents of Independence, were resolute opposers of this Preamble and Resolution, and declined to vote on it, "as far as was in their "power, withdrawing the Province from this union of the Colonies, "both in council and action."—(The Philadelphia Committee to the Committees of the rural Counties of Pennsylvania, "PHILADELPHIA, May 21, "1776.") The majority of the Delegates from New York subsequently repeated their opposition to the measure, in the Provincial Congress of that Colony, where, also, their opposition to the Resolution of Independence was so peculiarly conspicuous. Although we have found no record of the action of the Delegations from New Jersey and Maryland, on that particular question, the subsequent action of the local revolutionary bodies, in those Colonies, concerning those Delegations, leaves no room for doubt concerning what the action of their respective Delegations had been.

[4] John Alsop and Francis Lewis took seats in the Provincial Congress, on the twentieth of May; John Jay appeared on the twenty-fifth of that month; James Duane, who had some other place in the Continental service, showed himself on the second of June; and Philip Livingston lingered until the eighth of June—all of them were there in season to accomplish, as far as the Provincial Congress of New York could be employed in such a work, all they had set out to do, in the work of procrastination, of reconciliation with the Mother Country, and of continued Colonial dependence.

[5] "Things have come to such a pass, now, as to convince us that we "have nothing more to expect from the justice of Great Britain; also, "that she is capable of the most delusive arts; for I am satisfied that "no Commissioners ever were designed, except Hessians and other "foreigners; and that the idea was only to deceive and throw us off "our guard. The first has been too effectually accomplished, as many "members of Congress, in short, the representation of whole Provinces, "are still feeding themselves upon the dainty food of reconciliation; "and, though they will not allow that the expectation of it has any "influence upon their judgment with respect to their preparations for "defence, it is but too obvious that it has an operation upon every part "of their conduct, and is a clog to their proceedings. It is not in "the nature of things to be otherwise; for no man that entertains "a hope of seeing this dispute speedily and equitably adjusted by "Commissioners will go to the same expense and run the same hazards "to prepare for the worst event, as he who believes that he must "conquer, or submit to unconditional terms and the like concomitants, "such as confiscation, hanging, and the like." (General Washington to his brother, Augustine Washington, "PHILADELPHIA, 31 May, 1776.")

Although an official copy of that Preamble and Resolution was evidently sent to the Provincial Congress of New York, no mention was made of the receipt of it, on the Journals of that body; but, on the twenty-fourth of May, "the order of the day being "read, the Congress proceeded to take into considera- "tion" the Resolution and the general subject to which it particularly related.[1]

* * * * * *

The Provincial Congress having "considered" the Report, it also adopted it, evidently without debate or a division of the house,—Westchester-county was unrepresented in that exceedingly important vote, owing to the absence of a quorum of its Deputation; —and, after the Congress had ordered the Resolutions to be published in all the newspapers in the Colony and in handbills, the latter for distribution in the rural Counties,[2] it appears to have dismissed the entire subject from its further attention.

The Resolutions which were thus adopted and published, form the foundation of the entire structure of the Constitution of the State of New York, in all its varied forms; and, for that reason, we have not hesitated to find places, in this narrative, for all which concerned them. We are not insensible of the fact, however, that the fair words which they contain were deceptive; that the voice and the votes to which the election of the proposed founders of a State was thus referred, were not those of "the Inhabitants" who had figured so largely in the preliminary Report, but only those of the Freeholders and those of the tenantry who were of the wealthier class, to the exclusion of the tenantry of small properties and of the Mechanics and Working-men of the Colony, and certainly to the exclusion of those who had been officially proscribed and officially outraged, and for whom, under subsequent action of the Congress, yet more atrocious proscription and persecution and outrage were held in reserve. We are not insensible, also, that, notwithstanding the seeming eagerness of its authors, at that time, to remove the "many and great "inconveniences," as well as that power of despotic oppression and tyranny which "attended the mode of "Government by Congress and Committees," of some of which "inconveniences" and despotism the reader has been already made acquainted, they were not subsequently so eager—they certainly loitered over their work until after the Royal Commissioners had exhausted their ingenuity as well as their authority in fruitless efforts to effect a Reconciliation and to restore harmony between the Colonies and the Mother Country; and, even at that later day, John Morin Scott and Alexander McDougal and others of the same class having, meantime, obtained other places which filled their expectations, the puny thing which was created and entitled The Constitution of the State of New York, was introduced to the world, and fostered by political midwives and wetnurses who cared nothing for it beyond what they could severally make from it. Most of all, we are not insensible of the fact that, notwithstanding all the fine words, concerning the "People" and the "Inhabitants" and their unquestionable political authority, which were included in the Resolutions, the oligarchic authors of those Resolutions carefully reserved to themselves, the sole authority to determine whether a Constitution should or should not be created; and to determine, also, if they should consider a Constitution were necessary and proper, in what words and with what provisions that Constitution should be composed; without the slightest recognition of any existing Right or authority, in the constituent "People" or "Inhabitants," to consider all such action of those who pretended to be the "representatives" of that "People" or of those "Inhabitants," and to ratify and approve or to disallow and reject the same, or any portion thereof, at its or their pleasure, as might be done by the recognized sovereign power; and as, in this instance, it certainly should have been done.[3] It will be seen, hereafter, in what manner the "oligarchy" who was seated in the Provincial Congress, controlling the affairs of the Colony in their own interest, and who intended to be re-elected, betrayed both the "Inhabitants" and the "People," in imposing upon both, a new form of Government, without their consent, but not until their own purposes to secure their own ends through the older Colonial form, had become unsuccessful.

The subject of a new form of Government was scarcely disposed of, when, on the fourth of June, the same "Society of Mechanics in Union," so called, whom the master-spirits of the Committee of Fifty-one had deceived and betrayed—the same who was composed of the fragments of that phantom which had been known by the general title of "The Sons of

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress. "Die Veneris, 4 ho., P. M., May "31, 1776."

[3] This peculiarity of the Resolutions of the Provincial Congress did not escape the vigilant attention of the Working men and tenants of only small properties, within the City of New-York—of those very "poor "reptiles" of whom Gouverneur Morris had written to Mr. Penn, in May, 1774, (vide page 188, ante)—and only with whose very acceptable help, the Delegation to the Continental Congress of 1774 had managed to secure their seats in that body. Whatever may have been their standing in the social scale of aristocracy, but for the co-operation of those who constituted the so called, "Society of Mechanics in Union," there would have been no place for either James Duane or John Jay in the Continental Congress of 1774 or in that similar Congress which succeeded it; and without their assent and approval, corruptly secured, in every instance except one, the members of the Delegation to the first-named of those Congresses, if not those to both, had lived in fretful obscurity, and have died as their respective ancestors had died, "unwept, unhonored, and "unsung." There was a fitness, therefore, in the alarm of these Working-men of the City of New York, because of the contemptuous disregard of their political Rights, by those, of the Provincial Congress, who were only the creatures of their plebeian will and the administrators of their inherent authority. The Address of the Society, which those working-men subsequently presented to the Provincial Congress, on that subject, a master-piece of political reasoning, has been preserved in the archives of the State, and will be referred to hereafter.

"Liberty," and from whom has proceeded that excellent body, still existing, which is distinguished by the title of "The General Society of Mechanics and "Tradesmen of the City of New York"—presented an Address to the Provincial Congress, on the subject of Independence.

The signers of that Address, the first movement concerning Independence in the Provincial Congress, stated that they were devoted friends to their bleeding country; that they were afflicted by beholding her struggling under heavy loads of oppression and tyranny, and the more so, when they viewed the iron hand lifted up against her; that their Prince was deaf to Petitions for interposing his Royal authority for redressing their grievances; that one year had not sufficed to satisfy the rage of a cruel Ministry, in their bloody pursuits designed to reduce them to be slaves taxed by them, without their consent; that, therefore, they rather wished to separate from, than to continue connected with, such oppressors; and they declared that if the Provincial Congress should think proper to instruct their Delegates in the Continental Congress to use their utmost endeavors, in that august assembly, to cause these United Colonies to become independent of Great Britain, it would give them the highest satisfaction; and they sincerely promised to support the same with their lives and fortunes.[1]

A snow-storm in Summer would not have been more unwelcome to the cultivators of the soil, than that Address was to the Provincial Congress, since Independence and the much coveted Reconciliation with Great Britain were wholly irreconcilable; and, without even the usual courtesy of a consideration of either the Address or the very important subject to which it related, by a Committee of the Congress—why should "the poor reptiles" who had written and presented such an Address receive such attention and enjoy such consideration as a reference of their Address and of their plea to a Committee of the Congress, would have indicated, although such a reference was usual and nothing more than respectful in matters of so much importance?—an Answer was made by the President of the Congress, orally; and a copy of it was evidently given to Lewis Thibou [Louis Tiebout, ?] by whom the Address had been read, at the head of "a number of citizens who style "themselves a 'Committee of Mechanics,'" before the Provincial Congress itself.

As the "oligarchy" which constituted that Congress had resorted to the extraordinary precaution of requiring the proposed Address to be delivered to it, for its "inspection," in order that that aristocratic body should "discover whether it is proper for this "Congress to receive the same"—the bearers of it, meanwhile, dancing an attendance, outside, before a closed door—before it would permit the Mechanics to enter the Chamber in which it was sitting, to present their Address and to read it, there had been ample time to prepare the Answer, in season for the oral delivery of it, from the Chair; and there was one Deputy present, and only one, who was capable of writing that Answer, in the terms in which it was constituted.[2]

That Answer was in these remarkable words:

"In Provincial Congress, June 4, 1776.

"Sir:

"We consider the Mechanics in Union as a volun-"tary Association of a number of the inhabitants of "this City, who are warmly attached to the cause of "Liberty. We flatter ourselves, however, that neither "that Association nor their Committee will claim any "authority, whatsoever, in the public transactions of "the present times; but that, on the contrary, they "will ever be ready to submit to that constitutional "authority which, by a free election, has been vested "in Congress and Committees.

"This Congress is, at all times, ready and willing "to attend to every request of their constituents, or "of any part of them: we are of opinion that the "Continental Congress, alone, have that enlarged "view of our political circumstances which will ena-"ble them to decide upon those measures which are "necessary for the general welfare: we cannot pre-"sume, by any instructions, to make or declare any "Resolutions or Declarations, upon a so general and "momentous concern; but are determined patiently "to await and firmly to abide by whatever a majority "of that august body shall think needful. We, there-"fore, cannot presume to instruct the Delegates of "this Colony, upon the momentous question to which "your Address refers, until we are informed that it is "brought before the Continental Congress and the "sense of this Colony be required through this Con-"gress."[3]

To that contemptuous Answer, the Mechanics in Union, ten days afterwards, [June 14, 1776,] sent a second Address, in reply, in which, under cover of an inquiry concerning one of the Resolutions of the Provincial Congress relating to a proposed establishment of a new form of Government, but in words and in terms which entitled the Artisan-author of it to the highest honors, the generally unfranchised Workingmen of the City of New York manfully declared their Rights, as a portion of that body of the People, throughout the Colony, in whom, they considered, were vested the original power and the source of all political authority, within the Colony; denounced the assumption, by either of the Congresses or any of the Committees, of an authority over and beyond that which had been delegated to them, as illegal and destructive of the ends sought to be secured by the creation of those several bodies; and warning the Provincial Congress of the necessary consequences of such an usurpation. That Reply, most respectful in its tone while it was most overwhelming in its facts and in its argument, was evidently not permitted to be presented to the Provincial Congress; and, without the slightest notice on the official Journal of that body—probably, without the slightest official action by the Congress—it was buried in the files of that "oligarchic" body, to await a resurrection in these later days.[1]

[2] John Jay was not in his seat, in the Provincial Congress, during that entire day; and, therefore, he had no hand in it. John Morin Scott was present; but no one will pretend that such a sturdy sycophant of the popular element as he, would have ventured to have written such a paper, so contemptuously disrespectful of that great class of generally unfranchised Working-men. The President of the Congress, General Woodhull, of Suffolk, was not handy with the pen; and he possessed no such animosity against "the lower classes," as is seen in this Answer. It remained, therefore, to the high toned, "well born" Deputy from Westchester-county, Gouverneur Morris—the same who had stood in the window of the Coffee-house, on the nineteenth of May, 1774, and, thence, had studied the rising power of the democracy, whom he loathed *—to write the Answer of the Congress; and it was, unquestionably, he who did it.

* Vide page 12, ante.

On the following day, [June 5, 1776,] the Provincial Congress was pestered, again, with that obnoxious subject of Independence; but, on that occasion, the aristocratic Colonial Convention of Virginia was the unwelcome claimant on its attention; and, consequently, it was constrained to be more civil in its words and more respectful in its demeanor than it had been, on the day before, when the plebeian Workingmen of the City in which it was seated had addressed it, respectfully, on the same subject.

The message which the letter of Edmund Pendleton had conveyed to the Provincial Congress was the celebrated and well-known Resolutions of that Convention, adopted on the fifteenth of May preceding, through which the Delegation from Virginia, in the Continental Congress, was instructed "to declare the "United Colonies free and independent States, ab- "solved from all allegiance to or dependence upon "the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain; and "that it give the assent of this Colony to such Decla- "ration, and to whatever measures may be thought "proper and necessary, by the Congress, for forming "foreign alliances and a Confederation of the Colonies, "at such time and in the manner as to them shall seem "best; PROVIDED, That the power of forming Govern- "ment for and the regulation of the internal concerns "of each Colony be left to the respective Colonial "Legislatures;"[2] and the Provincial Congress ordered "that John Jay and Gouverneur Morris be a Commit- "tee to prepare a draft of an answer to it, and to "report the same"[3]—without the usual injunction, "with all convenient speed," however, since the Provincial Congress was not in a hurry to consider the subject of Independence; and it would not be so, at least until what it evidently preferred, the question of Reconciliation, should have been met and finally disposed of.

On the afternoon of the day succeeding that on which the Resolutions from Virginia had been received, [June 6, 1776,] the Committee to whom those Resolutions had been referred, reported an answer to the letter of Edmund Pendleton which had covered them – an answer which was just as icy cold and formal as the Answer to "the Mechanics in Union," two days before, had been; and which told, as distinctly as the other had told, how entirely obnoxious to the aristocratic leaders of the Rebellion, in New York, the proposition for Independence from Great Britain had been. It simply acknowledged the receipt of the Resolutions and that of the letter which had covered them, saying, also, that they had been communicated to the Provincial Congress, by whom "they would be "considered with all the deliberation due to the im- "portance of the subject;" that the Congress thanked the Convention of Virginia for its attention; and that the latter was "assured that the Congress of this Col- "ony will invariably adopt and pursue every measure "which may tend to promote the union and secure "the rights and happiness of the United Colonies."[4]

Four days after the Resolutions of the Convention

[1] This admirable Reply to the Answer of the Provincial Congress, which was more especially devoted to the proposal of that body to impose a new form of Government on the Colony or State, without having submitted it to the body of the People, for ratification or rejection, was in these words:

With this simple record of one of the coldest specimens of polite disagreement with another, on record, before him, the reader will hardly be prepared to read what Bancroft has written of the reception of the Resolutions from Virginia and of John Jay's treatment of them. His words were these: "But early in June, the New York Congress had to pass "upon the Virginia proposition of Independence. This was the moment "that showed the firmness and the purity of Jay; the darker the hour, "the more he stood ready to cheer; the greater the danger, the more "promptly he stepped forward to guide. He had insisted on the doubt- "ful measure of a second Petition to the King with no latent weakness of "purpose or cowardice of heart. The hope of obtaining redress had "gone; he could, now, with perfect peace of mind, give free scope to the "earnestness of his convictions. Though it had been necessary for him "to perish as a martyr, he could not and he would not swerve from his "sense of duty."—(History of the United States, original edition, viii., 439; the same, centenary edition, v., 305.)

The entire reply to the Convention of Virginia, excluding the date and the signature, occupies twelve lines of a narrow column, including the half-lines of two paragraphs. All which it contained, concerning Independence, was a formal acknowledgment of the receipt of the letter and of the Resolutions, "which were immediately communicated to the Con- "gress of this Colony, and will be considered by them with all the de- "liberation due to the importance of the subject." Nothing more than that was said or done, on the subject of Independence, in connection with the Resolutions from Virginia, nor in connection with anything else, relative to that subject, until the Congress was crowded into a consideration of it, by an entirely different agency, several days afterwards.

Yet this is "history," as Bancroft understands the meaning of that term.

of Virginia had been thus quieted, [June 10, 1776,] the Provincial Congress was further vexed, on the growing subject of Independence, by the receipt of the following brief note from those of the Delegates of the Colony who were, then, in Philadelphia:

"PHILADELPHIA, June 8, 1776.

"DEAR SIR:

"Your Delegates, here, expect that the question of "Independence will, very shortly, be agitated in "Congress. Some of us consider ourselves as bound "by our instructions not to vote on that question; "and all of us wish to have your sentiments thereon.

"The matter will admit of no delay; we have, "therefore, sent an express who will wait your "orders.

"We are, Sir, with the greatest respect,

"Your most obt. hum. servts.

"HENRY WISNER,
"ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON,
"FRANS. LEWIS.

"To NATHANIEL WOODHULL, ESQ., PREST.
"OF THE HON. THE CONVENTION OF NEW-YORK."[1]

This letter was received, early in the morning, and the Provincial Congress, very leisurely, read it, in secret Session; and, notwithstanding the urgency for speedy action which accompanied it, that was all which was done, concerning Independence, at that Session.[2] Late in the afternoon, the Congress very leisurely returned to the subject; and, then, it indulged itself by hearing the reading of the letter, a second time; by listening, while the Clerk read the powers of the Provincial Congress, which were very briefly presented in the Resolutions calling for the election of its members;[3] and by hearing the same stately official read the powers of the Delegates of the Colony in the Continental Congress,[4] closing its desperate effort to make haste slowly, in spending "some time, "in the consideration of the letter" of the Delegation,[5] without, however, taking any action whatever, on it or on the subject to which it referred.

Nothing whatever was done by the Provincial Congress, concerning the letter of the Delegates nor concerning Independence, on the following morning, [June 11, 1776;][6] but, during the afternoon of that day, with that peculiar disregard for those with whom he was associated which invariably distinguished John Jay from all others, that Deputy presented "several Resolutions on the subject of Independ- "ence," which were seconded by Colonel Henry Remsen, of the City of New York, "again read by "paragraphs, amended, and agreed to, and are in the "words following, to wit:[7]

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, That the good people "of this Colony have not, in the opinion of this "Congress, authorized this Congress or the Delegates "of this Colony in the Continental Congress to de- "clare this Colony to be and continue independent of "the Crown of Great Britain.

"BUT WHEREAS the perseverance of the British "King and Parliament, in an unjustifiable attempt to "subjugate and enslave these United Colonies, may "render a determination on that and many other im- "portant points highly necessary and expedient, and "a recurrence to the people at large, for their senti- "ments on every great question that may occur in "the course of the present contest would be very "inconvenient to them, and probably be attended "with dangerous delay:

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, therefore, That it be "and it is hereby earnestly recommended to all the "Freeholders and other Electors in this Colony, at "the ensuing Election to be held in pursuance of a "Resolution of the Congress of the thirty-first day of "May last past, not only to vest their Representa- "tives or Deputies with the powers therein men- "tioned, but also with full power to deliberate and "determine on every question whatever that may "concern or affect the interest of this Colony, and to "conclude upon, ordain, and execute every act and "measure which, to them, shall appear conducive to "the happiness, security, and welfare of this Colony; "and that they hold and exercise the said powers until "the second Tuesday of May next, or until a regular "form of Government for this Colony shall be estab-

[3] It was stated in the Credentials of the Deputies from Orange-county that the Resolutions of the second Provincial Congress, providing for the election of the third Provincial Congress and defining its authority, were adopted on the twelfth of March preceding; but there is no mention of the adoption of any Resolutions whatever, on that subject, on that or any other day, on the published Journal of the second Provincial Congress.

Again: we have not found on that Journal, any definition of the authority of the third of those Congresses—that authority which, in the text, the Secretary is said to have read, on the afternoon of the tenth of June—but the Credentials of the Deputies from Kings-county, compared with those of the Deputies from Orange-county, indicate that the authority sought to be delegated to that third Provincial Congress by its constituent Counties, under the Resolutions providing for their election, included "full powers, in behalf of the said County, to appoint Delegates "to represent the Colony in the Continental Congress, and to make such "orders and take such measures as they shall judge necessary, not repug- "nant to or inconsistent with any Rules or Orders of the Continental "Congress, for the preservation of the Rights, Liberties and Privileges of "the inhabitants of this Colony."

These, or their equivalents, were, undoubtedly, what the Secretary read to the Provincial Congress, as stated in the text.

[4] "The powers of the Delegates at Continental Congress," which until it became convenient to refer to them in order to promote a selfish end, had remained unnoticed, were recited in their Credentials, in the following few words: * * * "to meet the Delegates from the other Colo- "nies, and to concert and determine upon such measures as shall be "judged most effectual for the preservation and re-establishment of "American rights and privileges, and for the restoration of harmony "between Great Britain and the Colonies," (Journal of the Provincial Convention. "lished, in case that event shall sooner take place. "And it is further recommended to the said Free- "holders and Electors, by instructions or otherwise, "to inform their said Deputies of their sentiments "relative to the great question of Independency and "such other points as they may think proper." [1]

It needs very little of knowledge in the science of politics to distinguish, in these Resolutions, a proposal that those of the Colonists, in New York, who were not already proscribed and enslaved by the Resolutions of the Provincial Congress adopted on the fifth of June, six days preceding the adoption of these Resolutions,[2] should debase themselves and voluntarily become unqualified serfs, before, and entirely subject to, as absolute and unbridled a despotism as ever existed; and that knowledge will serve, also, to distinguish the author and supporters of such Resolutions, notwithstanding the gauzy masks which ill-supported their shallow pretensions to personal and political integrity, as nothing else than monarchists of the most pronounced school of absolutism, provided, always, they should, themselves, be seated very near to the throne. There was an appendage to those Resolutions, which rendered the entire movement still more remarkable; and the facts are not the less significant because those who have written of the Resolutions and of those who wrote them and promoted their passage through the Provincial Congress, have studiously concealed not only the license for a despotism which they contained, but, also, that secret appendage which made entirely inoperative all the provisions which they contained on the subject of the proposed Independence of the Colonies from the Mother Country.

The controlling appendage, to which we allude and which has not been heretofore noticed by any historical writer, was an Agreement which was made between the members of the Provincial Congress who were then present, John Jay having been of the number and unquestionably the leader in the movement, "That the publishing of the aforegoing Resolves "be postponed until after the Election of Deputies "with powers to establish a new form of Govern- "ment"[3]—that is to say, they were not to be made known to the Freeholders and other voters, until after the Election at which the subject of the proposed Independence, was, by virtue of these Resolutions, to be submitted to the Electors, at the Polls, should have been held.

A reference to the Resolutions will show to the reader that, although the question of Independence formed the basis as well as the top-stone of the structure, they were so contrived that, notwithstanding that question seemed to have been submitted to the judgment of the Electors, at the Polls, that grave subject was really made dependent, among the various other matters of government of which the Electors were audaciously asked to divest themselves, on the unrestrained, despotic will of the Provincial Congress itself; and, at the same time, the entire subject was made "a rider," as parliamentarians call such motions, which was to be "saddled" on an Order which had been already made, for an Election, and for an entirely different purpose. All these, because they were open and intelligible to every sensible Elector, were well enough; and every such Elector, under the closing paragraph of the last Resolution, might be reasonably expected, "by instructions or otherwise, to in- "form his Deputy of his sentiments relative to the "great question of Independency and such other "points as he might think proper," the aggregate of which "instructions" might be regarded as a reasonable indication of the will of those who had given them, on the great questions of a new form of Government and of Independence, without, however, possessing any controlling power over the oligarchic Provincial Congress, who might, nevertheless, regard or disregard that expressed will of its constituents whenever and to whatever extent it own unrestrained will should determine, the Resolutions themselves, meanwhile, affording a license to those Delegates who remained in the Continental Congress, to continue to withhold the assent of the Colony of New York to whatever action should be taken, relative to Independence, in that body. We say, all these were well enough, because they were open and intelligible; and if the question of Independence had been, thereby, submitted, even indirectly and insufficiently, to the arbitrament of the Electors, there would have been an appearance, at least, of fairness and consistency; but John Jay had no such intention—he aimed, mainly, to hoodwink those, in the Continental Congress, who were anxiously desiring the support of New York in their effort to crowd the question of Independence through that body, by a seeming fairness on that subject; while, at the same time, by a secret Agreement (an action, by a parliamentary body, which was unknown to parliamentary law, and without a precedent,) all

[1] By inuendo, if not directly, Bancroft, by making no mention of the letter of the Delegation of the Colony in the Continental Congress, leads his readers to suppose that these Resolutions were the outcome of the Resolutions of the Convention of Virginia, which had been disposed of, as we have seen, several days previously and in a lesser number of words.

The same writer describes these Resolutions, after the rhetorical flourish, concerning the author of them, which we have elsewhere quoted, as "calling upon the Freeholders and Electors of the Colony to confer "on the Deputies whom they were about to choose full powers of admin- "istering Government, framing a Constitution, and deciding the great "question of Independence," (History of the United States, original edition, viii., 440; the same, centennial edition, v., 305.)

The venerable author saw nothing of that absolute despotism, involving "every question whatever," civil or ecclesiastical or military, affecting not only individuals but the aggregate body of the inhabitants of the entire Colony, which those Resolutions clearly and definitely established; and his eyes saw nothing whatever of that Agreement which was appended to them, which entirely dispose of his rhetoric, and, as we shall presently see, present John Jay in a somewhat different light.

that he and the Provincial Congress had done or pretended to have done, thereon, was made inoperative, by withholding from the Electors, until after the Election at which the Resolutions were ordered to be submitted to the judgment of those Electors, all knowledge of the existence of any such Resolutions!

If the Provincial Congress possessed no authority, legal or revolutionary, "to declare this Colony to be "and continue independent of the Crown of Great "Britain," as both common sense and history, as well as the first of John Jay's series of enabling Resolutions, unquestionably determined, those enabling Resolutions, carefully concealed and rendered entirely inoperative by the Agreement which was subsequently appended to them, assuredly did not supply nor provide for a supply of that peculiar authority which John Jay and the Provincial Congress, then, regarded as necessary, for a warrant for such a declaration; and, consequently, that Congress was, and would necessarily continue to be, as it had previously been, without the slightest authority, legal or revolutionary, to take any action whatever, which tended toward a separation of the Colony from the Mother Country. The carefully concealed Agreement accomplished the evident purposes of its treacherous authors, however; and the Delegation of the Colony in the Continental Congress, at the same time, was enabled, by it, to make its opposition, in that body, to the Resolution and the Declaration of Independence, less offensive to the majority of that Congress and to the revolutionary elements throughout the Continent; but, notwithstanding these successes, those Resolutions, as well as the Agreement which was appended to them, were deceptive and fraudulent in their character, and intended by their author and promoters for nothing else than for the advancement of deceptive and fraudulent purposes. The reader will see, very soon, with what little respect the declaration which formed the basis of those Resolutions, as well as the Resolutions themselves, was regarded by the same John Jay and by nearly the same Provincial Congress—then as deficient in authority "to declare "this Colony to be and continue independent of the "Crown of Great Britain," as it had been, twenty-eight days previously—when, on the ninth of July succeeding, they actually did declare this Colony to be and continue independent of the Mother Country, their acknowledged want of authority, from any source, to do any such action, to the contrary not withstanding.

Were there any doubt, in any mind, concerning John Jay's entire capability of practising the most refined deceit and of being most unqualifiedly treacherous, whenever his own selfish or partisan purposes could be most successfully promoted by deceit and treachery, such a doubt would be surely removed by a knowledge of that remarkable transaction—the adoption of a series of Resolutions, for the seeming promotion of a specific purpose, while, secretly, at the same time, he entered into an Agreement with other persons, by means of the provisions of which Agreement, secretly executed, the Resolutions were made inoperative, and the seeming support which they appeared to extend to the question of Independence, at the same time, was converted into an illusion and a cheat—which we have described. John Jay and all those with whom he was associated, in the great political questions of that period, were aiming at something else than Independence, at something which was directly antagonistic to Independence; and he and they felt at liberty, under the license of that unholy ambition which controlled them, to resort to and to employ whatever means, of whatever character, which would promote their controlling purpose of keeping the Colony of New York out of the current which was evidently setting toward Independence, and in a continued political and commercial dependence on Great Britain. Whether others will justify either the fraud or those who perpetrated it, is a matter in which we have no concern.

Having thus disposed of its unwelcome guest, the Provincial Congress appointed John Jay and "Col- "onel a Committee to draft an answer to the "letter of the Delegates in the Continental Congress," which had been the basis of all the proceedings which are now under consideration; and it is probable that such an answer, conveying a copy of the Resolutions, but evidently not one of the Agreement, was sent to the Delegates, on the afternoon of the day on which the Resolutions were adopted, although no mention was made of any such answer in the Journal of the Provincial Congress—the files of that body, however, contain a letter from the Delegates, dated on the seventeenth of June and addressed to the President of the Provincial Congress, acknowledging the receipt of two letters, of different dates, in one of which "the "sentiments of the Hon. the Convention relative to "the important subject on which we thought it our "duty to ask their opinion," had been transmitted, was duly acknowledged.[1]

No further action, of any kind, concerning Independence, was taken by the Provincial Congress; and, guided by the restricted authority expressed on its Credentials and by the Resolutions which are now under consideration, without having been told of the treacherous Agreement, the Delegation in the Continental Congress continued to withhold the assent of New York to the Resolution of Independence, adopted by that body, on the second of July, and to the Declaration which it approved, two days afterwards.

During the very brief period of the existence of the third Provincial Congress, besides those general enactments in which its conservative farmers were more than ordinarily interested, Westchester-county was, sometimes, made the especial object of the attentions of that body. An instance of that class of special doings may be seen in the Order which was made by the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-first of May, in these words: "ORDERED, That Colonel "Ritzema send such prudent Officer as he shall think "proper, to Westchester-county, to apply to the "Chairman of the County Committee and to the re- "spective Sub-committees, in that County, for such "good Arms, fit for soldiers' use, as they may have "collected by disarming disaffected persons, in that "County; and the respective Committees are hereby "requested to deliver such of those Arms as are fit "for the Army, to such Officer, taking and preserving "his receipts for the same: that the said Committees, "respectively, take care that all such Arms be "appraised, and an account of the value of each kept "agreeable to the directions heretofore given for that "purpose; and such Officer as Colonel Ritzema shall "send to collect those Arms is hereby directed to de- "liver all such Arms as he shall so receive, to Colonel "Curtenius, that they may be repaired, where it may "be necessary."[1]

It is not now known how many Arms were thus transferred to the Provincial Storekeeper; nor from whom they had been impressed; nor what disposition was subsequently made of them. But, because the Third Regiment of the New York Line in the Continental Army, which was commanded by Colonel Ritzema, was one of those, under General Alexander McDougal, who were engaged with the Royal Army, on Chatterton's Hill, a few months afterwards, and because Colonel Ritzema's Regiment was undoubtedly supplied with Arms, as far as they went, from those which had been "impressed" in Westchester-county and were thus called in—although the Provincial Congress had disallowed the Resolution of the Committee of Safety, under which these Arms had been forcibly taken from their respective owners, it will be seen that the Arms which had been thus seized were not returned to those from whom they had been taken—there was evidently a master-hand so skilfully directing the progress of events that those Arms which had been thus violently and illegally and wrongly taken from the farmers of Westchester-county were taken back to that County, to be employed in the defense of it, against the assaults of the common enemy.

On the twenty-ninth of May, Colonel Thomas Thomas informed the Provincial Congress that Elijah Hunter, who had been Second Lieutenant in Captain Mills's Company, from Bedford, during the Campaign of 1775,[2] and who was a member of the County Committee of 1776-77,[3] representing that Town, was desirous of raising a Grenadier Company, to be attached to the Regiment of Westchester-county Militia, of which Thomas was the Colonel; and it was intended that, of that Company, Elijah Hunter should be the Captain;[4] Richard Sackett, the First Lieutenant;[5] Silas Miller, the Second Lieutenant;[5] and Jeremiah Lounsberry the Ensign.[5] The Colonel also solicited Commissions for all these aspirants to official authority, although there was not the slightest pretense that a single Private had been enlisted; and, of course, since a Thomas had made the request, the Commissions were "immediately issued to those gentlemen."[6]

On the first of June 1776, the Continental Congress made a requisition for six thousand men from the Colonies of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, "to be employed to reinforce "the Army in Canada and to keep up the communi- "cation with that Province;"[7] on the third of June, a second requisition was made, by the same Congress, for thirteen thousand, eight hundred men from the Colonies of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, and New Jersey, "to be employed to reinforce the "Army at New York;"[8] the eleven Battalions already "raised and ordered to be raised for the protec- "tion of the four New England Colonies," were declared to be "sufficient," for that purpose;[9] and a third requisition was also made for ten thousand men from the Colonies of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, "for a Flying Camp, to be immediately "established in the Middle Colonies."[10]

Of these several requisitions, one Battalion of seven hundred and fifty men was called from the Colony of New York, for the Canadian service;[11] and for the reinforcement of the Army at New York, that Colony was required to furnish three thousand men.[12] All were to be taken from the Militia of the respective Colonies; all were to be "engaged" only "to the first "day of December next, unless sooner discharged by "Congress;" and the pay of the men was to commence on the days on which they respectively left their homes.[13]

[4] Elijah Hunter was evidently an ambitious man. In addition to the Commission, referred to in the text, he managed, on the twenty-first of November, 1776, to obtain the command of the Sixth Company of the Second, or Van Cortlandt's, Regiment of the New York Line, in the Continental Army of 1776-77, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Committee, xxv., 761;) and he retired from the service, fifteen days afterwards, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Committee, xxv., 851, 854, xxxv., 321;) contenting himself, thenceforth, as we shall see, hereafter, with hankering after authority to continue the persecution of his peaceful neighbors, which Ezekiel Hawley had previously failed to secure. (Vide pages 350-353, ante.)

[5] Of Richard Sackett, Silas Miller, and Jeremiah Lounsberry no other mention than this appears to have been made, on the military records of the Colony or State. It is probable they were stars of the smallest magnitude.

Of the nine Provincial Brigadier-generals which these requisitions would bring into the service, one was assigned to the Colony of New York ;[1] and, as will be seen, hereafter, a lively canvass for the place was immediately commenced by John Morin Scott, of the City of New York, and by the President of the Provincial Congress, Brigadier-general Nathaniel Woodhull, of Suffolk.

These several requisitions, with an elaborate appeal from the President of the Continental Congress, were laid before the Provincial Congress of New York, on the morning of the seventh of June ;[2] and on the afternoon of the same day, a Committee who had been appointed for the purpose, during the morning session, made a Report, apportioning the requisitions which had been made by the Continental Congress on the Colony of New York, in due proportions, on the several Counties, the number apportioned to Westchester-county having been three hundred men.[3] On the following Sunday afternoon, the levies which had been made on Westchester and Orange-counties and Suffolk were ordered to constitute one Battalion ; and, for that Battalion, Westchester-county was ordered to appoint or nominate, one Colonel, four Captains, four First Lieutenants, and four Second Lieutenants.[4]

Although the Provincial Congress was "of opinion "that the several levies," apportioned on the different Counties, "consisting of volunteers, would be most "advancive of the public service, yet" it evidently knew that volunteers could not be had, even under such a stress of circumstances as then existed and in so "glorious a cause ;" and drafts from the respective Regiments, in each County, were also provided for, in instances where deficiencies should be found; and every possible measure was employed, to secure the armament and general equipment of the men.[5]

Information had no sooner been received by the Provincial Congress of New York, that a Brigadier-general was to be appointed by that body, for the command of the four Battalions which were to be raised in New York, than it was announced "the "Congress conceived it necessary towards carrying "the several Resolutions and requisitions of the "Continental Congress into execution, to appoint a "Brigadier-general and a Major of Brigade of the "Militia of Westchester-county"—the Congress did not reveal in what that declared "necessity" existed, however; and as those offices had been created on the twenty-second of the preceding August[6] and had not been occupied, during the entire intervening period, while neither pay nor emoluments were derivable from them, it is very evident that that Brigadier-general and that Major of Brigade became a "neces- "sity," very suddenly, and only when a contingent possibility appeared that they, if they were already in place, might receive the appointments to the new-created offices of the same respective ranks, in the Brigade of Militia which the Continental Congress had called into the service of the Continent, with the honors, the pay, the emoluments, and the increased social and political influences which they would certainly ensure. Not a moment was lost, therefore—the Congress was not even permitted to refer the letter from the President of the Continental Congress and the exceedingly important enclosures which it covered, to a Committee, for consideration and report —when, with indecent haste, some ready made Certificates which had evidently been kept on hand, ready for immediate use, whenever they should be needed, were laid before the Provincial Congress, showing that, in the opinion of the enlightened County Committee, in Westchester-county, Lewis Morris was just the man for a Brigadier-general's command, and that Lewis Morris, Junior, could not be excelled as a Major of Brigade. With such intelligent judges of military matters and of the requirements of those who were to command and handle large bodies of soldiers, as were seen in the rustic Committee of the County of Westchester, 1776–77, and with Gouverneur Morris, the step-brother and uncle of the two ambitious Westchesterians, present, and directing the work, how could the Provincial Congress do less than to elect them? The record says, "the Congress conceive it necessary towards carrying "these Resolutions of the Continental Congress into "execution, to appoint a Brigadier-general and a "Major of Brigade of the Militia of Westchester- "county ; and Lewis Morris, Esqr., being thought the "most proper person for a Brigadier-general of the "Militia of that County,[7] and having been recom- "mended by the County Committee, for that pur- "pose, and Lewis Morris, Junior, Esqr., having been "also formerly recommended by the said Committee "for an appointment, to be the Major of Brigade of "the Militia of that County ;

"RESOLVED : That Lewis Morris, Esqr., be ap- "pointed Brigadier-general of the Militia of the "County of Westchester, and that Lewis Morris, "Junr., Esqr., be appointed Major of Brigade of the "Militia of the said County."

The Secretaries were ordered to engross the Commissions ; and that, properly attested, those Commissions be "sent to those gentlemen with all possible

[7] As the Militia Bill which the Provincial Congress had adopted on the twenty-second of August, 1775, had massed "the Militia of the Counties "of Duchess and Westchester" [into] "one other Brigade," it would seem that Duchess-county ought to have been consulted, in this matter; but, very evidently, it was not.

"despatch,"[1] although the Offices were only those of the Militia, not in active service and, with a small exception, not likely to be so. The "despatch" was "necessary," however, since a full-fledged Brigadier-general would be a more imposing candidate, when the election should be held for the Brigadier-general of the four Battalions who had been called into the service of the Continent; and it was not a characteristic of the Morris family to be backward when its own interests required attention and action, at the front. We shall see, hereafter, how well this well-laid scheme was counter-schemed by more astute aspirants; how General Lewis Morris reaped all his military honors, what there were of them, in the Militia of Westchester-county;[2] and that Brigade-major Lewis Morris, Junior, secured all the laurels which he possessed, as an Aide of General Greene, a place for which he was indebted to the personal favor of that Officer.

Two days after the unseemly movement of the Morrises, [June 9, 1776,] the Provincial Congress proceeded to the election of a Brigadier-general for the command of the three thousand men who had been called from the Militia of New York, for the reinforcement of the Continental Army, under General Washington, who was then in that Colony; but General Lewis Morris, notwithstanding his artfulness—that species of "art" of which his step-brother, Gouverneur, had written to Mr. Penn, in May, 1774—was not even mentioned—even Westchester-county indicated that he was not a favorite, beyond a known limit; and its Deputation in the Provincial Congress did not pander to his inordinate ambition. The canvass was, indeed, confined to two candidates, John Morin Scott, of the City of New York, one of that celebrated "triumvirate" of the earlier periods of the Revolution and a lawyer of the highest standing, and "General"[3] Nathaniel Woodhull, of Suffolk, a veteran of the French and Indian War, and, at the time now under notice, President of the Provincial Congress. The canvass was evidently conducted, as we have already stated, with spirit; but the influence of the Counties of Westchester, New York, Tryon, Charlotte, and Albany, in behalf of Scott, was too great to be overcome by that of the Counties of Orange, Suffolk, Duchess, and Ulster, for Woodhull, the Counties of Richmond, Kings, Queens, Cumberland, and Gloucester having been absent; and the former was thus elected,[4] admirably filling the political demand, but not, in the slightest degree, promising to make the Brigade efficient or useful, as soldiers—like other lawyers, some of them within our acquaintance, the uniform of a General was attractive to him; he secured an office of distinction; and he continued to occupy it, until, on the establishment of the new form of Government, after having been defeated in his canvass for the office of Governor, he was transferred into the more comfortable, if not the more profitable place, of Secretary of State, which he occupied until 1789, and was succeeded by his son, who held the place until 1798.

On the following day, [June 10, 1776,] the Provincial Congress elected the Field-officers of the Regiment in which the levies from Westchester-county were to be enrolled; and Samuel Drake, who was then commanding the skeleton Regiment of Westchester-county Minute-men, in the Continental Service,[5] was elected Colonel; John Hulbert, of Suffolk,[6] was elected Lieutenant-colonel; Moses Hetfield, of Orange-county, was elected Major.[7] The Line-officers of the Regiment and the other details of its organization of the Regiment will be noticed, hereafter.

A matter of particular interest to the inhabitants of Westchester-county occurred during the session of the third Provincial Congress; and it may properly be mentioned in this narrative.

It will be remembered that, on the suggestion of General Lee, a Magazine of Provisions was ordered to be established, in Westchester-county; that the Delegates from that County were authorized to purchase, on the account of the Provincial Congress, the Pork and Beef which were desired; that, subsequently, Colonel Gilbert Drake, the Chairman of the County Committee and one of the Deputies from the County, so managed the affair that all the purchases

[2] Bolton said Lewis Morris was "a Brigadier-general in the Conti- "nental Army;" and in his arrangement of the words, if they mean anything, that he held that Office before he was sent to the Continental Congress of 1775, (History of Westchester-county, original edition, ii., 312; the same, second edition, ii., 428;) but we find no competent evidence of the truth of the former statement; and evidence is not necessary to show the entire untruth of the latter.

[3] Nathaniel Woodhull appears to have been a Colonel of the Suffolk Militia, who was "recommended or nominated to our Deputies in Pro- "vincial Congress for a Brigadier-general," by the Committees of the western Towns in Suffolk, in a meeting held at Smithtown, on the seventh of September, 1775, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 216;) but a very careful examination of the Journals of the Provincial Congress and of its Committee of Safety, from that date until the earliest mention of him as a "Brigadier general" which we have seen, has failed to produce the slightest evidence of his election to that or any other military authority, beyond his Colonelcy. We incline to the opinion, therefore, that, although he commanded the Suffolk and Queens Militia, it was only as the senior Colonel, or Colonel-commandant; and that he was only a "General," "by courtesy," as it was called.

[6] It is doubtful if he ever joined the Regiment, (Colonel Henry B. Livingston to the Committee of Arrangement, "FISHKILL, 24 Novr., 1776;") and he resigned, on the ninth of December, 1776, (John Hulbert to the Committee of Arrangement, "FISH KILL, December 9, 1776.")

William Goforth, who had served honorably in Canada, was elected to the vacancy, (Minutes of the Committee of Arrangement, "FISHKILL, "Jany 13, 1777;") but, in February, he declined to continue in the place, (Philip Van Cortlandt to the Committee of Arrangement, "FISHKILL, "Feby. 25, 1777.")

[7] Moses Hetfield was Captain of the Company of Minute-men, at Goshen, in September, 1775; (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 133;) in February, 1776, he was nominated as First Major of the Regiment of Goshen, (the same, xxvii., 77;) to which office he was subsequently appointed, (the same, xxvii., 135.)

of Flour, Beef, and Pork, with all the golden opportunities for personal profits which were thus afforded, were concentrated in his own hands; that there were, consequently, rival purchasing Agents, by whom and by the shrewd farmers, the prices of those articles were so greatly advanced that the Committee of Safety was constrained to interfere; and that, after the various buyers, on the account of the Congress, had thus secured their several harvests of the official plunder, the authority was suspended, the Magazine, very soon after, being declared unnecessary;[1] and the provisions which had been bought, at high prices, were thrown on the market again, for such prices as, under such circumstances, could be obtained for them, from the Contractors and Commissaries of the Continental Army.[2] Under the Rules of the Provincial Congress, the accounts and the vouchers had to be audited, before the former could be closed; and Colonel Gilbert Drake, who had endeavored to supersede his associates, in making the necessary purchases, could not produce a sufficient amount of those vouchers to balance his accounts—he had received three thousand pounds, in money; fifty pounds of that sum he could not account for; he was mean enough to hesitate, when the missing fifty pounds were officially called for, preferring, rather to go down to posterity, through all time, as a defaulter;[3] and the matter was laid before the Congress, to be patched up, in some way which would spare him from paying the one hundred and twenty-five dollars, which had disappeared, he did not know how.

The subject was one of those which, by hook or by crook, the Secretaries of the Provincial Congress were apt to pass, without making an official record of them; and we have found no mention of it, on the Journal of the Provincial Congress, until a special Committee who had been previously appointed "to "take into consideration the case of Colonel Gilbert "Drake, relative to a loss of fifty pounds he sustained "in receiving and paying out the monies deposited in "his hands, for the purpose of purchasing and laying "up in store a certain quantity of salted Pork, pur-"suant to an Order of the late Provincial Congress," made its report, on the fifteenth of June. In that Report, the facts were duly recited, very much to the depreciation of the vindictive Colonel's manliness, although it recommended that he be allowed for his loss, and that he be also compensated "for his other "services," the latter having been asked for, by no others of the Deputies who had also traversed the County and had made similar purchases and had been contented with what they had respectively made, in the operations. The Congress declared, as its opinion, "that Colonel Gilbert Drake sustained a loss, which "accrued in receiving and paying out the public "money, in purchasing Pork, by order of the late "Provincial Congress," without, however, assuming the loss referred to; and then it voted the gallant Colonel, "the sum of seventy pounds, as a compensa-"tion for his services, expenses, and commissions, in "purchasing the said Pork, as aforesaid," and leaving him officially "whitewashed," with twenty pounds and what, besides, he had made in the operations, snugly secured in his pocket-book. It was proven, in that instance, that influence was useful, even among "patriots;" and the Chairman of Westchester-county's County Committee, in the same instance, found it well to have been a Drake.[4]

As we have already stated,[5] the third Provincial Congress was alarmed by the entrance of General Howe into the harbor of New York, and precipitately disbanded, without a formal adjournment, although it had previously provided for a reassembling of the Deputies, at the Court House, in the White Plains, on the following Tuesday, [July 2, 1776.] As it did not thus resume its work, it ceased to exist; and, whether for good or for evil, the third Provincial Congress and all which it did and all which it failed to do became subjects of history.

* * * * * *

The latter half of the year 1776 was one of the most eventful periods in the history of America, if not in that of the entire civilized world; and in the great drama of political and military events, teeming with immediate interest and with ultimate importance, and occupying only that short half-year, Westchester-county, in New York, and those who were, then, within the limits of that ancient County—the peaceful and industrious farmers whose homes were there, as well those strangers, armed or unarmed, who had gone into the County, no matter for what purpose—occupy places which were, then, as conspicuous as, since the close of that period, they have been well-known, from one extreme of Christendom to the other.

On the second of July,[6] General Howe and the army which he commanded, whose entrance into the harbor of New York, a few days before, has been already noticed,[7] occupied Staten-Island—Richmond-county—with the military and naval forces which he had brought from Halifax, say seven thousand, five hundred, and fifty-six, rank and file, including those who were sick;[1] and, as has been already stated, the inhabitants of that beautiful island, remembering the sentence of outlawry which had been pronounced against them, by the Provincial Congress, and the multiplied outrages to which they had been subjected, on warrants of the same body, by those who claimed to be the special defenders of the Rights of Man; and being, also, relieved from apprehensions of a renewal of their sufferings, "testified their "loyalty by all the means in their power," furnishing the new-comers with "fresh Provisions, Carriages, "Horses, etc.,"[2] and meriting, from him, the high praise which General Howe awarded to them, in his despatches to the Home Government.[3]

It is proper that we shall say, in this connection, that General Howe, on his arrival at Sandy-hook, on the twenty-fifth of June, had been met by Governor Tryon and many others, "fast friends to Govern-"ment," from whom he had received "the fullest "information of the state of the rebels," and of their situation and defences, in the City of New York and on Long Island. His inquiries, concerning the face of the country between Gravesend and Brooklyn and concerning the military works which had been thrown up, had afforded information which had been so entirely satisfactory that he had determined to land the Army, at Gravesend, immediately, and to move, from that base, without the slightest delay and with only the small effective force which was then under his command, on the insufficient works which, at that early day, had been constructed in Kings-county. For the prosecution of that purpose, two days after the arrival of the Fleet and the Army, at Sandy Hook, [July 1, 1776,] the former had been moved up to Gravesend-bay, now so universally known to New Yorkers as one of their Summer resorts, in order that the troops might be landed, at daybreak, on the following morning, [July 2, 1776,] and, thence, make the first movement in the Campaign, against the insignificant works and yet more insignificant force which, at that time, were clustered around Brooklyn.[4]

It is not now known, if it was ever known, what the result of that early movement of the Royal Army would have been, had General Howe's purposes been duly executed; but there can be little doubt that, with no more than the small force which was then under his command and with the reinforcements which an early success would have surely brought to him, from Richmond, Kings, and Queens-counties, the insufficiently armed and ill-appointed handful of half-hearted men whom General Washington commanded or endeavored to command, would have been entirely overcome; and that, thereby, the physical strength of the Rebellion would have been surely broken.[5] But "the bright designs" of God had been directed to an entirely different end; and the uplifted hand of General Howe fell, harmlessly, without striking the meditated and well-aimed and powerful blow—during the night, after the Fleet had anchored in Gravesend-bay, and while the preparations for landing the troops, at the approaching daybreak, were in progress, and while the soldiery, smarting under the disgrace which had befallen it, at Boston, was eagerly preparing to recover its professional respectability, in an encounter, in the field, with those by whom it had been, there, humiliated, somebody, history does not say whom although intelligent conjecture undoubtedly supplies the information, approached the commanding General with "particular information of a strong pass, upon a "ridge of craggy heights, covered with wood, that lay "in the route the Army must take, only two miles "distant from the front of the enemy's encampment "and seven from Gravesend, which the rebels would "undoubtedly occupy before the King's troops could

[4] General Washington's means for obtaining intelligence were very defective—how should it have been otherwise, among those whom the Provincial Congress had soured by the outrages inflicted on them or on their neighbors and friends? He was not informed of the arrival of General Howe, until three days after it had occurred; and then only through information received through a prisoner, whom the Schuyler, armed sloop, had captured.

On the same day on which that intelligence was received by him, General Washington wrote to the Continental Congress: "I could wish "General Howe and his armament not to arrive yet, as not more than "a thousand Militia have come in, and our whole force, including the "troops at all the detached posts and on board the armed vessels, "which are comprehended in our Returns, is but small and inconsider-"able when compared with the extensive lines they are to defend and, "most probably, the Army that he brings. I have no further intelli-"gence about him than what the Lieutenant" [Davison, of the armed "sloop Schuyler] "mentions; but it is extremely probable his accounts "and conjectures are true," (General Washington to the President of the Continental Congress, "NEW YORK, 27 June, 1776," postscript dated "June "28th."]

On the following day, General Washington wrote thus: "I suppose "the whole fleet will be in, within a day or two." [It all arrived on that day.] "I am hopeful, before they are prepared to attack, that I "shall get some reinforcements. Be that as it may, I shall attempt "to make the best disposition I can of our troops, in order to give them "a proper reception, and prevent the ruin and destruction they are "meditating against us," (General Washington to the President of the Continental Congress," NEW YORK, 29 June, 1776.")

A few days after General Washington had thus conveyed the intelligence of the weakness of his command, to the Continental Congress, the Adjutant-general of the Army is said to have written to a member of the same Congress, on the same subject, in these words: "With an "Army of force, before, and a secret one, behind, we stand on a point "of land with six thousand old troops, if a year's service of about half "can entitle them to the name, and about fifteen hundred new levies, "of this Province, many disaffected and more doubtful. In this situ-"ation we are: every man in the Army, from the General to the Pri-"vate, acquainted with our true situation, is exceedingly discouraged. "Had I known the true posture of affairs, no consideration would have "tempted me to have taken an active part of this scene; and this sen-"timent is universal," (Adjutant-general Joseph Reed "to a Member of "Congress," "NEW YORK, July 4, 1776," quoted by Dr. Gordon, in his History of the Rise, Progress and Establishment of the Independence of the United States of America, Edition, London: 1788, ii., 278.)

[5] "General Howe is sufficiently strong, considering the goodness of his "troops, to make a successful attempt upon the Americans; but being "in daily expectation of the reinforcements from Europe, he will un-"doubtedly remain inactive till their arrival," (Gordon's History, etc., London edition, ii, 278.)

"get up to it; and, from the minutest description, "judging an attack upon this post, so strong by "nature and so near the front of the enemy's works, "to be too hazardous an attempt, before the arrival of "the troops with Commodore Hotham,"[1] [from Europe,] "daily expected," the General "declined "the undertaking;" and, consequently, the day-break came and went without the promised debarkation of the Army; the Fleet weighed its anchors, "passed the "Narrows," came too at the watering place, where it again cast its anchors; the Army was landed on Staten Island, as already stated;[2] the first mistake of the Campaign was committed; the first disastrous delay was inaugurated; General Washington and his feeble command were, for the time, spared; and the Rebellion was not suppressed. With an abundant naval force under his command, General Howe commanded and controlled all the waters which were near him; and Gravesend-bay need not have been regarded as the only base which he could have occupied—he could have turned the flank of any or of all the lines, either of hills or of armed rebels, and have landed his command either in front or on the rear of either of the latter, as he should have determined; and he could have led his abundantly supplied, admirably disciplined, and thoroughly willing command to an immediate and effectual success, had not his willing ears listened to those who inclined to Peace, and had not his sympathies controlled his judgment and overcome his sense of duty with the hope that the day of reconciliation—of reconciliation to be secured through himself—was not yet passed. He hesitated; and the golden opportunity passed away, never to be returned.

On the same second of July, and while the Royal Army was thus occupying Staten Island, the Continental Congress, at Philadelphia, was considering the subject of Independence.

It will be remembered by the reader that, in 1774, when the County of Westchester was invited, by the Committee of Fifty-one, in the City of New York, to unite with that Committee in sending a Delegation to the proposed Congress of the Continent which had been called for the purpose of securing a proper and united opposition to the measures of the Ministry and, as far as possible, a redress of the grievances of the Colonies, the great body of the farmers in that County disregarded that invitation; and that the very few who accepted it, either personally or by their local Committees, assembled at the Court-house, in the White Plains; called one of the principal landholders of the County, who was, also, at that time a Representative of the County in the General Assembly of the Colony, Frederic Philipse by name, to the Chair; and signified the opposition to the measures of the Home Government, of, at least, those who were present, by authorizing the Delegation who had been elected to represent the City and County of New York, to represent, at the same time, the County of Westchester, in that general assemblage of Delegates.[3]

It will be remembered, also, that the General Assembly of the Colony, which was convened in January, 1775, although there was not, within it, a single "friend of the Government," every member having been an avowed member of the party of the Opposition, had presented the lamentable spectacle of a great party divided into factions, each seeking to secure the same great result, but by distinct and radically different means. In the conflicts of factions, in that body, it will be remembered that no more consistent and no more steadfast opponents of the Home and Colonial Governments were seen than the two Representatives of the County of Westchester and the other two, who represented, respectively, the Manor of Cortlandt and the Borough Town of Westchester, although Frederic Philipse, representing the County, and Isaac Wilkins, representing the Borough, were of one faction, and John Thomas, also representing the County, and Pierre Van Cortlandt, representing the Manor of Cortlandt, were of the other and opposing faction.[4]

At the adjournment of the House, in April, 1775, these four gentlemen appeared to have returned to their respective homes, and to have remained there, without immediately participating in the political events of the day, except in the instance of Frederic Philipse and Isaac Wilkins, who, eight days after the adjournment of the General Assembly, united in the Declaration and Protest against the assembling of the Provincial Convention for the sole purpose of electing Delegates to a second Congress of the Continent, which Declaration and Protest a large number of the inhabitants of the County of Westchester then signed and published.[5]

It will be remembered, also, that among the earliest of those whom the handful of office-seekers, in the interest of themselves and of the Rebellion, proscrib-

[1] Commodore Hotham did not reach New York until the twelfth of August, as will be seen, hereafter.

Stedman said, "the troops thus landed," [on Staten Island,] "consisted "of two Battalions of Light Infantry; two of Grenadiers; the Fourth, "Fifth, Tenth, Seventeenth, Twenty-second, Twenty-third, Twenty-sev-"enth, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-eighth, Fortieth, Forty-second, Forty-third, "Forty-fourth, Forty fifth, Forty-ninth, Fifty-second, Fifty-sixth, Sixty-"third, and Sixty-fourth Regiments of Foot; parts of the Forty-sixth "and Seventy-first Regiments; and the Seventeenth Regiment of Light "Dragoons. There were, besides, two Companies of Volunteers, raised "at New-York, consisting of one hundred men each. The total amount "was nine thousand men"—in which latter statement, in general terms, he is contradicted by General Howe, in his Observations, (vide pages, 367, 368, ante.) although he gave the aggregate, including the Officers and Staff, while General Howe included only "the Rank and File of his command.

ed, because of his action in the General Assembly—notwithstanding it was in an earnest opposition to the Ministry and in an equally earnest support of the demands of the Colony for a redress of grievances—because of his Declaration and Protest at the White Plains, and, undoubtedly, because of his understood authorship of some political tracts which were obnoxious to the controling political faction, Isaac Wilkins was obliged to seek personal safety in flight—he left his family and his estate and found a refuge in London.[1]

After having spent some months in retirement, Pierre Van Cortlandt resumed his place in the political turmoil of the period; while Frederic Philipse and John Thomas, the former at Yonkers and the other in the Harrison Precinct, are not known to have taken any part whatever, in the partisan operations of that period.

When the spirit of proscription was introduced into Westchester-county, destroying the peace which had previously prevailed among its rural inhabitants, Frederic Philipse was named among those who, without the slightest evidence of any wrong-doing, were to be arrested and dealt with.[2] He does not appear to have been disturbed, however, until the organization of the notorious "Committee to Detect Conspiracies," of which mention has been already made;[3] when, at the head of the List of Suspected Persons, in Westchester-county, who were designated as the victims of that American Inquisition, was placed the name of "*FREDERIC PHILIPSE×"—the asterisk before the name indicating that he was "to be Summoned;" and the cross which followed the name indicating that he was "to be Arrested."[4]

The Minutes of the Committee also indicate that on the twenty-seventh of June, 1776, an Order was made by that body, "That Summonses issue against the "following persons as inimical to the Cause and "rights of America, returnable on Wednesday the "third day of July next at ten o'clock in the forenoon "of the same day, viz: Frederick Philipse and "Samuel Merritt, which said Summonses signed by "all the members present af[d] were delivered to the "Secretary with directions to deliver them to the "messenger to be served."[5]

The Summons thus issued was served on Frederic Philipse, at Philipsborough, the present City of Yonkers, on Saturday evening, the twenty-ninth of June; and, on the following Tuesday, [July 2, 1776,] he made the following reply to the Committee:

"PHILIPSBOROUGH, July 2, 1776.

"GENTLEMEN:

"I was served on Saturday evening last with a "paper signed by you, in which you suggest that "you are authorized by the Congress to summon cer-"tain persons to appear before you, whose conduct "had been represented as inimical to the rights of "America, of which number you say I am one.

"Who it is that has made such a representation or "upon what particular facts it is founded, as you have "not stated them, it is impossible for me to imagine; "but, considering my situation and the near and "intimate ties and connexions which I have in this "country,[6] which can be secured and rendered

[6] Frederic Philipse was a native of the Colony; and the family had been well known residents of New York for more than a century preceding the date of this letter, and was connected, by marriage, with the other leading families of America—even George Washington had not scrupled to seek an alliance with it, if tradition speaks truly.

The well-known Rev. Timothy Dwight, S. T. D., President of Yale-college, writing of Yonkers, in the Autumn of 1811, said, "it is remarkable for nothing, except having been the residence of the family of "Philipse, one of the most distinguised of those which came, as Colonists, "from the United Netherlands. Colonel Philipse, the last branch "resident in this country, I knew well. He was a worthy and respectable man, not often excelled in personal and domestic amiableness. Mrs. Philipse was an excellent woman; and the children, the "eldest of whom was about seventeen, gave every promise of treading "in the same steps," (Travels, in New England and New York, iii., "442, 443.)

Mr. Bolton (History of Westchester-county, Second Edition, i., 523,) quoting from an original manuscript, in the handwriting of John Jay, said that that most zealous and most malignant of all Mr. Philipse's persecutors, said of him, probably in the later years of the life of the writer, "He was a well-tempered, amiable man; and a kind, benevolent landlord. He had a taste for gardening, planting, &c., and employed "much time and money in that way. * * * At the commencement "of our Revolution, he, Frederick Philipse, was inclined to the Whigs, "but was afterwards persuaded to favor the Tories.* He was removed "to Connecticut, on his parole. Nothing could have been more favorable to him, circumstanced as he then was, than to be placed in such "a state of tranquil neutrality. On a certain occasion, he obtained permission to go to New York, while in possession of the enemy. On "being afterwards required to return, he very improperly and unwisely "yielded to the importunities of certain of his friends, and refused to "return. His estate was confiscated."

Sabine, notwithstanding his notorious bitterness, repeated the story of the moral worth of this unwieldy, blind man, who lived on his estate, taking no part whatever in the partisan movements of the period. (Loyalists of the American Revolution, original edition, 537, 538; revised edition, ii., 186, 187.)

The persecution of Frederic Philipse and the robbery of his family, mainly through the two Jays, is a subject which some one will, hereafter, be very likely to examine and expose, in all its native ugliness, to the censure of the world.

*No one knew better than John Jay that there was another cause than that named, which led Frederic Philipse to dissent from the doings of John Jay, James Duane, Governeur Morris, et al. Frederic Philipse continued to be a member of the Colonial party of the Opposition, in New York, until, by the advice of the Committee of which John Jay was one of the master spirits and the Chairman, he was seized by the military power and sent into exile; and the scheme and trick by means of which those exiles who had been allowed to go into New York, did not receive the notices which Governor Trumbull sent for their return, affording a pretext for the sequestration of their large estates, was not a secret to those who were, then, in the ring of "patriotic" money-seekers, nor is it a secret to us, now.

Common respect for the truth should have led John Jay to have told the whole of the story concerning Frederic Philipse's visit to New York and his stay there, or to have said nothing concerning it.

As the Provincial Congress, as well as its Committee to Detect Conspiracies, had hurriedly left the City of New York before the day appointed for the hearing of Frederic Philipse and Samuel Merritt;[2] and as only one of the members of the Committee had lingered, after the Congress and the Committee had retired;[3] the proceedings against them, at that time, were evidently suspended—the suspension of the persecution of Mr. Philipse, however, was speedily followed by a similar proceeding, of which mention will be made, hereafter.

The fourth Provincial Congress was directed to meet at the Court-house, in the White Plains, on until the following day, Tuesday, the ninth of July, the Deputies from a majority of the Counties appeared, produced their Credentials, and organized the Congress. General Nathaniel Woodhull was chosen for its President; and John McKesson and Robert Benson, the Secretaries of the former Congresses, were continued in the same places, in this.[5]

There were only five Deputies present from the City of New York, although twenty-one had been elected; but every member of the Deputation from Westchester-county—Colonel Lewis Graham, Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt, Major Ebenezer Lockwood, William Paulding, Captain Jonathan Platt, Samuel Haviland, Zebadiah Mills, Colonel Gilbert Drake, Jonathan G. Tompkins, General Lewis Morris, and Gouverneur Morris—was present.[6] Of the latter Captain Platt, Colonel Van Cortlandt, Zebadiah Mills, and General Lewis Morris were new members.[7]

After a letter from the Delegation of the Colony in the Continental Congress, bearing date the second of July, "on the subject of Independence, and request-
"ing instructions from this Congress,"[8] had been read, a second letter from the Delegation, of a subsequent date, "enclosing the Declaration of Independence," was also read, and referred to a Committee consisting of John Jay and Abraham Brasier, of the City of New York, Abraham Yates, Junior, of Albany-county, and John Sloss Hobart and William Smith, of Suffolk.[9]

The Declaration which was thus referred, was a duly authenticated copy of A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, of which document mention has been already made; and, with its authentication, in extenso, it was entered at length on the Journal of the Congress.[10]

A very important letter, concerning prisoners of Monday, the eighth of July, 1776;[4] but it was not

[3] Judge Jones, who was, also, one of those whom the Committee had summoned, related the fact that, on the thirtieth of June, Governeur Morris was the only member of the Committee who had not left the City, in the general panic. History of New York during the Revolutionary War, ii., 296.)

In view of Governeur Morris's great anxiety to go into the City of New York, then a military post of the Royal Troops, very soon afterwards, it will hardly be necessary for us to inquire why he was the only member of the Provincial Congress who voluntarily exposed himself to supposed danger from the approach of the Royal Army.

Very singularly, and without the slightest authority except that of J. Warren Tompkins, Bolton, (History of Westchester-county, original edition, ii., 359; the same, second edition, ii., 564,) considered the Congress which was assembled, at the White Plains, on the ninth of July, 1776, as the same body as that which had been in session, in the City of New York, from the eighteenth of May until the thirtieth of June, preceding. In other words, both these learned historians regarded the third and the fourth Provincial Congresses as one and the same body.

[6] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Tuesday, P.M., WHITE PLAINS, "July 9, 1776."

[7] The Journal of the Congress, July 9, placed Colonel Van Cortlandt's name at the head of the list of "the new members present" who "took the general oath of secrecy," although the Colonel had headed the Deputation from Westchester-county, in the third Provincial Congress, as will be seen by reference to the Credentials of that Delegation, in the Journal of that Congress, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., A.M., May 18, "1776."

The explanation of that apparent contradiction may be found in the fact that that short lived third Provincial Congress was dissolved before Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt took his seat in it or was qualified to do so, by his taking the oaths of the office of Deputy.

war and those who were, also, confined in the Jail, in the City of New York, for debt,[1] was received from General Washington, and referred to a special Committee;[2] and after the transaction of some other business, the Congress adjourned until the afternoon.

On the afternoon of the same day, [Tuesday July 9, 1776,] the Committee to whom had been referred the letter from the Delegation from the Colony in the Continental Congress and the Declaration which that letter had covered, made a Report, thereon, in the following words:

"IN CONVENTION OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,[3]
"WHITE PLAINS, July 9th, 1776.

"RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY, That the reasons "assigned by the Continental Congress for declaring "the United Colonies free and independent States "are cogent and conclusive; and that, while we "lament the cruel necessity which has rendered that "measure unavoidable, we approve the same and "will, at the risk of our lives and fortunes, join with "the other Colonies in supporting it.

"RESOLVED, That a copy of the said Declaration "and the aforegoing Resolution be sent to the Chair-"man of the Committee of the County of Westches-"ter, with order to publish the same, with beat of "drum, at this place, on Thursday next," [July 11, 1775]; "and to give directions that it be published, "with all convenient speed, in the several Districts "within the said County; and that copies thereof be "forthwith transmitted to the other County Com-"mittees within the State of New York, with orders to "cause the same to be published in the several "Districts of their respetive Counties.

"RESOLVED, That five hundred copies of the "Declaration of Independence, with the two last men-"tioned Resolutions of this Congress for approving "and proclaiming the same, be published in hand-"bills and sent to all the County Committees in this "State.

"RESOLVED, That the Delegates of this State, in "Continental Congress, be and they are hereby "authorized to consent to and adopt all such mea-"sures as they may deem conducive to the happiness "and welfare of the United States of America."

It is said that the Report which was thus made by the Committee was unanimously adopted by the Congress; and, further, that an Order was made by the Congress directing that copies of the Resolutions which constituted the Report should be transmitted to the Continental Congress.[4]

The reader need only to be reminded that the evident author and the known supporters of this series of Resolutions were the same author who, twenty-eight days previously, had written, and almost entirely the same individual Deputies who, at the same time, had voted, that the authority of "the good "people of this Colony" was, then, necessary to enable the Provincial Congress or the Delegates of the Colony in the Continental Congress "to declare this "Colony to be and continue independent of the Crown "of Great Britain;" that, in the absence of any such authority already delegated to themselves or to the Colony's Delegates in the Continental Congress, it was, at that time, considered proper and necessary to ask for authority to do so, if it should be subsequently considered expedient and proper to make such a declaration of Independence, in behalf of that "good "people" of whom they, then, acknowledged themselves to have been only agents or deputies; that, for reasons which will be remembered, no such authority, then nor subsequently, had been delegated to either themselves or to the Colony's Delegates in the Continental Congress, by that "good people" whose servants and representatives both they and the Delegates referred to acknowledged themselves to have been; and that, on the later occasion, which is now under notice, themselves having been the witnesses, they were quite as much without authority, legal or revolutionary, "to declare this Colony to be and "continue independent of the Crown of Great "Britain," as they had been, on the former occasion, of which mention has been made. If it had been an act of usurpation to have declared the Independence of the Colony, without the "consent" of the Colony, previously given, on the former occasion, how much less flagrant was the act, also without having obtained that "consent," on the later occasion, which is now under consideration? Were John Jay and those whom

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Tuesday, 9th July, 1776."

[3] In view of the fact that the body of which that Committee was a part and by whom it had been appointed and to whom it was to report, was, specifically, "a Provincial Congress for the Province of New "York;" and because, at that time, there had been no change in the status of the Deputations composing the Congress, who represented nothing else than certain specified Counties, each Deputation representing only a single County; and because, at that time, the Colony of New York, could not be possibly regarded as a "State," the caption of that Report displayed nothing of historical or legal precision, nothing of accuracy of statement, and nothing of good taste.

The hand which wrote it could not be concealed; and if the form of the writing answered the present purpose of the writer of it, in certifying his new-born zeal for Independence to his astonished constituents, it would probably answer an equally good purpose in invalidating the instrument of which it was the head, in case that "Reconciliation" for which the writer of the Report did not cease to hope and to pray and to labor, should be effected.

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Tuesday, P.M., WHITE PLAINS, "July 9th, 1776."

The Journal of the Continental Congress, of Monday, the fifteenth of July, stated that a copy of the first, second, and fourth of these very important Resolutions had been enclosed, with a number of other papers, in a letter dated on the eleventh of that month, and sent to that Congress; that the letter and the papers which were enclosed in it were received by the Continental Congress, on Monday, the fifteenth of July; that the three Resolutions named were entered at length, on the Journal of that Congress; and that "the letter, with the papers enclosed," was referred to the Board of War.

he controlled really honest and sincere, when, on the eleventh of June, preceding, they made the confession of their legal incapacity to make such a declaration of Independence, unless with the previously-obtained "consent" of that "good people" whose servants and deputies they then acknowledged themselves to have been? If so, what possible ground is there for consistently regarding them as either honest or sincere, when, on the ninth of July, the occasion which is now under notice, while they were yet without that "consent" of their principals and constituents which had been previously regarded as essential to ensure validity to any such action, they actually, on their own motion, made such a declaration; severed the political connection which had previously existed between the Colony and Great Britain; abrogated all the Laws under which the Colony had been previously governed; deposed the previously existing Colonial Government; and usurped, to themselves, without the slightest limitation, the absolute and despotic control of every thing relating to the Civil, the Ecclesiastical, and the Military concerns of all who were within the Colony, not sparing even the consciences, the opinions, the properties, the liberties, or the lives of those who presumed to say to them, "What doest thou?"

We shall see, hereafter, how much of honesty and integrity there were, in either of these, when the series of Resolutions, on the subject of the Colony's independence, which is now under consideration, was written and adopted; how little the writer of them honestly and sincerely regarded those Resolutions as being, really, what they appeared to have been; and how little foundation in truth there is for the greater portion of what has been written concerning that writer and what he did, on the ninth of July, 1776.

Having disposed of the subject of Independence in the curt and crispy Resolution which headed the series which was reported by the Committee, the Provincial Congress turned to other subjects of vastly less importance; and, two days afterwards, on Thursday, the eleventh of July, very probably, no record of the fact having been found, the publication of the Declaration was made, officially, at the White Plains, in conformity with the second Resolution of the series, on that subject, which had been adopted by the Congress.[1]

The great importance of that Resolution which gave the sanction of the Colony of New York to the Resolution for Independence which the Congress of the Continent had adopted on the second of July, was seen in the immediate abrogation of all the forms of Law and Government which had previously been seen throughout the Colony, from the earlier period of the settlement by Europeans within its territory; and the substitution, in their stead, of nothing else than the government of unrestrained force, the Law of the stronger. A general Jail-delivery, in the City of New York, signalized the "new departure"—where there was no longer any Law, there could not be any breaches of the Law, either in the matter of pecuniary obligations or in that of any other obligation—and as every civil Commission was cancelled by that Resolution of Independence from the Crown of Great Britain, on the authority of which royal authority every such Commission was based, every Court of Justice was closed, every function of Government was paralyzed, and because no new form of local Government and no new system of Statutes had been provided to take the places of the others, which had been thus violently set aside, there was nothing but confusion and uncertainty; and had not the general conservatism of the Colonists prevailed and preserved the general peace, the advent of Independence, throughout the Colony of New York, would have been signalized by many a local scene of terrorism and of bloodshed. It was not so in the other Colonies; and had not the master-spirits of the revolutionary faction, in New York, in the interest of Reconciliation, obstructed the work of creating a new form of Government, quite as effectively as, at the same time, they were creating a necessity for such a new system—at least for a Provisional Government, if not for a permanent one—New York might, also, have been fully prepared for the great changes, in all her governmental arrangements, which were thus crowded on her. A very competent writer, a witness of the great changes of which he wrote and of which we write, thus accurately and graphically described them: "The Declaration of Independence, published by Congress on "the fourth of July, 1776, was the first act that put "an end to the Courts of Law, to the Laws of the "land, and to the administration of Justice, under "the British Crown, within the thirteen Colonies. "The revolt was now complete. Upon this event, "the Law, the Courts, and Justice itself ceased: all "was anarchy: all was confusion. A usurped kind "of Government took place: a medley of Military "Law, Convention Ordinances, Congress Recommendations, and Committee Resolutions."[2]

It is proper that we shall say, however, that, notwithstanding the Declaration of Independence was thus nominally accepted and approved, and notwithstanding New York was thus formally obligated to stand or fall with her sister States in the support and defense of the cause in which they were engaged, Independence had not been, as we have already seen, what the revolutionary faction of the great party of [1] Bolton stated, in his History of Westchester-county, (original edition, ii., 359, 360; the same, second edition, ii., 564,) that, on the occasion referred to, "the Declaration was read by John Thomas, Esq., and "seconded by Michael Varian and Samuel Crawford, two prominent "Whigs of Scarsdale." But he has given no authority for the statement; and unless by "John Thomas, Esq.," the reader of the Declaration on the occasion referred to, he meant the younger of the two who bore that name, we must be excused for doubting the accuracy of the statement.

[2] Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, ii., 115.

the Opposition, in New York, had desired and aimed for; nor, since it had been crowded through the Continental Congress without the approval of the master-spirits of that revolutionary faction of the party and in the face of the determined opposition of those who represented or who, in other Colonies, were affiliated with that faction, although the Declaration and Independence itself had been acquiesced in by the Provincial Congress, did the same faction regard either with the slightest favor; nor, as the subsequent conduct of its leading members, those of its number from whom the character and disposition of the whole may be fairly estimated, in postponing the establishment of a new form of Government for the young State and leaving it during more than nine months without the slightest semblance of a Government of any kind, clearly indicated, did that remarkable faction, then, intend to respect either the Resolution for Independence or the Declaration of it any longer than would be necessary to enable it to effect a reconciliation with Great Britain, and, thereby, to secure to that family of whom all the faction were either members or hungry followers, all those official places, within the Colony, which were then occupied by their hereditary rivals, and all that influence, for like purposes of aggrandizement, within other Colonies and within the Congress of the confederacy, to which that horde of miscellaneous office-seekers desperately aspired, and to which, it was fondly considered, it would become reasonably entitled.

On the afternoon of the ninth of July, immediately after the Provincial Congress had adopted the Report of the Committee to whom the Declaration of Independence had been referred, and, thereby, as far as it could do so, had abrogated every Law and every Commission which had rested on the sovereignty of the King of Great Britain, with singular coolness but entirely consistent with the absolutism which had thus been inaugurated and with the disposition and desires of those who then controlled the Congress, the Sheriffs of the several Counties were "authorized "and directed" [not by Law, but only by the oligarchic will and the consequent ipse dixit of the Congress,] "to "retain and keep in their custody all prisoners, of "whatever kind, which are or may be in their custody, until the further order of this Convention, "or until such of them as may be confined for "debt, on civil process, shall be released by the "Plaintiffs so brought against them;"[1] and thus provision was made for the safekeeping not only of the victims of earlier lawlessness but of subsequent absolutism, the latter, by the terms of the Resolution, concentrated within the Provincial Congress itself.[2]

Immediately after the provision of depositaries for the victims of its absolutism, as stated in the Resolution above referred to, the Provincial Congress revived the notorious Committee to detect Conspiracies, which had ceased to exist by reason of the dissolution of the Congress who had created it;[3] united it to the Committee on Prisoners of War, which had been appointed during the morning session; withdrew the authority to interfere with those who were suspected of disaffection, which had been vested in General Washington, by the preceding Provincial Congress, puring the panic occasioned by the arrival of the Royal Army;[4] vested the consolidated Committee, thus created, with authority to "carry into execution "all such Resolves of the Continental Congress and "comply with all such necessary requisitions of the "General" [Washington,] "as require so much de-"spatch as to render an application to this Congress "impracticable or attended with dangerous delay;" appointed John Sloss Hobart, of Suffolk, Gouverneur Morris and Colonel Lewis Graham, of Westchester-county, Leonard Gansevoort, of Albany-county, and Thomas Randall and Colonel Henry Remsen, of the City of New York, or any three of them, for such Committee; "permitted" the Committee "to proceed "in the business under" [unto?] "them committed, "in such a manner as to them shall appear to be most "agreeable to the dictates of justice and humanity "and most advancive of the public good:"[5] and so set in motion, again, that concealed instrumentality of despotism, which, under the same plea of "necessity," had stamped the records and the history of the third Provincial Congress with everlasting shame; and, in this later instance, with such an increase of authority as made it, practically, an absolute power which was greater in its ability to oppress the State than even the Provincial Congress itself.[6]

[2] It is very evident that James De Lancey, the Sheriff of Westchester-county, or the Deputy who represented him, obeyed the Resolution of the Provincial Congress by holding in confinement, in the County Jail, those "Prisoners of State" who, for political reasons, had been or who were, subsequently, sent to him, (Petition of Joshua Purdy and fourteen others, "WHITE PLAINS GOAL, August the 18th, 1776;" Petition of Jonathan Purdy, Junior, "WHITE PLAINS GOAL, August 30th, 1776;" Petition of Henry Chase, "WIGHT PLAINS GOAL, August 30, 1776;" etc.) as well as those Prisoners of War who, also, were sent to him, for safe-keeping, (Examinations of John Simpson, James Auchmuty, and seven others, Prisoners of War, "WHITE PLAINS IN WESTCHESTER COUNTY, July 6th, 1776, compared with the Petition of William McDermot, one of the number; with the Paroles of James Auchmuty and John Simpson and William McDermot, dated October 20, 1776; and with the Petition of John Simpson, William McDermot, William Elder, and Joseph Wollcomb, "Octr., 1776;") the latter of which Petitions is also interesting because of the information which it brings of the treatment of Prisoners of War, at the White Plains, by those who were in authority, under the "Convention of the Representa-"tives of the State of New York;" etc.

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Sunday Afternoon, June 30th, 1776."

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Tuesday, P.M., White Plains, "July 9th, 1776."

[6] Although the Provincial Congress was seated at a distance from the City of New York, this Committee preferred to hold its meetings in that City; and, with the unlimited authority with which it was vested, with nothing to control its own estimate of a "necessity," and with the strong arm of the military power to support that estimate, that Committee was, in fact, an oligarchy of absolute power, possessing greater means for oppression and outrage than was held by the Provincial Congress which had created it and by whose warrant it acted.

On Wednesday, the tenth of July, the Provincial Congress "resolved and ordered that the style or "title of this House be changed from 'THE PROVIN-"'CIAL CONGRESS OF THE COLONY OF NEW-YORK', "which it had previously borne, to that of 'THE "'CONVENTION OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE "'STATE OF NEW-YORK;'"[1] and, thenceforth, there was no open pretension that the King of Great Britain was the Sovereign of that portion of America or that those who were within the bounds of her territory owed the slightest allegiance to him or obedience to his commands.

The fourth Provincial Congress, notwithstanding the momentous events which were evidently rapidly approaching, was immediately zealous in continuing the remarkable policy which had distinguished the preceding three of the series and which had served to keep alive and to intensify the feuds of former days, separating the Colonists into factions, bitterly antagonistic in feelings and in actions, instead of seeking to conciliate those who differed; to pacify those who were discontented; to bring into harmony, the thoughts and opinions and desires which were discordant and jarring; and to secure concert of action, for the promotion and support of "the common cause," among those who had previously differed only on the means which should be employed for the accomplishment of the common purpose. But the revival, with largely increased authority and without any diminution of malignancy, of the notorious political Inquisition—the Committee to detect Conspiracies—afforded abundant evidence of the purpose of the master-spirits of the new-formed Convention to keep apart those who might have been united, had a redress of grievances been the only purpose of the movements; and to drive over into the ranks of the Royal Army or into the service of that Army, those who, under a more judicious policy, would not have become enemies, eager for retaliation, even if they had not become very active friends. The outlawry of Richmond and Queens-counties and the terrible outrages which had been inflicted on their peaceful inhabitants, under the authority or with the permission of the earlier Provincial Congresses, had already produced their legitimate results, in the eagerness with which the persecuted and outraged inhabitants of each of these Counties had accepted the protection of the Royal Army and taken up arms for retaliatory action;[2] and nothing else than a continued and a more than ever before besotted haughtiness, utterly unmindful of the Rights of those who were assumed to be subject to their authority, and a continued and more than ever before mulish stubbornness, in their continued determination to reduce every one who opposed them, no matter how slightly, to an unconditional and absolute submission of thought, word, and deed, to their oligarchic authority, regardless of any and every consequence to others or to the country at large—only such a haughtiness and such a stubbornness, indeed, as had characterized the Colonial policy and the administration of Lord Bute and Lord North and Lord George Germaine and their Tory associates, in England; the same as those which had controlled the three Congresses which had preceded it, after the members of the first of them had been induced to wander into the green pastures of the revolutionary faction—could have induced the master-spirits of this new Provincial Congress, under the peculiar circumstances which had recently arisen, to disregard the significant teachings of their earlier policy, and to create disaffection and to raise up enemies when harmony and a concert of action, in the cause of their common country, had become so vitally necessary. In the prosecution of that ill-advised and injudicious, as well as barbarous, policy, it continued to make arrests of individuals whom somebody had denounced as "suspected;[3] and even individual members of the Convention, on their individual motions, without the slightest charge against their victims, ordered individuals into imprisonment.[4]

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Wednesday morning, WHITE "PLAINS, July 10th, 1776."

Doctor Sparks erroneously stated, (Writings of George Washington, iii., 470, note,) that that change in the title of the Provincial Congress was made on the ninth of July, and cited the Manuscript Journal of the Congress, of the ninth of July, as his authority: we have preferred to depend on the official copy of that Journal, as it was printed by order of the Legislature, in 1842, which clearly indicates that the change was made on the following day.

[2] John Adams was either a very poor judge of human nature or a very besotted and haughty aristocrat, regarding the masses as unworthy of his sympathy or respect, or both, when he wrote of these people, then bleeding from every pore, from outrages inflicted on them by authority or with the permission of the Provincial Congress, and rejoicing that protection had been extended to them and to their property, by strangers, in such words as these: "The unprincipled and unfeeling and un-"natural inhabitants of Staten-Island are cordially receiving the enemy; "and, deserters say, have engaged to take arms. They are an ignorant, "cowardly pack of scoundrels. Their numbers are small, and their "spirit less." (Letter to Mrs. Adams, "PHILADELPHIA, July 11, 1776.")

Mr. Adams should have told just what he would have done, had he and his family passed through such an ordeal of "patriotism" as these islanders had sustained, and had he, as they were, been without hope of relief from his own countrymen. The record of his judgment would, then, have been complete.

[3] See the instances of Christopher Templer, (Journal of the Convention, "Die Lunæ, 4 ho., P.M., July 22, 1776;") that of Robert Sutton, (the same, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., July 24th, 1776;") that of Nicholas Couwenhoven, (Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Tuesday afternoon "Augt. 27, 1776;") and many others.

[4] See the instance of Henry Chase, "committed to the Jail at White "Plains, by an order from the Major," [Major Webster, Deputy from Charlotte-county.] (Journal of the Convention, "Die Jovis, 5 ho., P.M., "July 25, 1776.")

This case of imprisonment of Henry Chase very perfectly illustrated the despotic disposition and actions of those who were then in authority.

On the twenty-fifth of July, the date of the entry of his arrest on the Journal of the Convention, (he may have been arrested much earlier,) he petitioned the Convention that he was "confined in Goal upon suspision, "without money or friends," and begged that body would "bestow its "charity" upon him, (Petition of Henry Chase and three others, "WHITE "PLAINS, July 25, 1776:" Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 152.)

On the thirtieth of August, Chase again petitioned the Convention, as follows:

Arrests were thus made, very often, without the slightest reason, even from the standpoint of those exercising the authority;[1] and even women, when they refused to be made tools for their inquisitorial practices, were ordered to be imprisoned "until they "should make discovery or declaration aforesaid."[2] Arrests were made by military officers, even for alleged civil offences;[3] and, of course, the arbitrary arrests of those who were obnoxious to members of the several County Committees were continued, without abatement[4]—the Committee of the City of New York assumed authority to pass over the Hudson-river, into New Jersey; to arrest six persons, "in "Bergen Woods, near Bull's Ferry;" and to bring its prisoners over the river, and imprison them in the Jail of the City.[5] Occasionally, food was provided for those who were thus seized and confined;[6] but such a favor was exceptional: in some instances, the expense of being confined was increased by official extras;[7] but there was an instance, also, wherein a prisoner, arrested by order of the Commander-in-Chief, was liberated from confinement, by the Convention, and given the largest liberty, with no other condition than that of an elastic parole, only because of his "connection with a large family of well-attached, "warm Whigs," and because it would be "the most "politic course to do so;"[8] and a second instance, wherein "a person of equivocal character," in Westchester-county,[9] and whose name was included in the List of Suspected Persons on which Frederic Philipse's name also appeared,[10] and who was ostentatiously summoned to appear before the notorious "Committee to "detect Conspiracies," of which his half-brother and

The County Committee had officially informed Chase, nine days previously, that it had no jurisdiction of his case, and directed him to the Convention, (Westchester-county Committee to Henry Chase, "IN COM-"MITTEE OF SAFETY FOR THE COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER, WHITE PLAINS, "Aug. 21, 1776"—Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii, 102;) but no attention whatever was paid to the poor man's Petition, by either the Committee of Safety of the State or the Convention to whom it was addressed—he was only "a Poor man," one of the "poor rep-"tiles," of earlier "patriotism."

On the thirteenth of September, the unfortunate prisoner again presented a Petition for relief, in these words:

"WHITE PLAINS GOAL, September 13, 1776.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HONORABLE PROVENSHALL CONGRESS.

"This my Humble Petition to Beg of your Honnours to send for me "that I may have my tryal for the County Commete and the Commete "of Safety says that they have no Right to try me and I have desird "them to send me to the Honnourable Provenshall Congress and they "tell me they Dare Not send me without orders from your Honnours "Gentlemen so I shall be very Glad if your Honnours will be Good "Enouf to send for me as soon as Possible, for I have bin in Prison "Going on Eight weeks and I cant support myself any Longer,* So "Gentlemen I Shall be very Glad if your Honnours would take my "case into Consideration if your Hounours Pleases so that I may be "clear[d] or condem[d] So Gentlemen I leave my case to your Honnours "wise consideration not Douting but your Honnours will have compas-"sion on a Poor Prisoner.

"HENRY CHASE."

(Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 90.)

To this second appeal, there does not appear to have been made the slightest answer, although it was received by the Convention, and "read," (Journal of the Convention, Tuesday morning, Septr. 17, 1776;) and His tory is silent concerning the remainder of the victim's career.

Those who shall desire to know who and what kind of a man it was who had thus possessed and exercised power enough to point his dirty finger at a man and cause him to be thus outrag d, without any remedy, may be gratified by turning to a Petition addressed to the Provincial Congress, on the fourth of May, 1776, by William Duer, subsequently well known, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxii., 85;) and to the Accot of Monies, p[d] by the Treasurer for which no Accot has been rendered by the persons to whom they were paid, reported by the Treasurer to the Convention, on the eighteenth of September, 1776.

another kinsman were leading members,[1] was made the "Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of this "State," only thirty-four days after he had been thus summoned to answer a charge of having been "sus-"pected," and before he had answered to that Summons;[2] and a third instance, when a leading member of the Convention itself, because of his known inclinations and because of his continued and frequent correspondence with his friends, in the City of New York as well as with those in Philadelphia, after both those Cities had been occupied by the Royal Army; and because of his expressed desire to go into the City of New York, for the purpose of visiting those friends; and because of his application for a flag, for the purpose of carrying those desires into effect; became generally and very seriously "suspected,"[3] without having been officially disturbed, by any one—he was not one of those "poor vipers" of whom he had told, only a few months previously;[4] nor did he come within the circle of those whom the dominant, aristocratic clique of that period was inclined to degrade to the level of the common people. There have been some, from that time until this, who have seen that, in the hands of such as then controlled the affairs of New York, the scales of justice were sadly tilted; that there was one kind of justice for one class of the inhabitants and another kind of justice for another class; that, in practice, the vaunted equality of all men was a fiction.

It was a favorite practice to remove the victims of these arrests from the vicinage of the alleged offence; and the Jail at Kingston was much employed,[5] although Morristown, in New Jersey,[6] and Hartford, in Connecticut,[7] and the City of Philadelphia,[8] and "others "of the neighbouring States,"[9]—of course, the older-time repository of the victims of New York's "suspicion," at Litchfield, in Connecticut, was included;[10]—did not fail to receive their very welcome supply of well-to-do boarders.

During the first three months of the existence of the Convention, there were thus lawlessly seized, of the residents of Westchester-county, William and John Sutton, of Mamaroneck;[11] John Rogers, a servant of Lewis Morris, of Morrisania;[12] Joseph Reade, of Westchester;[13] Isaac Underhill, of Yonkers,[14] and Philip Palmer[15] and James Horton, Junior,[16] besides a number of others the names of whom were not recorded on the Journal of the Convention.[17]

[13] The Affidavit on which Joseph Reade was ordered to be arrested is such a singular production that we are induced to copy it.

"Dutchess County, ss. Abraham W. D. Peyster, being sworn, depos-"eth and saith that, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the fourth, "fifth, and sixth days of September instant, he was at New-Rochelle, in "the County of Westchester; that on one of the above-named days, he "heard, (as far as he can at present recollect,) either Theodosius Bartow, "of New-Rochelle aforesaid, or Anthony Abrahams, of the Town of "Westchester, in substance, say, in a conversation this Deponent had "with the one or the other of them, on the American contest, that Jo-"seph Reade, late of the City of New-York, Attorney-at-Law, but, at "present, as this Deponent understood, a resident in the Town of West-"chester, was reputed a great Tory; that the chief of his, the said Jo-"seph Reade's, conversation was of the Tory kind; and that he, the "said Joseph Reade, had reported that, in the late Battle on Long Is-"land, between the American Army and that of the King of Great "Britain, the Americans had lost either seven or fourteen thousand men. "(This Deponent cannot now recollect which of the two numbers was "mentioned, but rather thinks fourteen.) This Deponent further says, "that the amount of all he heard at New-Rochelle, at the time afore-"said, respecting Joseph Reade, was, that the said Joseph Reade was a "great Tory and very unfriendly to the American cause, and further "this Deponent saith not.

"A. W. D. Peyster.

"Sworn before me, this 10th Sept., 1776.

"Abm. Yates, Junr., President."

That Abraham W. De Peyster was an employé of the Convention, in its work of making arrests and conveying the victims into exile, as a copyist, etc.; and he was evidently anxious for another job, of the same class, when he volunteered this singular testimony. But the Committee of Safety disappointed his evident expectations, by transmitting the Affidavit to the Committee of Westchester-county, "with a letter requesting "them to proceed thereon," (Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die "Martis, 8 ho., A.M., Septr. 10, 1776.")

[14] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Lunæ, 9 ho., A.M., October "7, 1776."

[16] Journal of the Convention, "Wednesday afternoon, July 17, 1776."

[17] "Resolved: That General Morris be ordered immediately to appre-"hend and secure the persons ordered to be apprehended by this Con-"vention, yesterday, and that he be furnished with a list of those persons "names," (Journal of the Convention, "Die Sabbati, 4 ho., P.M., Augt. "10, 1776.")

As no such Order for the arrest of any one as is recited in the above Resolution appears in the published Journal of the Convention of the preceding day, it is evident that this is one of those instances of arbitrary lawlessness, familiar to despots, of which the records are buried in secrecy.

Those who were supposed to have been "disaffected," whether they were really so or not, very much alarmed the Convention; and the reports of the ill disposition of large portions of the inhabitants, in various parts of the State, were really and reasonably sufficient to create alarm, even among more resolute men than those of whom the Convention was constituted. Those whom the Committees and the Congresses had persecuted and outraged and all whom their sufferings could influence, very naturally and very reasonably, were "disaffected," as the inhabitants of Staten-Island had been: many, great numbers, of those who had honestly and earnestly opposed the Home Government and who had boldly demanded a redress of the Colonial grievances, were also "disaffected," when the fire-eaters' Resolution of Independence was forced on them, nolens volens, as Colonel James Holmes, of Bedford,—who had represented Westchester-county in the Provincial Convention which had sent the Delegation of the Colony to the second Continental Congress; who had represented the County in the First Provincial Congress; and who had commanded, throughout the entire Campaign of 1775, the Regiment of Troops in which were the Companies from the same County—was "disaffected," thereby. The greater number of those who had held places of honor and emolument, in the Colonial Government, notwithstanding it was politic to keep quiet, was also, more or less "disaffected;" and the multitude, whose timidity would not permit them to entertain a thought that Independence would be worth what it would evidently cost to secure it, was not very loud-toned in its favor, even if it did not, very often, lean toward "disaffection." Lastly, the inhabitants of the State, very generally, anxious only to attend to their business and their farms, without the distress and misery which a Civil War would necessarily produce, and seeing no advantage to themselves or to their families by the violent overthrow of one Government and the equally violent establishment of another Government—the great majority, by far the greater number, if not the almost entire body, of the farmers of Westchester-county, was of that class—preferred to remain as they had been, before they had been outraged by the new regime; and, therefore, were classed as "disaffected." There was reason, therefore, for the more tender anxiety of the Convention, composed of those who were cowards by instinct, since "its chickens had "come home, to roost;" and, as we shall see, its anxiety was not relieved by what it was subsequently required to experience. Governor Tryon was enlisting as many as he could entice into the service of the King, both in New York and in other States;[1] and those who were "disaffected," in Westchester-county and elsewhere, were beginning to organize and to arm, for their own defence and, now and then, in support of the Royal cause.[2] The Troop of Horse, in Westchester-county, of whom mention has been made, when a quota of its members was ordered for the reinforcement of the Continental Army, at New York, early in July, 1776, had refused to comply with the Order;[3] the Regiment of Westchester Militia, commanded by Colonel Joseph Drake, of New Rochelle, also declined to be submitted to a Draft, for the same purpose, later in July;[4] it knew that very few of the Militia of that County could be expected to enter the service, even for the protection of the County itself;[5] and, on the earnest appeal of the friends of the Convention, in Salem and on Cortlandt's Manor, for the protection of the small revolutionary factions, there, from the greater number of those who were regarded as "disaffected, in those "portions of the County,"[6] a special Company of thirty men, to be commanded by Captain Samuel Delavan, and in addition to the similar Company commanded by Captain Micah Townsend, previously organized,[7] was necessarily ordered to be enlisted and established, at the expense of the State, for that particular service.[8] Even the authority of the Convention and that of the Committee of Safety of the State were disregarded by Captain Varian, of Westchester-county;[9] and there was good reason for supposing, it was said, that a correspondence was kept up between the Royal Army, on Long Island, and prominent inhabitants of that County, as far in the interior as the White Plains, as early as the close of August, in 1776.[1] The inhabitants of Kings-county were said, early in August, to "have determined not to oppose the enemy;" and a Committee was appointed, with considerable ostentation, to go to that County, and to "inquire concern-"ing the authenticity of such report; and, in case "they find it well-founded, that they be empowered "to disarm and secure the disaffected inhabitants; to "remove or destroy the stock of Grain; and, if they "shall judge it necessary, to lay the whole County "waste; and, for the execution of these purposes, "they be directed to apply to General Greene, or the "Commander of the Continental Troops in that "County, for such assistance as they shall want;"[2] as if such a rash purpose would have been permitted to be carried into effect, under such peculiar circumstances, while the entire military and naval power of the King, in that part of the Continent, was resting within a mile of the proscribed County, and eager for a fight. Duchess-county, also, asked for further protection from the aggressions of the "disaffected," as Westchester-county had done;[3] and, notwithstanding two Companies had been already raised for that purpose and were then in service,[4] a third Company was ordered to be added to the local force.[5] Like the Militia of Westchester-county, that of Duchess-county was exceedingly "disaffected," and would not be drafted;[6] and with the rashness and haughtiness of the despotism which it wielded, James Duane and John Jay being present, the Committee of Duchess-county, with its local military force, was directed to assist in enforcing the Order,[7] as if one who was thus forcibly crowded into the Army, after the manner of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the other Old World despots, would ever become a useful and effective soldier. The lower portions of Albany-county and the Manor of Livingston, also, asked for the enlistment and establishment of a local military force, for the only purpose of protecting the very few friends of the Convention who lived there, from the far greater number of the "disaffected" who also lived there;[8] and the measure of the anxiety of the Convention was completed by the submission of all Long Island, not excluding the peculiarly zealous revolutionary County of Suffolk, to the authority of the King.[9] In view of these stern facts, there need be no wonder that the Convention was anxious, concerning the "disaffected;" and because of the purely speculative disposition of the Eastern Troops, and of the apathy, if not of the "disaffection," which prevailed in those of the Middle States, especially among those who were forced into the Army, unwilling soldiers, from New York,[10] there need be no wonder that General Washington, also, was anxious, not only concerning the "disaffected" who were within his own command, but concerning, also, those who were scattered throughout New York, in the rural districts as well as within the Cities;[11] nor that he took unto himself the authority to seize and remove from their homes, some of those who were said to have been "disaffected," in many instances, those who had given their paroles and were honorably discharging their respective obligations of peace and quiet,[12] among the former of whom was Frederic Philipse, of Yonkers, whose almost total blindness and entirely harmless life would have undoubtedly sheltered him, had not "a number of well-affected inhabitants" volunteered to assist the General in selecting his victims,[13] and included Mr. Philipse's name on their list of the assumed "disaffected,"[14] who were maliciously said to have been, also, dangerous.[15] As the General expressly [15] Frederic Philipse was taken into custody by an order from General Washington, on the ninth of August, and taken from his own house, at Yonkers, to New Rochelle, "where he was closely confined, under "guard, for eleven days," when he was removed to Connecticut, and gave his Parole that he would not go beyond the limits of the Town of Middletown, which no one pretends he attempted to violate. He remained there, until he was officially permitted to go into the City of New York, also on Parole. In the trick which was subsequently played on those who had been thus favored, by ordering them to return to Connecticut, but in such a manner that it was evident the Order would not stated that all these were "apprehended only on sus-"picion,"[1] and that not on the personal knowledge of the General himself, but on information conveyed to him, unquestionably, by the notorious "Committee to "detect Conspiracies," who was then sitting in the City in which Head-quarters then were,[2] the same hands directed the movement which had previously directed the similar movements with which the reader is already acquainted; and the Convention was consistent when it thankfully acknowledged the great favor which it then enjoyed, in having received so welcome and so powerful an accession to its power for persecution, as General Washington and the Army of the Continent.[3]

The instance of William Lounsberry, who refused to surrender and was killed, while four of his recruits—Bloomer Nelson, Jacob Schureman, Samuel Haines, and Joseph Turner—were captured, is noteworthy. Both Lounsberry and his fourteen recruits were Westchester-county Loyalists; and he and they were intercepted in Westchester-county, by a party of Westchester-county Militia, on the twenty-ninth of August, 1776. Two Battalions of Loyalists were raised in Queens-county; and in several of the other Counties, heavy enlistments were also made.

Like the three Congresss who had preceded it, the Convention was kept busy, with matters pertaining to the Army. It authorized and superintended the enlistment of men, in the service of the State, for local purposes;[4] it attended to that of men for the reinforcement of the Continental Army;[5] and it provided for the payment of Bounties, in addition to the stipulated pay, to those who thus enlisted.[6] It resorted to Drafts, in order to fill the requisitions for men, when enlistments were tardy;[7] and where resistance was made to the Draft, force was authorized, to compel men to fill the ranks.[8] It appointed Officers of both the Militia and the troops in the field;[9] it passed on the qualifications of the Surgical Staff;[10] and it gave employment to Chaplains for the Army.[11] Bargains were made with favored Officers, when they entered the service, conditioned that they should serve nowhere else than in the City of New York;[12] and the settlement of disputes among Officers, concerning Rank, occupied much of its time and attention.[13] It exempted the Cavalry from the operations of a general Draft for men;[14] and those who were employed in furnaces for smelting iron, in forges for making bar-iron, in steel-manufactories, in the anchor forge in Orange-county, in saltworks, in paper-mills, and in powder-mills,[15] as well as those in a flaxseed-mill, in Duchess-county,[16] and in the workshops of a gunsmith,[17] were, also, exempted from every kind of military duty.

The Militia, of course, was the sole dependence of the Convention, in every emergency;[18] and, whether well-disposed or "disaffected"[19]—it seemed to be equally reach them, in the distant City, Mr. Philipse was included among the victims of somebody's official misconduct; and, as the world knows, that unintentional failure to return to his place of confinement, in Connecticut, was made the ostensible reason for the confiscation of his great estate, in Westchester-county and elsewhere.

There is not the slightest evidence that Frederic Philipse was anything else than an honest friend of his native country; that he ever spoke or wrote or did anything whatever which could be justly construed as inimical to his country or favorable to the obnoxious measures of the Home Government; or that he ever purposed doing so. He was almost totally blind; and that and his unusual corpulency unfitted him for the slightest personal opposition to or support of any political or military movements; while his fondness for gardening, in all its branches, to which the grounds of his Manor-houses, at Yonkers and Sleepy Hollow, bore ample testimony, and his domestic ties, and his unusual love of home, led him to prefer the quiet and retired life for which he was distinguished, instead of that more active and more public life to which, from his rank and standing and purity of character, he was so completely entitled.

[18] The authorities are so numerous, that no attempt will be made to cite any of them.

[19] The following, in addition to what has been already stated concerning the disaffection in the Continental Army, presents the subject, very clearly. The Militia of Westchester-county contained, of course, all who were friends of the Convention and who lived within the County; but the number of efficient men in the entire Brigade did not exceed the strength of a single Regiment and these were so generally "disaffected," either with the service or with the General commanding them, or with both, that the latter regarded his own life as in danger, among them; and, therefore, when he was ordered to take the command of his Brigade, personally, in New York, he preferred to remain in Philadelphia, where he would be less exposed: "The situation of my Brigade I was con-"vinced was well known to the Convention," were his words. "I ap-"prehend that not more than a Colonel's command was left in it; and "as such did not think my presence was so absolutely necessary. I have "thought that the existence of such a Brigade, in which were so many "disaffected persons, was dangerous to the cause as well as to my own "life; but being desirous to participate in the virtuous opposition to the "British tyrant, I had determined, as soon as possible, to join General "Washington, and contribute my assistance to him." (General Lewis Morris to the Convention "PHILADELPHIA, Septr. 24, 1776.")

The reader may learn from this how very little the Morrises were respected, even among those who were under legal obligations to respect them, in and throughout Westchester-county, in the Summer of 1776.

The following will further illustrate the "disaffection" of the Militia of Westchester-county, a reasonable result of the outrages which had been officially perpetrated throughout that County, during many months preceding: "We suppose your Excellency has taken the necessary steps "to prevent their landing of any men from the ships, should they be so "inclined, as no reliance at all can be placed on the Militia of West-"chester-county." (The Committee of Safety to General Washington, "FISHKILL, 10th Octr., 1776.") relied on, no matter what its temper might be—it was drawn into the service, while the other States were delinquent,[1] until no more could be taken, for any, except for the most temporary, purposes.[2] It was called out to guard the banks of the Hudson-river[3] and those of Long Island Sound.[4] Reinforcements of the Continental Army were taken from it, whenever reinforcements were called for;[5] the passes in the Highlands were constant sources of anxiety;[6] and the northern borders of the State[7] and Long Island[8] also enjoying its protection. Sometimes it was employed to drive Cattle to places of supposed safety:[9] sometimes it was employed in repairing roads:[10] sometimes, very frequently, it was called from its homes and its necessary labors on the farms, when there was not the slightest appearance of danger, to throw up the defences on which ordinary day-laborers, then suffering from want of employment, had better been employed.

The vessels of war which the Provincial Congresses had equipped and sent to sea, were duly cared for;[11] and it continued to give authority for the equipment of privateers.[12]

As the Convention was largely composed of the same persons as those who had been members of the Provincial Congresses, unto whom the exercise of despotic power has become not only familiar but agreeable and, sometimes, profitable, the same range of authority which those Congresses had usurped was exercised by the Convention, without any other Laws than the promptings of their own wills, as their respective rules of action. It continued, therefore, to provide, as best it could, for the wants of the Army, by manufacturing and by purchasing and distributing among the Powder-mills, all the Saltpeter which it could secure;[13] by making or buying or borrowing Gunpowder, and by distributing it or giving it away;[14] by searching for Lead, and opening Mines, and stripping Window-sashes, in Tryon and Albany-counties, and distributing it or giving it away;[15] and it attended to the search for Sulphur and Flints and Lead, and to the testing of those discovered.[16] It busied itself, also, with the details of distributing Cartridges[17] and Gunflints.[18] Like the Congresses who had preceded it, it engaged, directly, in the manufacture of Arms and Equipments, including that of Lances, with which somebody induced the Convention to attempt to arm the Militia who had been called into the service;[19] and it also bought Arms,

[1] "We can with pleasure assure you, that by far the greater part of "the levies ordered by the Congress to be raised from our Militia, are "completed, and at their several stations; that almost the whole of those "drafted in consequence of the enclosed Resolution, will, by the time "this reaches you, be at posts which is thought necessary to occupy, "least the enemy should cut off the communication between the Army at "New York and the country." * * * "It gives us great pain to in-"form you that the aid received from our sister States is very inadequate "to our expectations, none of them having yet completed the levies di-"rected by Congress, which leaves us reason to fear that instead of using "every means that human wisdom dictates for ensuring success, we shall, "with inferior numbers, on the doubtful issue of a single battle, hazard "the glorious cause for which we have struggled." The entire body of the Militia of Westchester-county was again called out, for the same purpose, with five days' provisions, a fortnight afterwards, (the same, "Die Sabbati, 4 "ho., P.M., Augt. 10, 1776.") P.M., "Augt. 10, 1776;") and, a few days later, the entire body of the Militia of Orange, Ulster, Westchester, and Duchess-counties was ordered to hold itself in readiness to march, at a moment's warning, with five days' provisions and as much ammunition as possible, (Journal of the Committee of Safety. The manufacture of four thousand Lances was assigned to the Coun-

when it could do so,[1] and, sometimes, it hired Arms, when it could not in other way procure them.[2] In short, there seemed to be nothing left, in all which related to the raising, the equipment of, and the furnishing of supplies for, the troops, which was permitted to be done by any other agency; and it affords subjects for thought and inquiry, as one reads of its uninvited interference with the instructions of the Quartermaster-general of the Continental Army to his subordinates, concerning purchases of Timber and Oak-plank and old Vessels, for the obstruction of the Hudson-river;[3] of its direct participation in the purchase of Lime, Brick, Oak-plank, Cordwood, Grain, and Clothing for the Continental Army, although the Quartermaster-general's officers were present and engaged in the same work;[4] and when it also found employment in attending to the Cooperage of leaky Oil-casks belonging to the Continent.[5]

The establishment of a new form of Government received the dilatory and half-hearted attention of the Convention—an abridgement of their existing despotic authority was opposed by the Deputies who then exercised it;[6] and there was a lingering, longing desire, among the master-spirits of the Convention, for a reconciliation with the Mother Country and a restoration of the former form of Colonial Government, evidently with themselves and their friends administering it.[7]

The subject was introduced into the Convention, very properly, on the day after that body had approved and accepted the Declaration of Independence; but the consideration of it was postponed, from time to time, until the first of August, when a Committee was appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration and reporting a plan for instituting and framing a Form of Government, together with a Bill of Rights, ascertaining and declaring the essential Rights and Privileges of "the good people of this State," as a foundation for such Form of Government, with instructions to report to the Convention, on the twenty-sixth ties of Albany, Ulster, Orange, Duchess, and Westchester, eight hundred to each; and, in the last-named County, Stephen Ward, William Millar, and Thaddeus Crane were appointed "to procure the proportion "of Lances affixed to their respective names." (Journal of Committee of Safety, "Die Mercurii, 4 ho., P.M., Sept. 4, 1776.") Models were made from Spears procured in New York, (the same, "Die Lunæ, 11 ho., A.M., "Sept. 9, 1776;") and, including the long handles, five shillings and six-pence was paid for those which were not steeled, and six shillings and six-pence for those which were steeled, (Journal of the Convention, "Die "Jovis, 9 ho., A.M., Octor. 3, 1776.")

We have not met the slightest notice of the use of those four thousand Lances, in the service or elsewhere; and it is more than probable that they were never used, by any one.

Stephen Ward, Gilbert Strang, and Phil. Leake were appointed to purchase coarse woollen Cloth, Linsey-woolsey, Blankets, woollen Hose, Mittens, coarse Linen, felt Hats, and Shoes, for the soldiers, and to have the Linen made up into Shirts, all in Westchester county; and three hundred pounds—seven hundred and fifty dollars—were appropriated for that purpose. (Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., "Octr. 9, 1776.") Although there were supplies of Grain much nearer to the Army, and vastly more exposed to the enemy's foraging parties, no Grain was purchased elsewhere than in the Livingston Manor, from which three thousand bushels of Oats, at four shillings per bushel, and four thousand bushels of old Corn and one thousand bushels of Rye, the two latter at five shillings per bushel, were drawn, at one time; but Peter R. Livingston was President of the Convention, and Gilbert Livingston and James Livingston and Philip Livingston and Robert R. Livingston and James Duane and John Jay and Pierre Van Cortlandt—the last-named three having been Livingstons by their marriages—were members of that Convention; and six of them were present when the order was given. (Journal of the Convention, "Monday morning, Septem-"ber 30, 1776.")

Need there be any surprise that, with such an array of strong men in its favor, that he more distant and less exposed Manor of Livingston should be chosen, especially since the purchasing agent of the Quartermaster-general of the Continental Army was at Fishkill, with funds to meet the drafts of Dirck Jansen, who was selected by the Convention, to gather the grain from the farmers or from the manorial storehouses, and, also, especially since no inspection of either the quantity or the quality of what was to be thus purchased, was provided for.

[5] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Friday morning, September 27, "1776."

[6] As late in the year as the early days of October, the attempt of the County-clerk of Duchess-county to continue the old practice of holding a County Court for that County was formally forbidden by the Convention, John Jay, James Duane, and Robert R. Livingston having been present in the Convention, (Journal of the Convention, "Die Sabbati, 9 ho., "A.M., Octor. 5, 1776.")

[7] There need be no better evidence of that fact, although there is an abundance, elsewhere, than in the successive orders for the issue of Bills of Credit, by the Convention. It continued to issue such Bills, in the name of the Colony, long after it had professed to accept the Declaration of Independence, by which it had ceased to be a Colony, (Journal of the Convention, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., Augt. 7, 1776") and, subsequently, when a new issue of such Bills of Credit was ordered to be printed, (Journal of the Convention, "Die Martis, 5 ho., P.M., August 13, "1776") it was ordered to be printed with the insignia of the Corporation of the City of New York, (Ibid;) and the engravers of the several plates were instructed to leave a blank space where the name of the maker of the obligation should be, on those plates, in order that such name as should be subsequently found to be most useful—the Colony, the State, the City, or something else—might be inserted, with type, after the sheets should have been printed on the plate-press—conclusive evidence that the permanence of the new-formed State was regarded by even the master spirits of the Convention, as very questionable.

In the same connection, it may be well to inquire and to consider what the Earl of Coventry meant, when, in his place in the House of Lords, on the twenty-fifth of November, 1779, he said, "He lamented that a "War so fatal to Great Britain should ever have been begun, much more "that it should be continued with so much obstinacy; and declared that, "had the House paid attention to the propositions which he, the last "Sessions, informed them he was authorized to make from two persons "of authority and influence, in America, and which, had they been "listened to, by Parliament, and agreed to, would have been ratified by "Congress, we should have been, at this hour, in peace with America." —Speech of the Earl of Coventry, in the House of Lords, in Almon's Parliamentary Register, xv., 17.

"The last Sessions," during which the Earl of Coventry, by authority, presented overtures for reconciliation to which the Continental Congress would have agreed, was the Fifth Session of the Fourteenth Parliament of Great Britain, (November 26, 1778, to July 3, 1779,) long after the alliance of the United States with France had been perfected, and utilized in America. As the Earl, on another occasion, boldly acknowledged his personal friendship and correspondence with more than one of those who, then, were regarded as prime leaders in the Rebellion, there need be very little trouble in searching for the names of those who were, undoubtedly, the mouthpieces of the Continental Congress, in the work of reconciliation, on the occasion referred to by the Earl of Coventry, in 1779.

of August, less than four weeks from the date of its appointment.[1] The Committee who was appointed for those purposes consisted of John Jay, Colonel John Broome, and General John Morin Scott, all of the City of New York; John Sloss Hobart and William Smith, of Suffolk; Abraham Yates, Junior, and Robert Yates, of Albany-county; Henry Wisner, Senior, and Colonel Charles De Witt, of Ulster-county; William Duer, of Charlotte-county; Gouverneur Morris, of Westchester-county; Samuel Townshend, of Queens-county; and Robert R. Livingston, of Duchess-county.[2]

The subject continued to be played with, both by the Committee and the Convention, by both of whom nothing was done, until the Royal Army occupied the City of New York and prepared to extend its operations into Westchester-county, when other subjects occupied the attention of both; and thus were the best interests and the safety of the inhabitants of the State endangered—thus were their properties and their families and everything which was dear to them, subjected to the hazard of a revolutionary uprising, of anarchy, and of entire destruction—only because James Duane and John Jay and the Livingstons and the Morrisses and their friends preferred a reconciliation and a reconstruction of the former system of Government, with themselves in the offices; and, for the promotion of those selfish purposes, withheld every form of Government from the young State, and exposed every one and everything, within the State, to lawless anarchy and entire ruin.

There was scarcely a matter, in either the Judicial or the Legislative or the Executive departments of Government, with which that Congress did not interfere;[3] and it ventured to ask the Continental Congress, only because it lacked courage enough to do so, to revise the Book of Common Prayer and to exercise an official censorship over the prayers of those who did not use Rituals.[4]

While the Convention was thus busily employed—and justice requires that its industry and determination, in preparing for a successful opposition to the Royal Armies, on the northern frontiers as well as in the vicinity of New York, should be fully and properly recognized—other events of the utmost importance to New York and to her sister States, were of everyday occurrence.

As we have already stated, the Royal troops which had been withdrawn from Boston and carried to Halifax, during the preceding March, "having suffi-"ciently recovered from the fatigues and sickness "occasioned by their confined situation in that town" [Boston,[5]] left the later place, [Halifax] on the eleventh of June,[6] under convoy of Admiral Shuldham;[7] reached Sandy-hook on the twenty-ninth of the same month;[8] landed on the northeastern shore of Staten-Island, between the second and fourth of July;[9] and were welcomed by the persecuted inhabitants of that beautiful island, as their deliverers from the terrible oppression of the revolutionary powers, both that of New York and that of New Jersey.[10]

On the afternoon of the twelfth of July, for the purpose of distressing the American Army, "by "obstructing supplies coming down the river and other "good consequences dependent on that measure"—probably, also, for the purpose of offering encouragement to the conservative farmers of Westchester-county to follow the example of those on Staten Island, in declaring for the King—the Phœnix, commanded by Captain Hyde Parker, of forty guns, the Rose, commanded by Captain Wallace, of twenty

[3] Without entering into details, the Convention provided for the refugee Poor, from the City of New York; protected the Cattle of the farmers, from the enemy's foraging-parties, as far as it could do so; guarded the Military-stores of the State; built Vessels-of-War; obstructed the navigation of the Hudson-river; arbitrarily set aside the Elections of Officers who were distasteful to it; borrowed Money, whenever they could find lenders; treated with the Indians; issued Paper-currency; gave employment to grumbling Mechanics; watched the "disaffected," in New Jersey; lent Money to impecunious County Committees; guarded the official Records; ordered Fasts; gave Passes to those making journeys; seized the Royal Quitrents; removed those who were exposed to the enemy; provided postal facilities; gave Licenses to Innkeepers; gave relief to insolvent Debtors; provided for the care of Orphans; relieved distressed Soldiers; etc., etc.

It is a subject we are afraid to meddle "with, the enemies of America having taken great pains to insinuate "into the minds of the Episcopalians that the Church was in danger. guns, and three tenders, "taking advantage of the "tide and a fresh breeze," left Staten Island, and passed the City, receiving the fire of the American batteries on the Red Hook, Governor's Island, Powle's Hook, and along the line of the Hudson-river, within the City, without sustaining any material damage, and returning a fire which was equally harmless.[1] They anchored off Tarrytown, during the early evening;[2] but, if their errand was to encourage the farmers on the Philipse Manor to declare themselves favorably inclined to the King, their officers must have been sadly disappointed, since Lieutenant Daniel Martling, with whom the reader is already acquainted, on the first appearance of the approaching vessels, promptly ordered his command to turn out, to oppose any attempt which might be made to effect a landing; and, during the night, under the personal direction of Lieutenant-colonel Hammond, who lived in the vicinity, cartridges were distributed, and the inhabitants of the village and neighboring farms were collected, in order that an effective resistance should be made.[3] Fresh supplies of ammunition were sent, by the Convention, then in session at the White Plains; and measures were taken for reinforcing the inhabitants;[4] but, although it is said the ships were visited by one or two periaugas,[5] they appeared, while they remained off Tarrytown, to have been sent for no other purpose than to take soundings,[6] although there is little doubt that they also cut off the supplies, as well as the communication between the main Army and that on the northern frontier,[7] and availed themselves of the darkness of night to open communications with those of the neighboring inhabitants of Westchester and Orange-counties, who were supposed to have been friendly to the Royal cause.

The successful passage of these ships, up the river, very reasonably, created much anxiety and alarm, in the Army and throughout the State. General Washington, wisely suspecting that the purpose of the movement was to encourage the tenantry on the Manors of Philipsborough and Cortlandt to declare for the King, immediately ordered General George Clinton, then commanding the Militia who had been called out for the protection of the passes over the Highlands, to desire General Ten Broeck, commanding the Militia above the Highlands, to march down with as great a force as he could collect, in order the more effectually to secure those passes, particularly the road which passed over Anthony's Nose; and, at the same time, he authorized General Clinton, if there should seem to be any danger from those who were "disaffected," to send an express to Connecticut, desiring the western portion of that State "to col- "lect all their forces at the same point."[8] As we have already stated, the Convention of the State, then seated at the White Plains, besides sending advices of the threatened inroad to the officer commanding the fort in the Highlands, also sent a supply of powder and ball to the inhabitants of Tarrytown, and provided for reinforcements, "along that shore," and solicited protection for King's Bridge, "the destruction "of which it apprehended to have been an object "with the enemy."[9]

On the fourteenth of July, General Washington wrote to the Convention a letter which is so significant of the great anxiety which he felt and so highly illustrative of his character, as a great commander, that we make room for it, in this place.

"NEW-YORK HEAD-QUARTERS.
"July 14th, 1776.

"GENTLEMEN:—

"The passage of the enemy up the North-river is "an event big with many consequences to the public "interest. One particularly occurs to me well deserv- "ing your attention, and to prevent which I shall "gladly give every assistance in my power, consistent "with the safety of the Army.

"I am informed there are several passes, on each "side of the river, upon which the communication "with Albany depends, of so commanding a nature "that an inconsiderable body of men may defend "them against the largest numbers. It may be that, "on board these ships, there may be troops for that "purpose, who, expecting to be joined by the disaffect- "ed, in that quarter, or confiding in their own "strength, may endeavour to seize those defiles, in "which case the intercourse between the two Armies, "both by land and water, will be wholly cut off, than "which a greater misfortune could hardly befall the "Province and Army. I must entreat you to take "the measure into consideration, and, if possible, "provide against an evil so much to be apprehended. "I should hope the Militia of those Counties might be "used on such an emergency, until further provision "was made.

"I have also thought it very probable these ships

"I am, Gentlemen, very respectfully,
"Your mo. obt. and very hble. servant,
"GEO. WASHINGTON.

"TO THE HONBLE. THE PREST. OF THE "PROVINCIAL CONGRESS OF NEW-YORK."

As we have said, the inhabitants of the vicinity of Tarrytown turned out for the purpose of obstructing any attempt which might be made, to effect a landing from the ships;[1] but they were farmers, in the midst of their harvest; and when they had been there three days, without having seen much pressing necessity for their further stay or any prospect of a relief or of a supply of provisions, although the Convention was sitting within six miles from them, they expressed their desire to be relieved, and some of them went home, without leave, "in order to attend to their har- "vests."[2]

Very ungraciously and, certainly, not in such words as were calculated to inspire respect for those who had employed them, among those against whom they were thus tossed, by the aristocratic master-spirits of the Convention,[3] Orders were issued to Captain Micah Townsend, who had probably been sent from the Plains to Tarrytown, on the day after the arrival of the ships, to remain at the latter place, with his Company; Colonel Thomas was ordered to send detachments from his Regiment, to relieve those who had not returned to their homes; and the pay and rations allowed to the Continental troops, were promised to those who were, as well as to those who should be, called into the service.[4] But, on the following day, [July 16, 1776,] all those in the neighborhood of Tarrytown were relieved from immediate danger, by the ships and their tenders weighing their anchors and sailing up the river, occasionally firing a shot, as they passed a house on the western side the river; and by their anchoring a short distance below Verplanck's-point, and "opposite the stores at Hav- "erstraw." During the afternoon of the same day, one of the tenders beat up the river, against an unfavorable wind, sounding the river very carefully as she proceeded, until she had come within gun-shot of Fort Montgomery, when her progress was arrested by a thirty-two pound shot, which struck her, and compelled her to put about, and to run down the river, not, however, without having plundered a little house which stood near the river.[5]

During the morning of that day, [July 16, 1776,] before the information of the departure of the ships from Tarrytown had reached the Convention, that body had provided for the removal of "all Provisions and "other Stores, as well private as public property, which "were stored in places within the district of Peekskill "and so situated as to be in danger of being taken by "the enemy," "to such places of safety as the Sub- "committee of Peekskill shall think proper;" and when the information of the departure of the ships was received from Lieutenant-colonel Hammond, the Convention very promptly despatched Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt and Zephaniah Platt, the former a Deputy from Westchester-county and the latter one from Duchess-county, "to the Highlands, in order to "call out such Militia as they may think necessary for "the defence and security of this State; to direct "their stations; to reinforce the garrisons of Forts "Montgomery and Constitution, if expedient; and to "supply such forces as may be called out or to ap- "point proper persons for that purpose;" at the same time, promising Continental pay and rations to the Militia who should be thus employed; and advancing five hundred dollars, to be disposed of in procuring Provisions for the forces who should thus be called into active service.[6] The Convention further signified, at the same Session, its determination to protect the State, as far as it could do so, by ordering into immediate service, one-fourth of the entire body of Militia of the Counties of Westchester, Duchess, Orange—which then included what is now known as Rockland—and Ulster-counties, "for the defence of the liber- "ties, property, wives, and children of the good peo- "ple of this State; and as, at this busy season of the "year, the service may be inconvenient to many of "them, each man be allowed twenty dollars, as a "Bounty, with Continental pay and subsistence, and "be continued in the service until the last day of "December next, unless sooner discharged." At the same time, the men to be raised in Westchester and Duchess-counties were ordered to repair, immediately, to Peekskill; General Washington was requested to appoint an officer to take command of all the levies to be raised, on both sides the river; to designate what stations they should occupy; and to nominate two Deputy Commissaries for the troops, on each side of the river; and those who were already in the service, from Orange and Ulster-counties, were ordered to be posted in the Highlands, to guard the defiles, therein, which were westward from the Hudson-river, as General Clinton should direct. The provisions of these enactments were completed by the appointment of Colonel Thomas Thomas as the Colonel-commanding and Ebenezer Purdy as the Major, of the troops which were to be drawn from Westchester-county[1]—an appointment of Colonel which was made in the hurry of the moment and under a misapprehension, the Convention having erroneously supposed Colonel Thomas was the senior Colonel of the Westchester-county Militia, whereas the seniority rested on Colonel Drake; and which Election, subsequently, produced a serious rupture in the military circles of the County, and between the two rivals and their respective friends,[2] since Colonel Thomas resolutely retained the authority which he had thus received by mistake.[3] A guard of fifty men was also provided for the protection of the public stores of Provisions, at or near Peekskill;[4] and the Commissioners for building the Continental Ships, at Poughkeepsie, were requested to exert their utmost abilities and attention to defend those Ships from the hostile attempts of the enemy, and, if nothing else, to preserve the Oak-plank, Rigging, and other Stores from falling into his hands.[5]

In the afternoon of the same day, [July 16, 1776,] the Convention appointed a secret Committee "to de-"vise and carry into execution such measures as to "them shall appear most effectual for obstructing "the channel of Hudson's-river, or annoying the en-"emy's ships in their navigation up the said river; "and that this Convention pledge themselves for de-"fraying the charges incident thereto." That Committee was composed of John Jay, of the City of New York, Robert Yates, of Albany-county, Major Christopher Tappen, of Ulster-county, William Paulding, of Westchester-county, and Robert R. Livingston and Gilbert Livingston, both of Duchess-county. At the same time, a messenger was ordered to be sent to Governor Trumbull for the purpose of requesting him to order the forces of western Connecticut to be called out, for the further support of those who were occupying the passes in the Highlands;[6] a Resolution, requesting "all Magistrates and other officers of jus-"tice in this State, who were well affected to the liber-"ties of America, until further orders, to exercise their "respective offices," was adopted; and the Convention also adopted Resolutions declaring that "all persons "abiding within the State of New York and deriving "protection from the Laws of the same, owe Allegiance "to the said Laws, and are members of the State; that "all persons passing through, visiting, or making a "temporary stay in the said State, being entitled to "the protection of the Laws, during the time of such "passage, visitation, or temporary stay, owe, during "the same time, Allegiance thereto; and that all "persons, members of or owing Allegiance to this "State, as before described, who shall levy War "against the said State, within the same, or be adher-"ent to the King of Great Britain or others the ene-"mies of the said State, within the same, giving to "him or them, aid and comfort, are guilty of Treason "against the State, and being thereof convicted, shall "suffer the pains and penalties of Death!"[7]. The Convention also "earnestly recommended to the Gen-"eral Committees of the Counties and the Sub-Com-"mittees in the Districts of the several Counties in "this State, immediately to apprehend and secure all

[6] It appears that it was subsequently considered advisable to send a Committee of the Convention, instead of a letter by the hands of a Messenger; and Colonel John Broome, of New York City, and William Duer, of Charlotte-county, were selected for that purpose. (General Washington to the President of the Continental Congress, "NEW YORK, 19 "July, 1776.")

[7] These Resolutions are almost identical with other Resolutions, of the same tenor, which had been adopted by the Continental Congress, on the twenty-fourth of June preceding, (vide pages 355, 356, ante;) but, because of the subsequent abrogation of all the Laws of the Colony, and because no other Laws had been enacted, even provisionally, to take their places, the truth was, that, on the day of the adoption of these Resolutions, by the Convention, there were no Laws, of any kind, in force, within the State, nor any Courts to try offenders, of any kind; and the Resolutions were, therefore, practically, mere buncombe, meaning nothing.

But the ridiculousness of the Resolutions was not confined to their allusions to Laws which had been formally abrogated and to Courts which had been as formally abol shed. Obedience to the Laws, had there been any Laws, would have been truly due from every one within the limits of the State; but that was something which was entirely distinct from Allegiance, which was not due to the Laws but to the Sovereign to whose supreme authority the person was legally subject, and from whom even the Laws themselves, had there been any, had derived all the authority which they could have possibly possessed. Treason has always consisted, and still consists, of something else than a mere misdemeanor or a simple felony; and the subject of another Sovereign, although a violator of the lex loci, to which he properly owed obedience, could not, then nor since, have been legally tried and convicted of Treason, for any such violation of the local Law, in the State of New York or elsewhere, else, under these Resolutions, every officer and soldier of the Royal Army, whether British or Irish or German, who were within the State of New York, on and after the sixteenth of July, 1776, were Traitors "against the State," liable to be tried for that very capital offence, and to "suffer the pains and "penalties of Death," therefor.

The Convention, in its eagerness to secure the State, made itself ridiculous by the passage of such Resolutions, especially since it was exercising despotic authority, unrestrained by any Law, and needed no such Resolution as a warrant for declaring any one, no matter whom, either with or without a reason, to have been a traitor, and to have hung and quartered him after the most approved fashion of despots, had it inclined to have done so.

'such persons, whose going at large, at this critical "time, they shall deem dangerous to the Liberties of "this State;"[1] and the measure of its zeal was filled by asking a loan from General Washington, for the payment of what it had undertaken to do, promising to "take the earliest care to replace what nothing "but urgent necessity would have induced it to bor- "row;" by requesting him to send an immediate supply of Ammunition for the troops who were already in motion and "but ill-supplied" with that very necessary article; by expressing a fear to him that the enemy would attempt "to cut off the communication "between the City and country, by landing above "Kingsbridge," and its desire to "have some force "ready to hang on his rear, in case such a step should "be taken;" and by suggesting to the General, also, that if Governor Trumbull would form a Camp of six thousand men, at Byram-river, the westernmost limit of Connecticut, any designs which the enemy might have, to land above Kingsbridge, would become "ex- "tremely hazardous."[2]

While the Convention was thus bravely and, generally, with excellent judgment, employed in making preparations for a vigorous and effective resistance, whatever the purposes of the enemy may have been, General Clinton, then at Fort Montgomery, as we have already seen, not only welcomed one of the enemy's tenders, which was beating up the river, taking soundings as she went, with a thirty-two pound shot, which caused her to put about and run down the river, to the place where the ships had anchored; but he also made preparations for the removal of all the goods, from the storehouses, and all the Cattle, Sheep, etc., from the farms which were contiguous to the river, to places of safety; and, on the following day, [July 17, 1776,] he went down with a force sufficiently strong to do what he had proposed; successfully removed what had not yet been removed by others; and left one hundred and eighty Militia, under the command of a prudent officer, to oppose any attempt which might be made to effect a landing or to open a communication with the shore.[3]

On the same day, [July 17, 1776,] the Rose and one of the tenders ran up the river, the former within three miles of Fort Montgomery; plundered the house of a poor man—taking, among other things, "a "handkerchief full of Salad and a Pig so very poor "that a crow would scarcely deign to eat it"—setting the house on fire, when it was left; and then, returning to the place where the tender had run aground, in the morning, cast her anchor, where, on the following day, the Phœnix joined her.[4]

The purposes for which these vessels were sent up the river have never been satisfactorily explained; and where historians have referred to the movement at all, they have generally left the subject imperfectly told. General Howe, in his first despatch on the matter, informed the Home Government that he had "submitted to Admiral Shuldham's consideration the "propriety of sending a naval force up the North- "river, above the Town of New York, with a view to "distress the rebels on that Island, by obstructing "supplies coming down the river, and other good "consequences dependent upon that measure, which "meeting with his approbation, orders are given for "two ships, one of forty and another of twenty guns, "to proceed upon that service, the first favorable op- "portunity; and I flatter myself that these ships, "more than which cannot be spared at present from "the protection of the transports, will prove of suffi- "cient force to support themselves against all at- "tempts of the enemy, from the upper river, and to "answer the purposes for which they are intended,"[5] from which it will be seen that it was a naval movement made for a purely military purpose, originated by the General-in-chief of the Army; and, it is said, unwillingly acquiesced in, by the Admiral.[6]

It was said by General Howe, as we have seen, that the purpose was to cut off the supplies, for the City, which were brought down the river; but he also said, it will be remembered, there were "other good "consequences dependent upon that measure," of the character of which "consequences" he prudently said nothing. If, among those "other good consequences," it was intended to cut off the communication, by water, between New York and Albany and, therefore, between the Army on the northern frontier and the main Army, at the former place, as General Washington suspected,[7] that would have been a well-devised

Of the last-named excellent suggestion, General Washington subsequently wrote, * * * "but I did not think myself at liberty to "urge or request his" Governor Trumbull's "interest in forming the "Camp of six thousand men, as the levies, directed by Congress, on the "third of June, to be furnished for the defense of this place, by that "Government, are but little more than one-third come in. At the same "time, the proposition I think a good one, if it could be carried into "execution. In case the enemy should attempt to effect a landing "above Kingsbridge and to cut off the communication between this "City and the country, an Army to hang on their rear would distress "them exceedingly." General Washington to the President of the Continental Congress, "New York, 19 July, 1776."

[6] The direct authority for this statement has been mislaid; but a confirmation of it may be seen in General Howe's statement, in his despatch to Lord George Germaine, ("Staten Island, 8 July, 1776,") that no more than the Phœnix and Rose could have been spared, at that time, from the protection of the transports, even for the important service in which those two ships were employed.

purpose, since the same movement which would have cut the line of communication between the two Armies, would, also, have cut off the supplies intended for the City. It was feared, also, by General Washington,[1] that troops were on board, intended for the seizure and occupation of the passes in the Highlands; and it was also supposed, by the same vigilant commander,[2] that Arms, for the use of those who were inclined to declare for the King, were carried up the river, by these ships and by their tenders.

The success of the expedition, in the purpose for which General Howe said it was principally sent out —to cut off the supplies for the City—was unquestionable; but if that had been the real and principal purpose of the movement, in view of its complete success, the ships would not have been withdrawn after so short a stay—the command of the river, for such a purpose only, would have been just as useful, permanently, as it had been during the short period of their limited stay on the river. There must, therefore, have been "other good consequences dependent on "that measure;" and we are not inclined to admit that any Arms were aboard the ships, for the equipment of Westchester-county Loyalists, nor that any design against the Highland passes was on the programme of their proposed operations—we incline, rather, to the belief that only ostensibly were those ships sent up the river to cut off the supplies; and that, really, they were sent up to sound, not only the river but the inhabitants of the Philipsborough and the Cortlandt Manors, on the eastern bank of the river, and, to some extent, those of Orange-county, below the mountains, on the western bank, as to their disposition to declare themselves favorable to the Royal cause. The vigilance with which the Westchester-shore of the river was generally watched and the extreme backwardness of even those who had been outraged by the County and Town Committees, to abandon their families and their homes, even in retaliation or because of their honorable loyalty to their Sovereign, were so painfully evident, however, that General Howe became convinced that if "the Militia of Westchester-county "could not be depended on," in the revolutionary interest, it was equally untrustworthy, in the interest of the King; that the farmers of Westchester-county were reliable, mainly, in their love of their respective homes; that they desired nothing more than a peaceful occupation of their respective farms; and that he need not expect any military co-operation from them. He learned the lesson, faithfully; and no one who reads what he subsequently wrote,[3] no one who studies what he subsequently did, concerning the alleged loyal element of the country, will fail to trace the spirit of both his words and his actions, back to the teachings of that not unprofitable expedition of the Phœnix and the Rose into the western waters of Westchester-county.

Whatever may have been the real purposes of the expedition, the eastern shore of the river was so well guarded that no attempt was made to land, in force, for any purpose, on the Westchester-county side of it, nor was there any open communication between the ships and the inhabitants of that County, although it is known that frequent communications were effected, secretly and in the night, with some of the inhabitants of the Cortlandt Manor[4]—it is not pretended by any one, that any Loyalist, from either of the three Counties of Orange, Westchester and Duchess, sought refuge on board of either of the ships. The river

[3] In his published Despatches to the Home Government, while he held the chief command of the Army in America, and in his Narrative in a Committee of the House of Commons, relative to his Conduct, etc., especially in his Observations upon a pamphlet entitled Letters to a Nobleman, General Howe told the story of his great expection of active co-operation, in the field, from those who favored the Royal cause; of the assurances, to that effect, which he received from Governor Tryon and others; of the measures adopted by himself, under the most favorable circumstances; and of the bitter disappointment which he had experienced, in every instance.

As the inhabitants of Staten Island, and those of Queens, Westchester, and Duchess-counties were supposed to have been especially conservative and, consequently, had been most terribly outraged by the dominant faction, it was reasonably supposed, by those who were familiar with the facts, that retaliation if not loyalty would induce these, especially, to declare against those who had oppressed and outraged them; but the peaceful disposition of the farmers of lower Orange and Duchess and Westchester-counties, their simple domestic habits and controlling love of home, and their almost universal contentment with their old-time prosperity and comfort and happiness, were not taken into consideration; and, as the expedition of the Phœnix and the Rose ascertained and as General Howe subsequently learned, these were more powerful than any other consideration—the farmers referred to, preferred to endure the hardships to which they might be subjected, at home, instead of abandoning their homes and wives and children, of throwing themselves into what would have been new and untried associations and methods and experiences, and of being subjected to other hardships, in the field or in garrisons, as severe, if not more severe, as those from which they would have thus escaped.

General Howe very well said, after experience had taught him the facts, "Much might be said upon the state of loyalty and the principles "of loyalty, in America. Some are loyal from principle; many from in- "terest; many from resentment; many wish for peace, but are indiffer- "ent which side prevails; and there are others who wish success to Great "Britain, from a recollection of the happiness they enjoyed under her "government." (Observations upon a pamphlet entitled Letters to a Nobleman, 39.)

Although there may have been individuals among the farmers of Westchester-county who, under this classification, were "loyal from "principle" or from "interest" or from "resentment," there can be very little doubt that the mass of those farmers were loyal, as far as they were loyal in any degree, because of their desire for peace, no matter from whom it might come, and because of their recollection of the happiness they had enjoyed under the Colonial Government.

They practically illustrated the theory of the party of the Opposition to the Home Government, with whom they had been, generally, in harmony—"Let us alone."

[4] General Washington to John Augustine Washington, "New York, 22 "July, 1776."

There is not known to have been any communication between the Westchester-county bank of the river and the ships, while the latter remained on their lower anchorage-ground, except those referred to on page 208, ante; but, subsequently, while the ships were off the Cortlandt Manor, their boats as we shall see, were very active, during every night; and it is known the ships were visited by some of the neighboring inhabitants. The guards were less vigilant, in the upper part of the County, than they had been, near Tarrytown.

was carefully sounded, as far as the tenders went;[1] the inhabitants, especially those on the western bank of the river, were widely robbed, and, sometimes, their houses were burned;[2] and the line of communication, between the City and the upper portions of the country, was effectually cut;[3] but, if the purpose had been merely to cut off the supplies, since the supplies of the City which were taken from Westchester-county, were drawn, during the harvest-season, only in very limited quantities and those from only the near-by farmers, possessing only limited means, the ships were anchored too far up the river; and that particular purpose of the expedition must have been, to some extent, defeated, by the mistake of the officer commanding it.

The Militia who were ordered out for the protection of the storehouses and the passes in the Highlands, responded with great promptitude,[4] so much so, indeed, that General Washington was warranted in calling to the main Army some Massachusetts troops who had been sent to that vicinity;[5] and the vessels dropped down and anchored "a little below Ver-"planck's Point," and ceased to make any attempt to effect a landing, anywhere.[6]

On the twenty-sixth of July, the ships were said to have dropped down the river, still further,[7] probably to the mouth of the Croton-river;[8] and it is very evident they fell down to their original station, off Tarrytown, during either the second or third of August.[9]

In the meantime, while the ships were thus alarming nearly every one, by their movements up the river, General Washington, notwithstanding his multitude of other cares, promptly adopted measures for securing the removal of those unwelcome visitors from the waters of the Hudson. Immediately after their successful passage up the river, the General wrote to the Governors of Connecticut and Rhode Island, for the use of some of the galleys which those States had built; and, on the twenty-fourth of July, he wrote to the Convention of New York, telling it what he had done; that he was in expectation, "every "hour," that three or four of those galleys would reach the City of New York; that he had one, already; that if any measures were being taken for attacking the ships, in which these galleys could be usefully employed, to let him know; and that, "if not other-"wise materially engaged," he should be glad to co-operate with them, and to furnish any assistance which the galleys could give.[10] The reply of "the "Secret Committee" of the Convention, to whom this portion of the General's letter was referred, has not been found; but the tenor of it may be seen in the fact that two of the galleys went up the river, on the twenty-eighth of July, and three or four more on the first of August;[11] and that they probably "ran into "shoal water and creeks, whence they could warp out, "at certain times of tide, and annoy the shipping."[12] On the afternoon of the third of August, these galleys—bearing the names, respectively, of Washington, Lady Washington, Spitfire, Whiting, Independence, Crane, and an unnamed whaleboat—boldly attacked the ships, at their anchorage; and as this early naval conflict occurred in the waters of Westchester-county, we make room for the contemporary account of it:

On the twenty-sixth of July, Joshua, son of Caleb Ferris—a member of the County Committee, during 1775-6—went on board the Phœnix, remaining all night; and Philip Schurman—who had been in Boston, while the Royal Army had occupied the Town; who had been taken prisoner, by the Americans; and who had been released by reason of personal influence of his friends—Frederic Secore, "one Bailey,"* and Lewis Purdy, "from Croton River," are also known to have gone to the same ship, on that day or subsequently. (Examinations of Joshua Ferris, Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, XXXV., 69, 85.)

* On Sunday night, the twenty-eighth of July, because the New England troops had gone away, on the preceding day, leaving the river-line unguarded, the boats from the ships went ashore, "at one Bailey's," near the mouth of Croton-river; "went back, half a mile; and drove off "a pair of oxen, two cows, one calf, one heifer, and eleven sheep: no "doubt had the assistance of some Tories, on shore." (Pierre Van Cortlandt and Zephaniah Platt, Junr., to the Convention, "HEAD QUARTERS, "MOUTH OF CROTON, Augt. 2, 1776.")

Was the Bailey, at whose house the landing was thus made, the same Bailey who was seen on board the Phœnix, a few days afterwards?

"take her station in the line, according to orders). "The Spitfire advanced, in a line with the Washing- "ton; and, with her, behaved well.

"We had as hot a fire as, perhaps, was ever known, "for an hour and a half. The Washington, which I "was on board, during the whole engagement, had "the ledgings of her bow-guns knocked away, which "prevented our working them, and was otherwise "considerably damaged, being thirteen times hulled, "had three shot in the waist, many of her oars car- "ried away, etc. The Lady Washington, after hulling "the Phœnix six times, had her bow, and only, gun, "a thirty-two-pounder, on which we placed much "dependence, split seven inches, and her gun-tackles "and breechings carried away. The Spitfire was "hulled, several times, and received one shot between "wind and water, which, not being quickly discov- "ered, occasioned her making much water. The rest "of the galleys received considerable damage in their "rigging, sails, and oars.[1] Under these circumstances, "our Commodore, Colonel Tupper, thought it pru- "dent to give the signal for our little fleet to with- "draw, after manfully fighting a much superior force, "for two hours.

"Never did men behave with more firm, deter- "mined spirits, than our little crews; one of our tars, "being mortally wounded, cried to his mess-mate, 'I "'am a dying man: revenge my blood, my boys, and "'carry me alongside my gun, that I may die there.' "We were so preserved by a gracious Providence, "that in all our galleys, which consisted of six, we "we had but two men killed and fourteen wounded, "two of which are thought dangerous. We hope to "have another touch at these Pirates, before they "leave our river, which God prosper.

"P. S. The following are the particulars of the "galleys, with their killed and wounded, viz.: the "Washington, Captain Hill, four wounded; the Whit- "ing, McCleave, one killed, four wounded; the Spit- "fire, Grimes, one killed, three wounded; the Crane, "Tinker, one wounded; on board a whaleboat, two "wounded."[2]

It appears that one, Anderson, had proposed a scheme to the Continental Congress for destroying the British fleet, then lying in the harbor of New York, with fire-ships; and he had been officially recommended to General Washington, by the President of the Congress, with a request that the experiment should be made.[3] The General had, accordingly, employed Anderson in constructing two fire-vessels; and, on the eighth of August, they were sent up the river,[4] for the purpose of destroying a portion, at least, of the squadron which seems to have continued to occupy its anchorage, off Tarrytown, although, by some, it is said to have dropped down the river, to the vicinity of the Lower Yonkers. One of these vessels was commanded by Captain Fosdick, the other by

No others of the many writers on the American Revolution and General Washington, as far as we have seen them, including Stedman, Murray, Andrews, Lamb, Marshall, Hildreth, Pitkin, Lendrum, Hinman, Lossing, Bancroft, Carrington, Ridpath, etc., nor the local historian, Bolton, have paid the slightest attention to it.

We learn from the records of the "Governor and Council, or Commit- "tee of War," of Connecticut, that the Whiting and the Crane were owned by the State of Connecticut, and were, probably, those which were loaned to General Washington; that the Whiting was a new vessel, commanded by Captain John McCleave, was manned with fifty men, including her officers, and armed with four cannon, taken from the Minerva, eight swivels, and five muskets; and that the Crane was also a new vessel, commanded by Captain Jehial Tinker, was manned with fifty men, including her officers, and armed with two Continental nine-pounders, two three-pounders, eight swivels, and ten muskets.

Captain Thomas, both of them volunteers from the Army; and they must have succeeded in passing up the river and in being concealed, without having been seen by the enemy; and no one, ashore, appears to have given the slightest information concerning them.

We are told these vessels were sloops,[1] probably such as ordinarily sailed on the North-river; and that the night of the fourteenth of August was appointed for the attempt to burn the ships; but, from some unexplained cause, without having aroused any suspicion, however, the attempt was not, then, made.[2] Two nights later, that of the sixteenth of August, it was "pretty dark," and the tide was also favorable; and the mischief-laden sloops were unmoored, and allowed to drift with the tide, silently, up the river, toward their proposed victims. The Rose's tender is said to have been anchored as a look-out, ahead of the ships;[3] and Captain Thomas, without having been discovered by the enemy, steered his sloop alongside of her; grappled her; and lighted his fires. The flames from the burning vessels afforded light to Captain Fosdick, who, with very great ability, so directed his sloop that she fell alongside of the Phœnix, and grappled her, notwithstanding every effort of seamanship, on board the ship, was made to prevent it. With her fires fiercely burning, the sloop continued alongside the Phœnix, nearly a quarter of an hour, during which time the latter was also set on fire, in four places; and she was finally saved from total destruction, "almost miraculously," by a sailor who leaped, naked, on board the sloop, and, with an axe, "disengaged the "chain of the grappling which had "linked the two vessels together."[4] It is said,[5] very reasonably, that the lowness of the burning sloop, when alongside of the vastly larger frigate, prevented the more complete ignition of the latter; and that, after the vessels had been separated, the sloop was sunk by her intended victim. We are told,[6] also, that, as soon as she was disentangled from the burning sloop, "the Phœnix either cut "or slipped her cable; let fall her foresail; wore "around; and stood up the river; being immediately veiled from the spectators by the darkness of "the night;" that "the Rose and the other two "tenders remained at their moorings, although it was "said that one of the tenders was deserted by her "crew, for a time;" that the tender which was grappled by Captain Thomas was burned to the water's edge and was towed to the shore, by the Americans,[7] by whom one iron six-pound gun, two three-pounders, one two-pounder, ten swivels, a caboose and apron, some gun-barrels, cutlasses, grapplings, chains, etc., were taken from the wreck; and that the gallant crews of the fireships sustained neither loss nor injury, except in the instance of one man, who, in setting fire to his vessel, was considerably burned in his face, hands, etc., and in that of Captain Thomas, who, it was feared, perished in the attempt to fasten his vessel to the tender which it destroyed or in making his escape, by swimming, as he was not subsequently heard of. As General Washington stated in the letter from which we derive the information, when writing of him, "his bravery entitled him to a "better fate."[8]

Notwithstanding the bravery and skill of those who conducted the firevessels and the considerable success which attended their efforts, it is said that the advantages gained would have been largely increased had the galleys more actively co-operated with them; and there was evidently some dissatisfaction displayed, because of that nautical backwardness;[9] but these

General Heath reported to General Washington, on the morning after the attack, that the galleys Lady Washington and Independence had behaved well, in their co-operation with the firevessels, while the other galleys were inactive; and the Commander-in-chief answered, on the same day, expressing his pleasure in hearing of the good behavior of those who had participated in the adventure, and instructing General Heath to "inquire into the cause of the inactivity of the other galleys, "and inform him thereof."—(Richard Carey, Jun. A.D.C. to General Heath, "HEAD-QUARTERS, August 17, 1776.")

repeated attacks and the want of intercourse with the fleet and the perils to which they were exposed, prompted the commanders of the ships, on the eighteenth of August, less than forty-eight hours after the last attack had been made on them, to take advantage of a strong easterly wind and a very rainy morning, to run down the river, past the fortifications thrown up by the Americans, and to join the main body of the fleet, off Staten Island, a feat which was successfully accomplished, without any considerable damage, "the air resounding with acclamations from the "fleet, re-echoed by the Army encamped on the "heights above,"[1] as they came to the anchorage.

During the period occupied in this early naval demonstration, so interesting to those of Westchester-county who lived near the line of the Hudson-river, neither of the great opposing powers, in the City of New York and on Long Island, on the one side, and on and around Staten Island, on the other, did any thing else than to strengthen their respective forces and prepare for the rapidly approaching contest. General Washington continued to strengthen his defences, both in the City of New York and on Long Island; but the backwardness of the distant States, in sending reinforcements to the Army, not only caused a constant anxiety, at Head-quarters, but an alarm which extended beyond the lines of the Camp.[2] behavior of the crews of all of them, "in the first attack made on the "ships in the North River," for which they had been tried and condemned by a Continental Court-martial, that officer, writing "by his Ex-"cellency's commands," (vide page 390, ante) said of the subsequent operation of those galleys, "In the late affair, Captain McCleave must be ex "cepted from the general censure, as he managed with prudence and "propriety. But Captain Tinker, with the wind at South, and on the "tide of flood" [flood of tide?] "when the ships could move, left his vessel, "though stationed as a guard, to go up to King's Bridge, after some "clothes, as he pretends. The consequence was, that, in the hurry and "confusion, and long before they were in danger, they left the gal-"ley aground, though they might have burned or bilged her. The enemy "took possession of her, in half an hour; and she, with the other, left "under the like circumstances, will probably prove the most formidable "force they can have, to oppose us, on the river. There was a place of "safety provided for the other galleys, which they might have got into, "as well as McCleave; but they passed it, in their hurry." What purports to have been copied from a contemporary drawing of the brilliant scene, made by Sir James Wallace, who had command of the Rose, on the occasion now under notice, may be seen in The Manual of the Corporation of the City of New York for 1864, opposite page 672. It is understood to have been copied from the original drawing, in the British Museum; and it has been re-produced, in perfect fac-simile, but reduced in size, for the illustration of this article. (Vide page 391, ante.)

What the local historian of Westchester-county possibly intended for a description of this daring attempt to destroy the ships, was in these words, taken from his description of the property of the late Elijah Rich, near Yonkers: "Here, in 1777, a memorable engagement took "place between the two British frigates, the Rose and the Phœnix, which "lay off at anchor, and the gun-boats of the patriots which sallied out "of the harbor of Yonkers, having in tow a large tender filled with "combustibles, intending to run it alongside of the frigates. The crews, "however, kept it off, by means of spars; and a heavy fire of grape and "cannister compelled the gun-boats and their brave crews to seek shelter "in the mouth of the Saw Mill. The year previous," he continued, "General Heath had been requested by the person in command of the "fireships, to be a spectator of the burning of these vessels," quoting, in full, what General Heath, in his Memoirs, under the date of the sixteenth of August, 1776, had said of the attempt to destroy these ships, which is the subject of the narrative, in the text. (History of Westchester-county, original edition, ii., 459, 460; the same, second edition, ii., 627, 628.)

As it is more than probable that the ships, when they were attacked, were off Tarrytown, instead of below Yonkers; as Yonkers, in 1777, was within the British lines, and so could not have afforded a rendezvous, in the Saw-Mill-river, for American gun-boats and fireships, during that year; as the Phœnix and the Rose had dropped down to the anchorage of the Royal Fleet, off Staten Island, on the eighteenth of August, 1776, two days after the engagement described in the text; and as the authority whom he quoted, in full, described the engagement, of which he was an eye-witness, as having taken place on the sixteenth of August, 1776, it will be evident to the reader that the historian of Westchester-county, as well as his posthumous Editor, blundered.

[2] In order that the reader may understand the gravity of the subject, and be the better prepared for the recital of the narrative of those stirring events which occurred within the succeeding month, we make room for the following:

"It gives us great pain to inform you that the aid received from our "sister States is very inadequate to our expectations, none of them hav-"ing yet completed the levies directed by Congress, which leaves us "reason to fear that, instead of using every means that human wisdom "dictates, for ensuring success, we shall, (with inferior numbers,) on "the doubtful issue of a single battle, hazard the glorious cause for "which we have hitherto struggled." (The Convention of New York to the Delegation from New York in the Continental Congress, "HARLEM, 7th Au-"gust, 1776, A.M.")

"It is our great misfortune that, at this important crisis, this State is "unable to make those exertions which the cause of America requires. "From the disaffection of some among us; from the want of arms; "from the exposed situation of Long Island and our frontiers; from the "possession of one County by the enemy; and from the probability of "our being called upon to reinforce the northern Army, we are unable "to add much strength to your Excellency's command, being, by the "several reasons above-mentioned, deprived of the assistance of nine "Counties out of fourteen which compose this State. Notwithstanding "all these difficulties, we are determined to combat every obstacle and "to strain every nerve in defense of the rights and liberties of America, "which we conceive to be most materially interested in the safety of this "State. By our Resolutions for ordering the several drafts made in the "Counties of Suffolk, Queens, Kings, Westchester, Duchess, Ulster, and "Orange, to the environs of New York, we hope, in about six days, to "add near three thousand men to your Army.

"We lament, exceedingly, that we should have occasion to complain "of the languid efforts which the neighbouring States have made for "our assistance. From the zeal they professed for the public cause; "from the vicinity of some of them to this invaded country; and from "the dangerous situation in which Connecticut, Massachusetts, Penn-"sylvania, and Jersey must be in, should the enemy succeed in their "designs against this State, we expected the most strenuous and expe-"ditious exertions. How great our concern [is] at finding so considera-"ble a deficiency in the establishment of this Army, your Excellency "may easily judge from the feelings of a patriotic bosom, on the im-"portance of the cause and the dangers to which it is, by these means, "exposed.

"We flatter ourselves, however, that this supineness will not be of General Howe, on the contrary, had been strengthened, on the twelfth of July, by the arrival of his brother, Admiral Lord Howe, with the long expected reinforcements for the Royal Army ;[1] and he brought, also, a Commission from the King, appointing his brother, General Howe, and himself [2] to be Commissioners for granting pardons to those of the Americans who should ask for the clemency of the Sovereign.[3] On the twelfth of August, the two fleets, under the convoy, respectively, of Commodore Hotham and the Repulse, met off Sandy-hook, and entered the harbor together, bringing another heavy reinforcement to the Royal Army, as well as the much needed Camp-equipage ;[4] two days later, [August 14, 1776,] Sir Peter Parker reached Staten Island, with the remains of the expedition which had been sent to Virginia and the Carolinas ;[5] and, at the same time, Lord Dunmore, "with the refugees and blackamoors "from Virginia,"[6] and Lord William Campbell, recently Governor of South Carolina, also joined General Howe.[7] Although General Howe made no mention of them, in his despatches to Lord George Germaine, it is said the Royal Army was strengthened, also, about the same time, by the accession of "several Regiments from Florida and the West In-"dies ;"[8] and, although about one half the German troops had not arrived—they were on the ocean, but were not immediately expected—the strength and discipline and appointments and spirits of the Army were greatly superior to those of the American Army, and reasonably promised greater success, in the field.

The Convention of the State, during that period of suspense, removed back from the White Plains to Harlem, occupying the old Church-building of the Reformed Dutch Church ;[9] and, nearer to the scene of the expected troubles, it provided for the protection of the Hudson-river and Long Island Sound, where the enemy was expected to make a landing, in force, by ordering the entire Militia of Westchester-county to appear, with five days' provisions, to take possession of such points, on the river and Sound, as General Morris should regard as most exposed to the enemy ; to remain in service during ten days ; to receive Continental pay and subsistence ; and that each man who should not have arms should bring with him a shovel, spade, or pickaxe, or a scythe straightened and fixed on a pole[10]—the latter, not easily to "any duration ; and that the Continental Congress will devise means of "affording the most expeditious and effectual assistance to preserve a "State, the loss of which, from its geographical situation and the politi-"cal character of too many of its inhabitants, would be almost fatal to "the cause of American liberty." (The Convention of New York to General Washington, "HARLEM, Augt. 9, 1776.")

"I am extremely concerned that the quotas of men to be furnished by "the neighboring States have proved so deficient. The busy season "and harvest, to which it has been ascribed, being now over, in a great "degree, I flatter myself, from the zeal they have heretofore manifested, "they will afford every possible assistance, They are well apprised of "the importance of this State, in the present contest, and the necessity "of maintaining it against the attempts of the enemy." (General Washington to the Convention, "NEW-YORK, August 11, 1776.")

How ill-founded General Washington's faith in the sincerity of the other States was, beyond the limits of their respective individual interests, has been duly recorded in history, is well-known to every intelligent reader, and need not be repeated, in this place.

[1] General Washington to General Schuyler, "NEW YORK, 15 July, 1776 ;" The Annual Register for 1776 : History of Europe,* 167 ; etc.

Stedman, (History of the American War, i., 191,) said the Admiral and his command arrived at Sandy-hook, on the first of July ; but his error will be evident to every one.

[2] As the remarkable influence which the General and the Admiral possessed over the King, even under the most adverse circumstances, has been frequently noticed and very rarely explained, a passing notice of the reason for that influence may not be unwelcome to the reader.

de Lancey, in his Notes on Jones's History of New-York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 722,) has partly "let the cat out of the bag," by saying they "were sons of Emanuel Scrope Howe, second Viscount "Howe, by Mary Sophia, an illegitimate daughter of George I., by his "mistress, the Hanoverian Baroness Kilmansegge, and, consequently, "in point of fact, first cousins once removed of George III." But our friend appears to have gone a little astray, since George III. was the great-grandson of George I. ; and the children of a daughter of the latter could hardly have been "first cousins once removed" of the former. Besides, if our memory serves us correctly, the mother of the Howes, whomsoever she may have been, was a paramour of Frederic Lewis, son of George II., and father of George III., even after her convenient marriage with Viscount Howe ; and the very distinctive features and the peculiar physical ailments of the two brothers, which they shared with the King, very clearly indicated whose offspring they were, although they were born in wedlock and were, therefore, nominally, Howes. They were, in fact, half-brothers of the King.

[3] The extent of the authority of the brothers, Admiral and General Howe, as Commissioners for the restoration of Peace, in America, has been so variously stated, that the careful reader will do well to refer to their Commission, which may be found in a most singular connection with a mass of papers concerning the Expedition commanded by General Burgoyne, which appear to have been laid before the House of Commons, early in 1778. (Almon's Parliamentary Register, London : 1778, viii., 308–312.)

When Lord North, closely pinned in debate, declared that "taxation "was not to be given up : it was to be enforced : but whether at present "or hereafter was a point of policy which the Commissioners would "learn, on the spot, by sounding the people upon the spot," there was point as well as wit in what Charles James Fox said, in reply : "Accord-"ing to the noble Lord's explanation, Lord Howe and his brother are "to be sent out as spies, not as Commissioners, and if they cannot get on "shore, they are to sound upon the coasts." [9] That old Church-edifice occupied the Church lot, on the South side of the Great Way, or Church-lane, not far from the Harlem-river. As the Streets and Avenues now run, it was inside of the block bounded by the First and Second-avenues and One hundred and twenty-fourth and One hundred and twenty-fifth-streets, near the present intersection of the First-avenue and One hundred and twenty-fourth-street, as it has been described to us by our friend, James Riker, Esq., of Waverly, New York, the distinguished historian of Harlem, etc.

The features of the old building may be seen in the View of Harlem from Morrisania, copied from the original drawing, in the British Museum ; and reproduced in the Manual of the Corporation of the City of New York for 1863, opposite page 610 ; and, again, on page 218 of this work, for the illustration of this article.

be done, as any Westchester-county farmer could have told those Deputies by whom this order was made. As we have elsewhere stated,[1] Kings-county "determined not to oppose the enemy," although the latter had not made any attempt to occupy it; and the Convention, it will be remembered, made some rash movements toward crowding all who lived within that County into still greater acts of hostility against the Americans, instead of inspiriting them and securing their continued fealty to the State of which they were members. It provided for the removal of all which remained, of those Cannon which had been brought from the City and laid on the roadsides of the County of Westchester—those which had been spiked and unspiked, guarded and left unguarded, at such heavy cost, some months previously[2]—and General Clinton was requested to have carriages made for such of those guns as he should consider necessary for the defence of the works to the northward of King's Bridge.[3] At the suggestion of General Washington,[4] measures were taken for the removal of the women, children, and infirm persons, in the City of New York, to places of greater safety;[5] for obstructing the navigation, in both the Hudson and the East-rivers, as well as in Buttermilk-channel, the latter separating Governor's-island from Long Island;[6] providing for the temporary support of those who should be driven from their homes, by the enemy;[7] transferring the disposition of those whom it had cast into prison, because of "suspicions" which somebody had entertained concerning them, to the several County Committees, but in a tone of mildness which was remarkably unusual;[8] and, in other ways, endeavoring to serve the cause of the country—one of the most remarkable of the multitude of subjects which, at that time, crowded themselves before the Convention, for its consideration, was a letter from John Sleght, Chairman of the Committee of Kingston, "stating "that the women surround the Committee-chamber, "and say, if they cannot have Tea, their husbands "and sons shall fight no more."[9]

At length, every preparation for service in the field having been made, on Thursday, the twenty-second of August, the Campaign was opened. Had Lord Howe been despatched, with the heavy reinforcements which he brought, directly to New York instead of to Halifax—and, since it was known, in England, that New York would be the base of all the operations of the Campaign, there was no other reason than the bad judgment of those, in England, who controlled the movements of the troops, that he was not thus sent—the Campaign could have been opened several weeks earlier, when General Washington was much less prepared to receive an enemy, and, therefore, when a complete success in the suppression of the Rebellion was very much more promising; but that Almighty power which controlled all things, had other purposes; and the cause of America was promoted by that remarkable blunder among those who opposed it.

On the morning of Thursday, the twenty-second of August, as we have said, the active operations of the

It may be proper for us to say that the Chairman's letter was referred to the Deputation from Ulster-county; and that, a few weeks subsequently, tired of waiting for the Tea, "mobs, from different parts "of the country," went to Kingston; broke open the buildings which contained it; and, undoubtedly, helped themselves and their mothers and sisters and wives and daughters to what was then officially called "that detestable article called TEA."

Royal Army were commenced by the movement of the British Grenadiers and Light Infantry and the Hessians, or rather the German, Grenadiers, Light Infantry, and Chasseurs—the last-named commanded by the Count Donop—the whole numbering "not less "than four thousand men,"[1] of the élite of the Army, the whole commanded by General Sir Henry Clinton, to Gravesend Bay, near Coney-island, where, under the fire of three frigates and two bombketches,[2] the naval portion of the movement having been commanded by Commodore Hotham, the entire detachment, with forty pieces of artillery, were landed, in two hours and a half, without meeting the slightest opposition from the Americans. This Division of the Royal Army having met with no resistance, the remainder of the Army and of the artillery—except two Brigades of Germans, under General de Heister, and another Brigade of Germans, a detachment of the Fourteenth Infantry, from Virginia, some convalescents and some recruits, all of them commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Dalrymple, which were left for the protection of Staten Island—were also landed on Long Island, during the morning.[3]

The purposes of this work do not require us to follow the immediately subsequent operations of the two Armies; and the general knowledge which prevails concerning the disastrous "Battle of Long Island," made more disastrous by reason of "the obstinate, "self-conceited, inefficiency," if not by the criminal disobedience and neglect, of General Israel Putnam; concerning the remarkable retreat of the American Army, from Long Island, made more remarkable and successful through the nautical skill of Colonel John Glover and his Regiment of Marblehead fishermen; concerning the successful occupation of the City of New York, by the Royal Army, made more successful by reason of the arrant cowardice of those who had been posted at Kip's-bay, for the purpose of obstructing any attempt which the enemy should make to effect a landing at that place, as well as by reason of the greater cowardice of the Brigade of Massachusetts troops, commanded by General Fellows, and that of the Brigade of Connecticut troops, commanded by General Parsons, both of them, eight Regiments, in all, sent for the support of the small shore-guard; concerning the successful evacuation of the City of New York, by the American Army, made more successful by the tact and hospitality of Mary Lindley Murray and by the soldierly ability and the knowledge of the ground, of Aaron Burr; concerning the brilliant skirmish on Harlem Heights, made more brilliant by the daring bravery of Major Leitch, of Virginia, and that of Colonel Thomas Knolton, of Connecticut; and concerning the apparent inactivity, in both the Armies, which prevailed, during several succeeding weeks,—the general knowledge which prevails, concerning all these subjects, renders anything else than a mere reference to them, unnecessary. But, nevertheless, there were some minor operations, of both parties, during that period, which may well receive passing notices.

Early on the morning of the twenty-seventh of August, two ships and a brig anchored a little above Throgg's-neck; and before the troops whom General Heath had sent for the purposes of protecting the neighboring property, could reach the shore, several barges had gone ashore, on City-island; killed several cattle;[4] and carried away the dead animals and one of the inhabitants. The troops managed to secure the remainder of the cattle which were on the island.[5]

As there was an evident intention, on the part of the enemy, to occupy one or more positions, on New York-island or within Westchester-county or both, General Heath, who commanded all the Continental troops at Kingsbridge and in the last-mentioned County, with that faithful attention to his duties which so generally characterized him, ordered a chain of vedettes and other sentries to be maintained at Morrisania, Hunt's-point, Throgg's-neck, and other points, on the Sound, in order that the movements of the enemy, had he inclined to move to those neighborhoods, or to either of them, might be promptly made known to him.[6] The usefulness of that wise precaution will be seen, hereafter.

For the purpose of cutting the line of communication of the City of New York, through the Sound, with the sea—the way to the ocean, by way of the Narrows, having been already occupied by him—the enemy very judiciously occupied Barren-island, belonging to Westchester-county, Montresor's—now Randall's—island, and what is now known as Ward's-island—the latter two belonging to the County of New York, all of which, to some extent, at least, commanded the passage to and through the Sound;[7] and, on the tenth and eleventh of September, a considerable body of troops was landed on Montresor's-island,[8] which entirely commanded the Manor-house—all there was, at that time, of Morrisania, except the small farmhouses of the manorial tenantry, which were scattered over the surrounding country. The channel which separated Morrisania, in Westchester-county, from Montresor's-island, in the City of New York, being quite narrow, and a heavy picket of four hundred and fifty mounted men having been constantly maintained at Morrisania, the sentries of the respective forces, posted within half-gunshot distance, sometimes fired at each other, in violation of the inconsistent usages of War; and General Heath has recorded some interesting instances of both the friendly and the unfriendly correspondence of these very important minor outposts.[1] But a couple deserters from a man-of-war which was anchored off the island, conveyed such information to General Heath as led him to suppose that the entire force which occupied that island could be easily captured; and, having submitted the subject to the consideration of the General Officers of his Division and to General Washington, and, having received the approval of all, he proceeded to make the attempt. Two hundred and forty men were detached for that purpose; and the command of the expedition was given to Lieutenant-colonel Michael Jackson and Major Logan and Major Hatfield, the latter of Westchester-county. They were to embark, at the new Bridge over the Harlem-river, on board of three large floats; to be covered by a fourth float, similar to the others and carrying a detachment of Artillery, with a light three-pounder gun; to fall down the Harlem-river, with the ebb, during the night, to Morrisania; and the calculation was so made that, at daybreak, the young flood should be so much made, at the island, as to cover the flats, at the proposed place of landing, sufficiently for the floats to leave Morrisania, and be run ashore. The various sentries, on the line of the Harlem-river, were said to have been informed of the character of the movement, and instructed to permit the expedition to pass down the river, without challenging it; and every promise of a successful result was heard from all who were to be concerned in it or who knew of the proposed plan of operations. Notwithstanding one of the sentries had not been told of the expedition or had misunderstood the Order which had been given to him, and had resolutely disregarded the entreaties for silence which had been made, and had discharged his musket, giving an alarm, the enemy does not appear to have been disturbed; and the three floats ran up to the place appointed for the landing, without serious opposition, and at the appointed time. But, there, a new and entirely unlooked-for obstruction was encountered. The orders were that the float which contained the three commanding Officers should run ashore, between the other two; that the two Majors should jump ashore, one to the right and the other to the left, and take command of the men who were on those two outside floats, respectively, while Lieutenant-colonel Jackson should retain the command of those who were on the central float; and that the three parties should act in concert. The Officers and those who were on the central float sprang ashore, as they were expected; received and repulsed a charge which the enemy's guard made on them; but failed to receive the slightest support from those who were on the other two floats, who, instead of landing, sullenly "lay upon their oars." The enemy seeing that disaffection, rallied, and returned to the charge, with great spirit; and the Americans, those from the central float, finding themselves deserted, returned to their own float, with heavy loss; and the entire expedition withdrew from the island—whether the fourth float, on which were the Artillery and which was intended as a covering party, performed any service, is not now known, as nothing whatever has been said of it, in the narrative of the encounter and retreat. It is said that Lieutenant-colonel Jackson received a musket-ball in his leg; that Major Thomas Henley, one of the Aides-de-camp of General Heath, who had insisted on going out with the expedition, as a Volunteer, was shot through his heart, as he was getting into the float; that Major Hatfield was missing; and that the Americans lost, in killed, wounded, and missing, fourteen men.[2]

There was a wide-spread sorrow expressed for the death of Major Henley, who appears to have been a general favorite; and the cowardice of those who held back their support was as widely reprobated; but, in the prevailing temper of that period, although the delinquents were arrested and tried by Court-martial, nothing appears to have been done with them, beyond the cashiering of one of the Captains.[3]

The atrocities of both Officers and Privates of the American Army and the inadequacy of the punishments, therefor, to which the delinquents were then subjected, may be seen in multitudes of instances, throughout the contemporary publications; but the letter of General Washington, written to the President of the Continental Congress, "HEIGHTS OF

The apparent inactivity of the two opposing Armies, during several weeks after the occupation of the City of New York, was not understood, even by the Congress, and created some uneasiness;[1] but both were actively employed, the Royal Army in throwing up a line of defences, on the high grounds overlooking the Harlem-plains, from the South, in order to protect the City from an attack from the landside, when the main Army should be put in motion, for other operations;[2] and the American Army in not only throwing up defences on the high grounds overlooking the Harlem-plains, from the North, in order to protect itself from any attack which might be made on it, in that remarkably strong position,[3] but in throwing up defensive works, in its rear and at distant points, in order to guard against any surprise, by the enemy, of either of those points.[4]

During that long interval of apparent inactivity in the two Armies, the Convention of New York and its Committee of Safety were not idle nor inattentive to the interests of the country. It provided for the removal of the women, children, and infirm, and that of the poor, from the City of New York, in some instances into Westchester-county;[5] and the care of the public records also received its careful attention.[6] When the enemy's shipping threatened the shores of Suffolk, it appealed for help from Connecticut, in view of its own inability to afford protection;[7] when the Army retreated from Long Island, wisely foreseeing that the Horses, Cattle, Hogs, and Sheep, within the County of New York and the lower portions of Westchester-county, would become exposed to the depredations of the enemy, the Committee of Safety ordered them to be, forthwith, driven into the interior parts of the State, and requested General Washington to make that order public, and to give all possible assistance in carrying it into execution;[8] and, subsequently, when the purpose of the enemy to occupy Westchester-county had become more evident, Stephen Ward was appointed a Commissary "to purchase "all the Cattle fit for the use of the Army, within "that County, and to drive them down to the Army, "at King's Bridge, as fast as they may be wanted; "PROVIDED, that so much shall be left as is abso- "lutely necessary for the support of the families from "whom the same shall be taken."[9] At the same time, orders were given by the Committee of Safety, "that if any person shall refuse to part with his "Cattle, at a reasonable price, the Commissary be "directed to drive them down to the Army, and re- "turn to the owner the money for which they were "sold, after deducting the contingent charge;" "that "all the Hides of the Cattle so driven and killed, be "carefully preserved and sent to some safe place, on "the North side of the Highlands, where, being ap- "praised by persons hereafter to be named for that "purpose, they shall be paid for, by the State;" "that Gil. Budd Horton, Alexander Hunt, James "Varian, and Joseph Youngs be appointed Commis- "sioners to drive all the Horses, Hogs, Sheep, and "Cattle, from those parts of the County of Westches- "ter which lay upon the Sound or the Hudson's-river, "and which are any way exposed to the enemy, and "to billet them out upon the farms that lay in the "interior part of the County, till the same can be "otherwise disposed of; and that a reasonable com- "pensation be allowed them, for their trouble;" "that the farmers in the County of Westchester im- "mediately thresh out all their Grain, as the Straw "will be absolutely necessary for the use of the Army, "and as those who do not comply with this Resolu- "tion will be in danger of having their Straw taken "for the use of the Army, even though the same "should not be threshed;" "that His Excellency "General Washington be empowered to order any "Straw in the County of Westchester to be taken for "the use of the Army, paying to the owners a reason- "able compensation therefor;" "that the Chairman "or Deputy Chairman of the County of Westchester, "for the time being, on application from the Commis- "sary-general, be empowered to take so much of the "Grain, in the County of Westchester, as shall be "necessary for the use of the Army, allowing to the "owners thereof the now current price, and paying "them upon the delivery, PROVIDED, always, that "so much shall be left in the hands of the owners as "will be sufficient to support their families for nine "months, and to perfect the fattening of such Hogs "as may, now, be actually put up, for that purpose;" "that His Excellency General Washington, in case "that the Cattle, Hogs, Sheep, Horses, or Hay, in the "County of Westchester, should be in danger of fall"ing into the hands of the enemy, be empowered "either to remove it or them, therefrom, or, if that "should not be practicable, to destroy the same;" "that the Commissary or Commissaries hereby ap- "pointed be empowered to appoint Agents under "them, and to call upon any officer commanding any "part of the Militia, for such detachments of the men "under his command as will be necessary to carry "the same into execution;" "that Mr. Stephen Ward "apply to the Commissary-general for such sums of "money as will, from time to time, be necessary to "carry the above Resolves into execution;" and "that a copy of the above Resolutions be sent to His "Excellency General Washington and to the Com- "missary-general, requesting their assistance in car- "rying the same into execution."[1] In the absence of General Lewis Morris, whose hankerings were evidently for something else than for active service in the field, at the head of his Brigade,[2] Colonel Joseph Drake, of New Rochelle, the senior Colonel, was placed in command of the Westchester-county Militia, with instructions to "call out as many of the Militia, "with five days provisions, as he shall think suffi- "cient to watch the motions of the enemy's ships,[3] "now in the Sound, and to prevent all communica- "tion with the disaffected inhabitants in said County; "and that he send notice, from time to time, to the "Convention, of every remarkable occurrence; and, "for that purpose, that he is hereby empowered to "press horses, when he shall think it necessary."[4] In faithful compliance with the Order thus sent to him, enough of the Militia were ordered out to guard from Rye-neck to Rodman's-neck, Colonel Graham's Regiment being at Throgg's-neck; and Colonel Budd was to send a hundred men and to guard from the Snuff-mills to Rye-neck.[5] Two days after the disastrous engagement on Long Island, the Convention adjourned from Harlem to Fiskill;[6] and its Committee followed, holding sessions, while on it way, at King's Bridge,[7] at the house of Mr. Odell on Philipse's Manor,[8] at the house of John Blagge, at Croton-river;[9] and, possibly, elsewhere.[10] It constructed fire-ships, for the protection of the Hudson-river from the enemy's vessels;[11] and it continued the support of the State's cruisers, on the ocean.[12] It attended to the removal of the military stores which were endangered by the movements of the enemy;[13] it ordered all the bells to be taken from the Churches[14] and all the brass knockers from the doors of houses,[15] "in order that the "fortune of War may not throw the same into the "hands of our enemy and deprive this State, at this "critical period, of that necessary, though unfortu- "nate, resource for supplying our want of cannon;" it provided Lances for those of the Militia whom it was unable to provide with other arms;[16] and when General Washington's supply of Gunpowder had become unsafely small, it replenished it from its own resources.[17] It appointed, on the motion of John Jay, a special "Committee of Safety and Correspondence "for that part of this State which lies below the "Highlands," Colonel Henry Remsen, Major Garret Abeel, and Major Peter Pra Van Zandt, all of them of the City of New York, having been appointed as that Committee;[18] but, notwithstanding James Duane and John Jay and William Duer were also appointed "to draw up Instructions" for that Committee, and notwithstanding the stirring events of which that portion of the State, "below the Highlands," very soon became the scene, nothing more was heard of either the Instructions or the Committee of Safety which was thus erected. It strengthened the works which had been thrown up for the defense of the Highlands; and it added to those defences some "works on the East side of the river, about three "miles below Fort Montgomery, at a place called "Red Hook, near Peekskill, which are well-calcu-

These Resolutions were proposed by Robert R. Livingston.

[2] On the sixteenth of September, "the Convention was informed "that the Militia of Westchester-county are not so properly arranged "and managed as they ought to be, at this critical juncture, which is "occasioned by the absence of General Morris;" and it "Therefore, "RESOLVED, That General Morris, now at the General Congress, do im- "mediately return and resume the command of his Brigade;" and ordered the Resolution to be transmitted to General Morris, "with the "utmost despatch." (Journal, "Die Lunæ, 4 ho., P.M., Sept. 16, 1776.") The General's reply to that order of the Convention, dated "PHILADEL- "PHIA, Septr. 24, 1776," is one of the most remarkable displays of evident cowardice and military imbecility on record, (vide page 204, ante;) and if the withering rejoinder, written by Robert R. Livingston, which the Committee of Safety sent to the General, with a peremptory Order to take the command of his Brigade, dated "October the 8th, 1776," did not effect its purpose, it certainly conveyed to the bashful Brigadier an evidence of what others thought of his remarkable conduct, as a soldier.

"lated to prevent the enemy's landing on that side "and becoming masters of the Highlands, opposite to "Fort Montgomery."[1] When the evacuation of the City of New York was made at the expense of large quantities of Flour, it appointed Agents, with instructions to purchase all the Flour which could be obtained in Duchess, Orange, and Ulster-counties, and to send it to the Commissary-general of the Army, at Spyt den Duivel-creek:[2] when the Army needed Pork, Beef, and other Stores, the Convention opened its Storehouses, in Westchester-county, into which it had gathered large quantities of the products of that County, the crops of the preceding year:[3] it purchased material for and provided for the manufacture of Clothing, for the Army:[4] it busied itself about salting Pork, in the County of Westchester, during the approaching season:[5] and whatever it supposed would promote the common cause and whatever it was requested to do, for that purpose, by either the Continental Congress or the Commander-in-chief or the General commanding the northern Army, was done, to the full extent of its ability and resources, with cheerfulness, promptitude, and thoroughness, never failing to receive, in return, the unqualified and entire approval of him whose entire approval was never idly bestowed.

On the twenty-first of September, the American Army, at Kingsbridge and its dependencies, which included General Heath's command, in Westchester-county, consisted, nominally, of four thousand, five hundred, and twenty-eight Commissioned Officers, Staff, and Non-commissioned Officers, and twenty-seven thousand, three hundred, and seventy-seven rank and file, exclusive of Colonel Knox's Regiment of Artillery, which contained, nominally, five hundred and forty-three men, including all the Commissioned and Non-commissioned Officers and Staff, and exclusive, also, of Colonel Durkee's Regiment and a Company of Artillery, both of them at Powle's-hook, now Jersey City, from whom no Returns had been received, during that week. But of those nearly twenty-eight thousand men, in the ranks, four thousand, four hundred, and fifty-three were present, sick; three thousand, four hundred, and thirty-three were absent, sick; three thousand, eight hundred, and thirty were absent, "on command;" and ninety-six were on furlough; leaving only about sixteen thousand men, including the Artillery and excluding the Officers, who were actually present and fit for duty.[6] Of these, thirteen Regiments were Militia, temporarily serving in the service of the Continent;[7] and, since the disastrous results on Long Island and in the City of New York, the entire Army was greatly dispirited and inspired no confidence in its Commander-in-chief.[8] On the thirtieth of September, the number of rank and file, [8] "The check our detachment sustained on the 27th ultimo has dis- "pirited too great a proportion of our troops, and filled their minds with "apprehension and despair. The Militia, instead of calling forth their "utmost efforts to a brave and manly opposition, in order to repair our "losses, are dismayed, intractable, and impatient to return. Great num- "bers of them have gone off; in some instances, almost by whole Regi- "ments, by half ones, and by Companies, at a time. This circumstance, "of itself, independent of others, when fronted by a well-appointed "enemy, superior in number to our whole collected force, would be "sufficiently disagreeable; but, when their example has infected another "part of the Army, when their want of discipline and refusal of almost "every kind of restraint or government have produced a like conduct "but too common to the whole and an entire disregard of that order "and subordination necessary to the well-being of an Army, and which "had been inculcated before, as well as the nature of our military es- "tablishment would admit of, our condition becomes still more alarm- "ing; and, with the deepest concern, I am obliged to confess my want "of confidence in the generality of the troops." (General Washington to the President of the Congress, "New-York, September 2, 1776.")

"Before I conclude, I must take the liberty of mentioning to Congress "the great distress we are in for want of money. Two months' pay (and "more to some Battalions) is now due to the troops, here, without any- "thing in the Military chest to satisfy it. This occasions much dissatis- "faction and almost a general uneasiness. Not a day passes without "complaints and the most importunate and urgent demands, on this "head. As it may injure the service greatly, and the want of a reg- "ular supply of Cash produces consequences of the most fatal tendency, "I entreat the attention of Congress to this subject, and that we may "be provided, as soon as can be, with a sum equal to every present "claim." (General Washington to the President of the Congress, "New- "York, 6 September, 1776.")

In his letter to the Congress, on the eighth of September, the General said, "On every side, there is a choice of difficulties; and every "measure, on our part, however painful the reflection is, from experi- "ence, is to be formed with some apprehension that all our troops "will not do their duty." After the experience of the General had been made more complete, by the cowardice of the troops at Kip's-bay, he thus wrote, also to the Congress, "We are now encamped, with "the main body of the Army, on the Heights of Haerlem, where I should "hope the enemy would meet with a defeat, in case of an attack, if the "generality of our troops would behave with tolerable bravery. But "experience, to my extreme affliction, has convinced me that this is "rather to be wished for than expected. However, I trust that there "are many who will act like men, and show themselves worthy of the "blessings of freedom." (Letter to the Congress, "Head-quarters, at "Colonel Morris's house, 16 September, 1776.") On the day after the date of the Returns of the Army which are referred to in the text, the General wrote to his brother, "the dependence which the Congress have "placed upon the Militia has already greatly injured and, I fear, will "totally ruin our cause. Being subject to no control, themselves, they "introduce disorder among the troops whom we have attempted to dis- "cipline; while the change in their living brings on sickness; and this "causes an impatience to get home, which spreads, universally, and in- "troduces abominable desertions. In short, it is not in the power of "words to describe the task I have to perform. Fifty thousand pounds "would not induce me again to undergo what I have done." (General Washington to John Augustine Washington, "Heights of Haerlem, 22 "September, 1776.") present and fit for duty, including Colonel Knox's Regiment of Artillery, was reduced to fifteen thousand, one hundred, and four;[1] and on the fifth of October, the same rank and file, present and fit for duty, including the Artillery, numbered only fourteen thousand, four hundred, and eighty-six, exclusive of seven skeleton Regiments of Connecticut and Rhode Island, forming two nominal Brigades, each with its full complements of Officers and Staff, in which there were nominally twelve hundred and seventy-five men, present and fit for duty. There was, also, a body of Massachusetts Militia, "computed at four thousand, "so scattered and ignorant of the forms of Returns "that none can be got;" and a Regiment of New Hampshire Militia was posted at the White Plains and another at the Fishkills, "under the like circum-"stances."[2]

While the American Army was thus made weaker, day by day, by the disaffection or the despair of the sickly, despondent, home-sick, and ill-provided-for men who composed it—men who, in multitudes of instances, had enlisted either from necessity, occasioned by the prevailing prostration of every kind of business, or because they had been enforced to do so, by drafts, or because it had afforded opportunities for speculation and plunder, without, in either class, the slightest pretence to a care for "the "cause of America" or to even a love of country—the Royal Army, well-appointed and well-officered, numbered upwards of thirty thousand effective men, exclusive of those who were left for the protection of Staten Island and of those who were sick.[3] Indeed, in the graphic language of one of the most able writers of that period, at the time now under consideration an intimate friend of the master-spirits of the Convention of New York, "The British Army was "commanded by able and experienced Officers; the "rebel by men destitute of military skill or experience "and, for the most part, taken from mechanic arts or "the plough. The first were possessed of the best "appointments, and of more than they could use; "and the other of the worst, and of less than they "wanted. The one were attended by the ablest Sur-"geons and Physicians, healthy, and high-spirited; "the other were neglected in their health, clothing, "and pay, were sickly, and constantly murmuring "and dissatisfied. And the one were veteran troops, "carrying victory and conquest wheresoever they were "led; the other were new-raised and undisciplined, "a panic-struck and defeated enemy, whenever at-"tacked—such is the true comparative difference "between the force sent to suppress, and that which "supported, the Rebellion."[4]

General Lincoln's command can scarcely be regarded, with any propriety, as a portion of the main Army nor as a part of the fighting force of any Army, since it was sent for, to perform police duty, to quiet the apprehensions of the Convention of New York on account of the disaffected, in that State—those whom the Congresses and the Committees had forced into disaffection, by the outrages which had been inflicted on them, in the vain attempt to secure an entire conformity of political opinions with the official opinions of the dominant faction.

[3] General Howe's Returns show that, when he occupied Staten Island, after the arrival of the reinforcements brought by Lord Howe, say on the ninth of August, his command numbered, including his Officers, twenty-nine thousand, three hundred, and eight, of whom twenty four thousand, two hundred, and twenty-seven were rank and file, fit for duty. (Reply to the Observations of Lieut. Gen. Sir William Howe, on a pamphlet, entitled Letters to a Nobleman, Second Edition, 37.) Three days after the date of that Return, [August 12,] the two fleets, convoyed, respectively, by Commodore Hotham and the Repulse, came into the harbor of New York, with the Guards and the First Division of the Hessians, (Compare Lord George Germaine's despatch to General Howe, dated, "WHITEHALL, 21 "June, 1776," with General Howe's despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "STATEN-ISLAND, 15 August, 1776;") and, two days subsequently, [August 14,] Sir Peter Parker and Lord Dunmore also arrived, (General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "STATEN-ISLAND, 15 August, 1776,") the former, with what remained of the forces which had been sent to Virginia and the Carolinas, "as well as with some Regiments from Florida "and the West Indies," (Annual Register for 1776: History of Europe, *169,) numbering, "at least, five thousand men," (Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 110:) the latter, "with the refu-"gees and blackamores from Virginia," (the same, i., 103,) "about a "thousand more" (the same, i., 110.) The Second Division of the Hessians, the Sixteenth Regiment of Light Dragoons, the horses for remounting the Seventeenth Regiment of Dragoons, the draught-horses for the Artillery and baggage, four hundred and two German and not far from five hundred British recruits, and the Prince of Waldeck's Regiment of German troops, all of whom joined General Howe, while he was in Westchester-county, as we shall see, hereafter—were on their way to America, at the time of which we write. (Lord George Germaine to General Howe, "WHITEHALL, 21 June, 1776.") There were, also, some Provincial "Corps, already raised," of whom we have seen no Returns, (General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "STATEN-ISLAND, 16 August, "1776,") probably not strong in numbers, but, nevertheless, entitled to notice, in this connection.

From these facts, it appears that the entire force, present and commanded by General Howe, before he opened the Campaign on Long Island, was upwards of forty thousand men, exclusive of the Marines on the several Fleets, which could have been called ashore, had there been any necessity for their services. Only one Brigade of Hessians, a detachment of the Fourteenth Regiment, some convalescents, and those recruits which had already arrived, were left on Staten Island; and the Sick-list was very small; there were no detachments on special duties; and there could have been none absent on furlough: it is very clear, therefore, that when the Royal Army was moved from Staten Island, it numbered very little, if any, less than thirty-eight thousand effective men, including its Officers. In the Battle of Long Island, it was said to have lost only three hundred and sixty-seven of all classes, (General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "NEWTOWN, LONG ISLAND, 3 Sept., 1776;") only "about" ninety-two were said to have been killed or wounded at Harlem. (General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "HEAD-QUARTERS, "YORK ISLAND, 21 September, 1776;") the occupation of Powle's-hook, Long Island, and the City of New York required detachments, of course; but there can be little doubt that the Army which General Howe moved from Throgg's-neck numbered very little, if any, less than thirty thousand, Officers and men, fit for active service.

In confirmation of this estimate of the strength of General Howe's command, in Westchester-county, we may be permitted to state that, after the arrival of the Second Division of the Hessians and of those other reinforcements to which Lord George Germaine made reference, already noticed, but with the losses which it had sustained in Westchester-county and at Fort Washington deducted, on the twenty-second of November, 1776, "the force under General Howe's immediate command," is said to have been thirty-one thousand, seven hundred, and fifty-five, Officers and men, fit for active service. (Reply to the Observations of Lieut. Gen. Sir William Howe, on a pamphlet entitled Letters to a Nobleman, 37.)

[4] [Joseph Galloway's] Letters to a Nobleman, 34, 35.

As we have said, the two Armies were occupied, during several weeks after the Royal Army had taken the City of New York, in throwing up defensive works—the American Army, on the Heights of Harlem, to the northward and eastward of the present village of Manhattanville, back, to Kingsbridge, and in the more exposed portions of Westchester-county: the Royal Army, on the Heights of Harlem and on Vandewater's Heights, southward from the village of Manhattanville, and thence to McGowan's-pass, where the postroad to the northward and eastward descended from the high grounds, forming the northernmost portion of the present great City's Central Park, to the Harlem-plains, below[1]—and some time was, also, necessarily employed by General Howe, in obtaining information concerning the face of the country, in the rear of the positions occupied by the American Army, "upon a supposition that the enemy" [the American Army] "should remove from King's-"Bridge," which information, thus sought in advance of any movement of the Army, was become more necessary since he had found the Americans not so well-disposed to join and to serve the Royal Army, in the field, as he had been taught to expect;[2] and because the country referred to, the County of Westchester, "was so covered with wood, swamps, "and creeks, that it was not open, in the least de-"gree, to be known, but from post to post or from "accounts to be collected from the inhabitants, who "are entirely ignorant of military description."[3] Indeed, during that period, because of the character of the country, in its advantages for defensive operations, and because of his great disappointment, in his failure to receive the support, in arms, from those who were disaffected, which he had been led to expect, General Howe, also, became dispirited and disheartened, even to the extent of losing confidence in his own abilities and in those of his immense and well-officered and well-disciplined command to make any further progress, during that Campaign, nor until the arrival of heavy reinforcements, during the ensuing Winter and Spring.[4] General Howe had

That disappointment was expressed to the Home Government, in the General's despatch of the twenty-fifth of September, 1776, in these words: "We must also have recruits from Europe, not finding the Amer-"icans disposed to serve with arms, notwithstanding the hopes held out "to me, upon my arrival at this post." In his Speech before a Committee of the House of Commons, on the twenty-ninth of April, 1779, the General repeated the expression of his disappointment, on that subject, in these emphatic words: "I must, here, add, that I found the Americans "not so well-disposed to join us, and to serve, as I had been taught to "expect." The careful student of the history of that period will also bear testimony, in confirmation of what General Howe thus wrote and said, that the Americans, those who had been persecuted and outraged because of "suspicions" that they were "disaffected," notwithstanding the very reasonable reasons which they had for thus transferring their strength to the Royal Army, generally remained at their homes, with their families, without voluntarily taking up arms, in either Army; and that the Loyal Battalions were composed, almost exclusively, of the floating population, largely men of foreign birth or Americans whose immoralities or necessities had induced them to enter the service. They were relatively few in numbers; and but for the personal respectability of those who led them, their services would have been only nominal.

We are not unmindful, in what we have thus said, of the great use of that loyal element which Joseph Galloway made in his very lawyer-like publications; but we have also borne in mind, that those publications were made for personal and partisan purposes; and that, like his earlier associates in duplicity and treachery, he was capable of resorting to unsavory means for the accomplishment of any given end in which he was personally interested, justifying the employment of those means by the character of the proposed end, and boldly and unreservedly doing evil in order that what he was pleased to regard as good might, therefrom, be secured.

[3] General Howe's Speech before a Committee of the House of Commons, April 29, 1779.

In his examination before a Committee of the House of Commons, on the sixth of May, 1779, the Earl of Cornwallis testified that "the knowl-"edge of the country of America, for military purposes, was extremely "difficult to be obtained from the inhabitants;" that "the country, in "general, is so covered with wood and so favorable to ambuscades that, "certainly, it was very difficult to obtain a knowledge of it by recon-"noitering;" and that he "never saw a stronger country or one better "calculated for the defensive." In another portion of his testimony, the Earl stated, "I can only say that it is a very strong country, very "rugged, very hilly, and very woody;" and that, although, "by no means "equally so," his former description was "applicable, in some degree, "to all." General Gray, before the same Committee and on the same day, testified that "the inhabitants of the country, in general, were so very much "against us that they deserted the country wherever we came; and we "could get no intelligence that we could possibly depend on;" that "that part of America where I have been, is the strongest country I ever "was in. It is every where hilly and covered with wood, intersected by "ravines, creeks, and marshy grounds; and every quarter of a mile, is "a post fitted for ambuscades. Little or no knowledge could be obtained "by reconnoitering;" and "America is, of all countries, the best calcu-"lated for the defensive: every one hundred yards might be disputed, "at least that part of it that I have seen."

During a visit which he made to us, at our home, near the White Plains, previously to the late Civil War, General John E. Wool, a veteran in the service of the United States, was peculiarly emphatic concerning the natural capabilities of Westchester-county, for a defensive warfare.

[4] "Upon the present appearance of things, I look upon the further "progress of this Army, for the Campaign, to be rather precarious, an "attack upon Rhode Island excepted, which I would willingly defer, "for a short time, in case it should be thought advisible to employ our "whole force together. * * * But, in my situation, I presume, I "must not risk, as a check, at this time, would be of infinite detriment "to us.

"The enemy is too strongly posted to be attacked, in front; and in-"numerable difficulties are in my way of turning him, on either side, "though his Army is much dispirited from the late success of his "Majesty's arms; yet have I not the smallest prospect of finishing the "contest, this Campaign, nor until the Rebels see preparations, in the "Spring, that may preclude all thoughts of further resistance. To this "end, I would propose eight or ten line-of-battle Ships, to be with us in "February, with a number of supernumerary Seamen, for manning boats, "having fully experienced the want of them, in every movement we have "made. We must, also, have recruits from Europe, not finding the "Americans disposed to serve with arms, notwithstanding the hopes "held out to me, upon my arrival at this port."—(General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "New-York Island, 25 September, 1776," received by his lordship, November 2, 1776.)

"With regard to the knowledge of the country, so necessary to be ob-"tained previous to the movement from New-York, I beg leave to men-"tion the difficulties we labored under, in that respect, throughout the "War. The country is so covered with wood, swamps, and creeks, that "it is not open, in the least degree, to be known but from post to post or "from accounts to be collected from the inhabitants, who are entirely "ignorant of military description. These circumstances were, therefore not learned the more modern military theory of "attrition," no matter at what cost, nor was he of the same school of politics as that in which Bute and Germaine and Dundas and Wedderburne and Jay and Duane and the Livingstons and the Morrises were preceptors, of high or low degree: on the other hand, he did not expose his command where the object to be attained was inadequate,[1] nor was he inclined to visit the country, even that portion of it which was antagonistic to the Royal Army, with severity.[2]

Whatever may have inspired and encouraged him, notwithstanding all whichs he had previously said of the "innumerable difficulties in his way, "of turning him," ["the enemy,"] "on either side," and of his own, evidently well-considered, apprehensions of an unfavorable result, should an attempt be made to do so, General Howe determined to endeavor to turn the left flank of the American Army, encamped on the Heights of Harlem and in Westchester-county, with a view of compelling it to abandon its very strong position and, if possible, of bringing it to action. As the defensive works, on the high grounds to the southward of the Harlem-plains, with the moderate detachment which he could leave, for the purpose of occupying them and the other portions of the City of New York, and with the further protection which was afforded by the Fleet and the increased safety which had been afforded by the capture of the American works at Powle's-hook, appeared to afford all the protection which would be neeessary, there seemed to have been little probability that General Washington would make any attempt to recover, or even to raid, that City; and the determination of General Howe was, therefore, a reasonable one, and, with such a force and with such appointments as he, then, controlled, there was a reasonable probability that it would be attended with an entire success.

On Sunday, the fifteenth of September, in order to draw the attention of the Americans from the preparations which were being made, on Long Island, for the occupation of the City of New York, by the Royal Army—which was successfully accomplished, later in the day—the Phœnix, of forty-four guns, and commanded by Captain Hyde Parker, the Roebuck, of forty-four guns, and commanded by Captain Hammond, and the Tartar, of twenty-eight guns, commanded by Captain Ommany, each with a tender, had been moved up the Hudson-river, as far as Bloomingdale;[3] and they had remained at anchor, at that place after the Royal Army had occupied that City, covering the left flank of the lines and very effectually closing the navigation of the lower portion of the river, to the Americans. But, about eight o'clock, on the morning of Wednesday, the ninth of October, they got under way and stood, with an easy southerly breeze, up the river. The Americans, with great labor and outlay of means, had constructed a chevaux-de-frise, for the protection of the navigation, above Fort Washington;[4] and it was hoped it would have intercepted the further passage of the ships while the batteries, at Fort Washington and Fort Lee, and the galleys, which had been stationed behind the chevaux-de-frise, played on them; but, "to the surprise and "mortification" of General Washington and his command, they passed all the obstructions, "without the "least difficulty, and without receiving any apparent "damage from our forts,[5] though they kept up a "heavy fire from both sides of the river."[6]

"the cause of some unavoidable delay, in our movements. I must, here, "add that I found the Americans not so well-disposed to join us, and to "serve, as I had been taught to expect; that I thought our farther "progress, for the present, precarious; and that I saw no prospect of "finishing the War, that Campaign. These sentiments I communicated "to the Secretary of State, in the letters last mentioned."—(General Howe's Speech before a Committee of the House of Commons, April 29, 1779.)

1 "The most essential duty I had to observe was, not wantonly to commit his Majesty's troops where the object was inadequate. I knew, "well, that any considerable loss sustained by the Army could not, "speedily nor easily, be repaired. I also knew that one great point "towards gaining the confidence of an Army—and a General without it "is upon the most dangerous ground—is never to expose the Troops, "where, as I said before, the object is inadequate."—(General Howe's Speech before a Committee of the House of Commons, April 29, 1779.)

2 "Although some persons condemn me for having endeavoured to conciliate his Majesty's rebellious subjects, by taking every means to prevent the destruction of the country instead of irritating them by a contrary mode of proceeding; yet am I, from many reasons, satisfied, in "my own mind, that I acted, in that particular, for the benefit of the "King's service."—(General Howe's Speech before a Committee of the House of Commons, April 29, 1779.)

General Heath, (Memoirs, 60,) said these Ships were "sent up the "river, as far as Greenwich," only, on the fourteenth of September.

4 Doctor Sparks, in his Writings of George Washington, (iv., 30, note,) said "the mode of constructing the chevaux-de-frise was a contrivance of "General Putman's;" and, in support of that statement, he quoted from a letter written by the General to General Gates, dated July 26th, in which were these words: "We are preparing chevaux-de-frise, at which "we make great dispatch by the help of ships, which are to be sunk; a "scheme of mine, which you may be assured is very simple, a plan of "which I send you."

Had not the General's own words been given in support of the statement, we should have supposed the Doctor had mistaken the General for Colonel Rufus Putnam, who was an Engineer: and the more so, since even the most zealous of the General's biographers and eulogists are silent, on this subject. Possibly, however, that silence may be accounted for, from the result of the professional stupidity of the Engineer, whomsoever he may have been.

5 In this instance, General Washington was mistaken, since the "ships "suffered much, in their masts and rigging;" and Captain Parker subsequently reported that the Phœnix lost a Midshipman, two Seamen, and one Servant, killed, and a Boatswain, a Carpenter, eight Seamen, a Servant, a negro Man, and a private Marine, wounded; that the Roebuck lost a Lieutenant, a Midshipman, and two Seamen, killed, and a Midshipman, two Seamen, and a Corporal of Marines, wounded; and that the Tartar lost a Midshipman, killed, and a Lieutenant of Marines wounded. —(Report of the Killed and Wounded on board His Majesty's Ships passing the Batteries, the 9th of October, 1776.)

It would not have been very apparent how these vessels could have passed such seemingly formidable obstructions, "without the least difficulty," nor for what especial reason General Washington was "surprised and mortified," when such a passage had been successfully acomplished, had not General George Clinton, who commanded the Militia of the State who had been called out for the reinforcement of the Continental Army, at Kingsbridge, informed the Convention that the ships had "passed by, in shore, "East of our obstructions in the river" [1]—that the deep waters of the river, in shore, immediately around the point which juts into the river, at that place, had been left entirely unprotected—a fact which reflects very little credit on the skill or the forethought of either the Engineer or those who were employed in building the obstructions, especially since the Phœnix and the Rose and their respective tenders had passed the same obstructions, in the same way, on the eighteenth of August, after the galleys and the fireships had rendered their longer stay, in the waters of the Hudson-river, both unprofitable and hazardous.[2]

After the vessels had passed the obstructions, they ran up the river as far as Dobbs's-ferry, where they again cast anchor. On their passage up the river, they captured two or three small river-craft—one of them loaded with Rum, Sugar, Wine, etc.—and sunk a sloop which had on board a machine invented by Mr. Bushnell, for blowing up the British Fleet.[3] Two new ships, purchased for the further obstruction of the channel of the river, were driven ashore, near Yonkers—one of them was afterwards recovered, however, by a party of men whom General Clinton sent from Kingsbridge, for that purpose ;[4] and two galleys, which had been stationed near the obstructions, were also driven ashore, near Dobbs's-ferry, and captured by the enemy.[5] While the ships were at anchor, off Dobbs's-ferry, a boat's crew was sent ashore, and signalized its presence by plundering a store, and by staving the casks and setting the building on fire; but the fire was extinguished by the Americans, after the enemy had returned to his boat.[6]

The movement of the ships, up the river, and the consequent control of the latter, notwithstanding the obstructions on which so much dependence had been rested, very promptly called forth the entire energies of General George Clinton[7] and General Heath,[8] both of them in Westchester-county, to prevent the enemy from effecting a landing and for the protection of the property which was exposed to the ravages of his tenders and boats; and, of course, the vigilant Commander-in-chief immediately despatched an express to the Convention, that notice might be immediately communicated to General James Clinton, commanding the forts, in the Highlands, putting him on his guard, and directing that precautions should be taken to prevent the river-craft from falling into the hands of the enemy—the General was not informed of the destination of the ships nor of the purposes of the movement; but he was not, apparently, very much alarmed, and supposed, only, that they were sent to cut off the communication of the American Army, by water, to the northward; "probably to gain recruits;" and to close the supplies of the Americans, especially those of Boards, for the construction of Barracks,

[3] The late Charles J. Bushnell, of New York, well known among numismatists and antiquaries, was of the same family as the Mr. Bushnell referred to, in the text; and he gathered, with great labor and much cost, everything which was known to exist, concerning that early inventor. The only description of the machine for destroying vessels at anchor, invented by him and destroyed by the enemy whom it was intended to annoy, as far as we have knowledge, may be seen in the Memoirs of General Heath, 69.

[4] We have some reasons for supposing that both these ships were saved; although no direct evidence appears that more than one of them was brought off. See, however, Lieutenant-colonel Tilghman to General Heath, "HEAD-QUARTERS, October 9, 1776;" Colonel Reed to the same, "October 9, 1776;" General Putnam to the same, "Wednesday, noon;" Lieutenant-colonel Tilghman to Robert R. Livingston, "HEAD-QUARTERS, "HARLEM HEIGHTS, October 10, 1776;" etc.

Among the incidents of 1776, Bolton related the following: "Upon "the 9th of October, a body of 1100 British troops embarked on board "batteaux at Peekskill and the same night proceeded to Tarrytown, "where they landed at daybreak, and occupied the heights adjoining." —(History of Westchester-county, second edit., i. 348.)

Although the historian has referred to "Gaine's Weekly Mercury," * as his authority, we have failed to find the slightest evidence, anywhere that such a movement as he has thus described was really made; and with the best of evidence, accessible to every one, that there were no British troops in Westchester-county, until several days after the date referred to, nor, then, within many miles from Peekskill, we dismiss the statement as something else than History.

[7] General Clinton sent out the detachment of troops which rescued one of the ships which were driven ashore, near Yonkers.—(General George Clinton to the Convention, "KING'S BRIDGE, 10 October, 1776.")

[8] General Heath ordered Colonel Sargent, with five hundred Infantry and forty Cavalry; Captain Horton, of the Artillery, with two twelve-pounders; and Captain Crafts, with a howitzer, to march, immediately and with all possible expedition, to Dobbs's-ferry; and the entire Division was formed, in order of battle, and "moved down, over the different "grounds which it was supposed might be the scene of action."—(Memoirs of General Heath, 69.)

See, also, General Heath's Orders to Colonel Sargent, "KING'S BRIDGE, "October 9, 1776;" David How's Diary, October 9, 1776; Colonel Sargent to General Heath, "Half past two o'clock at night, DOBB'S FERRY, "October 10, 1776;" General Heath's Orders to Colonel Sargent, "KING'S "BRIDGE, October 10, 1776;" etc.

* We have not found a file of Gaine's New-York Gazette and the Weekly Mercury of the latter portion of 1776; and the well-informed Mr. Kelby, of the New York Historical Society, informs us that such a file is not known to him, anywhere.

which it should have received, at an earlier day, and of which it was in great need.[1]

The enemy's Squadron got under way, again, during the evening, and sailed up the river, as far as Tarrytown; where it anchored, and remained during the entire period which was occupied by those stirring and momentous events of which their own movement, up the Hudson-river, was the earlier portion.[2]

When the information of that movement of the enemy's ships reached the Committee of Safety, at Fishkill, it was, evidently, very much alarmed; but, with that promptitude which the emergency demanded, it immediately ordered three hundred of the Militia of Ulster-county to be sent down, without any delay, to Peekskill, "well armed and accoutred, "and with three days' provisions;" that a sufficient number of the Militia of Orange-county, below the mountains—now Rockland-county—should be called out for the due protection of that portion of the western bank of the river, and one hundred from the Militia of the same County, above the mountains, should be called out and sent to Peekskill, with three days' provisions; that all the Rangers which had been enlisted for the protection of the frontiers of Ulster-county should be marched to Fishkill, evidently for the purpose of holding the more violent of the disaffected, in Duchess-county, in check; and it also sent expresses to General Schuyler, commanding the Northern Army, and to General George Clinton, at Kingsbridge, declaring its helplessness and begging "the most speedy succour." It also wrote a letter to General Washington, in which the condition of the country was thus described; "Nothing can be more "alarming than the present situation of our State. "We are daily getting the most authentic intelli- "gence of bodies of men, enlisted and armed, with "orders to assist the enemy. We much fear that "those, co-operating with the enemy, will seize such "passes as will cut off all communication between the "Army and us, and prevent your supplies. We "dare not trust any more of the Militia out of this "County, [Duchess.] We have called for some aid "from the two adjoining ones; but beg leave to sug- "gest to your Excellency the propriety of sending a "body of men to the Highlands or Peekskill, to "secure the passes, prevent insurrections, and over- "awe the disaffected. We suppose your Excellency "has taken the necessary steps to prevent their land- "ing of any men from the ships, should they be so "inclined, as no reliance at all can be placed on the "Militia of Westchester-county."[3] Two days afterwards, Robert R. Livingston, himself a member of the Committee of Safety and present when the letter from which we have quoted was written, addressed a personal letter, appealing to General Washington to do, for the protection of the Highlands—behind which all the immense estates of the Livingston family were, then, very securely situated—and for that of the State, what he, therein, elaborately described; although he must have known, when it was written, that General Washington could not, possibly, comply with a single one of the many requests which that letter contained.[4]

In the same connection, and in order that the reader may understand the temper of the great body of the people, beyond the limits of Duchess and Westchester-counties, we find room for the reply of the Colonel commanding the Militia of Orange-county, below the mountains, to the requisition which was made, by the Committee of Safety, for men enough to protect that portion of the western bank of the river, to which reference has been made. It was in these words: "We are in daily expectation of "their" [the ships] "proceeding up the river; and I am "sorry to inform the Committee of Safety that, should "they attempt to land with one barge, I cannot com- "mand a force sufficient to prevent their penetrating "the country. I have exerted myself to muster the "Militia, but have not been able to raise a guard of "more than thirty-eight men of my Regiment, at one "time, at Nyack.[5] The wood-cutters employed by "order of General Heath have been with me, but "have received orders to proceed in cutting wood for "the Army; and I have not, at present, but eleven "men to guard the shore between Verdudigo Hook "and Stony Point.[6] In this situation, I leave the "Committee of Safety to determine what can be ex- "pected from me, in a way of opposition.

"My whole Regiment consists of but three hundred "men: most of them are without arms, they having "been taken for the Continental troops. Most of my "men refuse to attend the service, though repeatedly

[5] As the ships were anchored off Nyack as well as off Tarrytown, those villages being exactly opposite, the former on the western and the latter on the eastern bank of the river, and as two boats' crews had made an attempt to go ashore, at Nyack, on the preceding Sunday, it will be seen why the Colonel mentioned Nyack, especially, in his despatch to the Committee of Safety.

[6] The shore-line thus described includes the entire western bank of that portion of the Hudson-river which is known as Haverstraw Bay, extending from a short distance above Nyack to within a short distance from the southernmost entrance into the Highlands.

"summoned. Many reasons are assigned for this "desertion of the service, such as, that the troops last "raised were, by the Convention, expressly levied for "the purpose of protecting the shore; that this in- "duced many of their people to enlist, but they have "been drawn off from the immediate defence of their "wives, children, and property, to guard the eastern "shore of the river, contrary to their expectations. "Others declare that if they leave their business, "their families must starve, as they have all their "Corn and Buckwheat to secure, and have been so "called off, during the Summer, by the public "troubles, as not to have been able to put in the "ground, any Winter Grain, and would, therefore, as "leave die by the sword as by famine. A third set, "and the most numerous, declare that the Congress "have rejected all overtures for a reconciliation, in- "consistent with Independency; that all they desire "is peace, liberty, and safety; and that if they can "procure that, they are contented." [1]

It will be seen, from this official statement, that there were other Militia than that of Westchester-county on whom "no reliance at all could be placed," in that hour of extreme danger; and, when taken into consideration, in connection with the facts that the Counties of Richmond, Kings, Queens, and Suffolk had returned to their allegiance to the King; that Duchess-county was in open and armed opposition to the Convention, and was kept in subjection only by the occupation of the County and the support of the few friends of the Convention who lived there, by five hundred armed men, drawn from Connecticut; and that the Manor of Livingston, including the whole of the lower portion of Albany-county, was almost entirely "disaffected," Colonel Hay's exposition of the temper of the farmers of Orange-county very clearly established the fact that "disaffection" was not peculiar to the farmers of Westchester-county; and that the Declaration of Independence had not been received with any favor, by the greater number of the inhabitants of New York.

The purposes of the enemy, in sending the Phœnix and her consorts up the Hudson-river and in anchoring them off Tarrytown, as we have seen, were variously interpreted by General Washington and the Committee of Safety; and they have continued to receive the scattered attention of those who have written on the subject, to this day.[2] But, while the surmises of General Washington and those of the Convention were thrown out before the ships had reached the anchorage-ground to which they had been ordered and, therefore, before either their destination or the purposes for which they had been ordered to move up to Tarrytown were definitely made known to any one, except to their own Officers, there is no evidence whatever, in the subsequent conduct of those ships, to give the slightest weight to any of those earlier surmises, no matter by whom originated; and the direction in which the alarm of the Commander-in-chief and the Convention trended, in the light afforded by immediately subsequent events, was, certainly, not the right one—the ships certainly made no attempt to renew the previously unsuccessful attempt to give countenance and support, for military purposes, to the disaffected farmers of Westchester-county: they certainly made no attempt whatever to seize the forts in the Highlands and to occupy the water communication through the Highlands: and there is not the slightest evidence that they effected or attempted to effect combinations with anybody, on shore, for any purpose whatever. Had their purpose been to cut off the supplies of the American Army, as some have supposed and stated—a project which would have been unnecessary, if the American Army was to be obliged to abandon its strong position, near Kingsbridge, in order to prevent the enemy from falling on its rear—the ships would not have anchored at so great a distance from the American lines; nor would they have chosen, as their station, the widest part of the river, at that place quite three miles wide, of which two-thirds or more are shoal-water, over which the small river-craft could pass and re-pass, with impunity; while, within four miles, equally good anchorage grounds could have been found, equally safe from interference from the Americans, less exposed to the heavy winds of the season, which would have required not more than one-half the extent of guard-duty, and, at the same time, which would have been equally effective, for the purpose named. Had the purpose been, as others have supposed, to have obstructed the retreat of the American Army and the removal of its stores and heavy guns, by water, it is equally strange that the place which was designated for the anchorage of the ships was situated not far from ten miles above the American lines, within which General Washington held an

[2] Marshall, (Life of George Washington, Ed. Philadelphia: 1804, ii., 495, 496,) very accurately, stated the object of the movement was to secure to General Howe the possession of the North-river above Kingsbridge, without, however, stating more than that. Sparks, (Life of George Washington, Ed Boston: 1842, 194,) said they "secured a free passage to "the Highlands, thereby preventing any supplies, from coming to the "American Army, by water." Hildreth, (History of the United States, iii., 154,) said, only, they "cut off all supplies from the country, South "and West of that river," the Hudson. Bancroft, (History of the United States, original edition, ix., 174; the same, centenary edition, v., 439,) referred to nothing else than to the Phœnix and the Roebuck and the tenders; and, very cautiously, for reasons which are not unknown to us, he said nothing whatever concerning the purposes of the expedition. Irving, (Life of Washington, Ed. New York: 1856, ii., 367-373,) in the most carefully prepared description of all, with a grave error in his description of the passage of the ships through the obstructions, and another in making General Washington do what was done by General Heath, recited all the surmises of the inhabitants and others, concerning the object of the movement, without pretending to offer any of his own.

No other writer of the history of that period has noticed the subject, notwithstanding its great importance.

undisputed line of communication with New Jersey, protected by the guns of both Fort Washington and Fort Lee, over which, if adversity had overtaken him, he could have securely retreated. For these reasons, and with the knowledge which all the events of that period in which that particular Squadron was concerned, has imparted, we have seen no reason for concurring with those who have already written concerning the purposes of General Howe, in the removal of the Squadron which had covered the left flank of his lines, from its anchorage, off Bloomingdale, to a distant anchorage, off Tarrytown, when he had no further use for it, at the former station, and expected to make it useful, for the same purpose, in the latter; and, at the same time, from the best evidence which we have been able to control, we have formed an opinion, concerning those purposes, which differs from all those to which we have referred and of all of which we have heard. That opinion may be thus stated: when preparations were being made by General Howe, for the military occupation of the City of New York, before any movement for that purpose was actually made, these ships were moved up the Hudson-river, on the opposite side of the island, for the purpose, as General Howe subsequently informed the Home Government, of drawing the attention of the Americans to that side, while the real operations were to be made on the other side. In short, the movement, on that occasion, was, primarily, a feint; but it had served, also, to command the lower portion of the river; to prevent the retreating Americans from removing their stores or heavy guns, from the City to Kingsbridge, by water; and, therefore, to throw into the hands of the Royal Army, both stores and guns which the Americans could ill-afford to lose. Subsequent to the establishment of the former, in the City of New York, the Squadron, at its anchorage, off Bloomingdale, had effectually covered the left flank of the enemy's lines, which, without such a protection, would have been negligently exposed to the well-known enterprise of the Americans; and, as far as we have seen it, there is not the slightest evidence that the Squadron had been engaged in any other service. At the time now under notice, General Howe was again preparing to move his great command, at that time, by way of the Sound, into Westchester-county; and he did no more, concerning that Squadron, in that connection, than he had done, in the former instance, when he had moved that command from Long Island to the City of New York—he caused it to be moved further up the river, evidently, again, in order "to draw the enemy's" [the Americans'] "attention to that side," while he and his command should effect a landing, on the other side of the County, with lesser opposition and difficulty; and it is not improbable, in view of the recognized purposes of General Howe, in proposing to move his command into Westchester-county, that it was expected, also, to cover that flank of the Army, in whatever operations it should become engaged, within that County. We believe that these were the only purposes for which the Squadron was moved up the river; and we also believe that, for the purpose of a feint, the movement was, again, an entire success: because of the subsequent movements of the two Armies, it was not required for any other purpose.

Having detached two Brigades of British and one Brigade of Hessian troops, the whole under the command of Lieutenant-general Earl Percy, to occupy the exterior lines, on the high grounds to the southward of the Harlem-plain, for the protection of the City of New York,[1] and another Brigade of British troops to garrison the City itself,[2] "all previous arrange-"ments, having been made," early on the morning of Saturday, the twelfth of October, the first detachment of the forces designated for that purpose, under the personal command of General Howe, embarked, at Kip's-bay,[3] in the City of New York, in flat-boats, batteaux, etc.; and, having passed through Hell-gate, landed—the Carysfort, frigate, having been so placed that she could cover the descent—about nine o'clock in the morning, on Throgg's-neck, in the Borough Town of Westchester, in Westchester-county.[4]

It was an exceedingly foggy morning;[5] and, from the fact that General Washington made no allusion to the enemy's movement, in letters written by him, on that day, respectively, to the President of the Congress and to Governor Cooke, of Rhode Island, notwithstanding his Headquarters, in the elegant mansion of Colonel Roger Morris, more recently owned

[2] General Howe made no mention of a third Brigade of British troops having been left, to garrison the City; but common sense tells us there must have been such a Garrison, within the thickly settled portions of the City; and Captain Hall, (History of the Civil War in America, i., 203,) and Stedman, (History of the American War, i., 210,) both of them officers of the Royal Army, have left records of the fact.

[3] Captain Hall, (History of the Civil War in America, i., 203,) said the troops were embarked, for this movement, in Turtle-bay; but, inasmuch as the naval portions of the movement were made under the personal superintendence of Admiral Lord Howe, we have preferred his statement, in his despatch to the Admiralty, ("EAGLE, OFF NEW-YORK, November "23, 1776,") that the embarkation was at Kip's-bay.

by Madame Jumel,[1] commanded a fine view of the East-river and Sound; and because the intelligence of the movement which he first received, was conveyed to him, by express, from General Heath, after the landing had been made,[2] it may be reasonably supposed that the movement of the Royal Army, into Westchester-county, was unknown to him, until after it had been accomplished; that the left flank of the American Army had been successfully turned, a second time, without his knowledge; and that the latter was placed, again, by reason of that successful movement of the enemy, in such a critical situation that its very existence was threatened—it is noteworthy, also, that if a dense fog had served to secure the escape of the American Army from what appeared to have threatened its entire destruction, at Brooklyn, a similarly dense fog, on the occasion now under notice, had afforded a similar advantage to the Royal Army, in its effort to recover the great military advantages which it had lost, on the former occasion.

During the afternoon of the same day, [October 12, 1776,] the second detachment of the Royal Army passed Hell-gate, in forty-two sail of vessels, including nine ships; and it was, also, safely landed.[3]

The naval portion of that very important movement was performed under the personal supervision of Admiral Lord Howe, assisted by Commodore Hotham; and the assistance of most of the Captains of the Fleet and that of the naval officers, in general, which were freely given, secured, for that difficult movement, the most complete success, the only loss sustained having been that of an artillery-boat, with three six-pounders and three men, which was upset and sunk by the rapidity of the current,[4] probably in Hell-gate.

General Howe, notwithstanding his successful occupation of Westchester-county, was made the object of much censure, because of his movement to Throgg's-neck, first, because of the danger to which the City of New York was exposed by the withdrawal of so large a portion of the Army; and the temptation which was offered to General Washington to make a dash, in that direction, instead of moving the American Army into Westchester-county;[5] in which latter case the three Brigades commanded by General Lord Percy would have been seriously imperiled; and, second, because he had landed on Throgg's-neck, which was really an island, instead of on the mainland, where none of the difficulties to which he was exposed, on the Neck, would have been encountered.[6] But, if the General noticed the first of these criticisms, we have seen no mention of it; and, in answer to the second, without pretending to offer any further explanation, although it is understood that he could easily have done so,[7] he said, before the Committee of the House of Commons, who was considering his conduct, as Commander-in-chief of the Army, that the landing at Pell's-neck instead of at Throgg's-neck, "would have been an imprudent measure, as it "could not have been executed without much un-"necessary risk."[8]

Throgg's-neck is a peninsula, on the eastern border of Westchester-county, which stretches upwards of two miles into the Sound. It was separated from the mainland by a narrow creek and a marsh, and was surrounded by water, every high-tide. At the time of which we write, a bridge across the creek, connecting with a causeway across the marsh, afforded means for communication between the mainland and the Neck; besides which, however, the upper end of the creek was fordable, at low-water.[9] As early as the third of October, General Heath, who commanded those detachments from the Army who were in Westchester-county, had reconnoitred his position, accompanied by Colonel

[1] The fine old mansion still occupies its place, with few, if any, alterations, on the high grounds forming the southern bank of the Harlem-river, near One hundred and sixty-ninth-street, a little below the High-bridge of the Croton-aqueduct. Madame Jumel, who was also the widow of Aaron Burr, has been dead, many years; and the right to the ownership of the property has been bitterly contested, in the Courts; but the old house remains—and long may it remain.

It is very evident, from indirect questions put to the Government's witness against Sir William Howe, General Robertson, before a Committee of the House of Commons, on the fourteenth of June, 1779, that Lord George Germaine was also inclined to criticise the occupation of Throgg's-neck, adversely.

[7] It is said that the place for the landing of the troops was entirely entrusted to the naval officers, by whom Throgg's-neck was selected, because of the unfitness of Pell's-neck, for that purpose; and a glance at the official Chart of the Coast Survey, will satisfy any one of the wisdom displayed in the choice—the shallowness of the water, elsewhere, would have prevented the co-operation of the larger vessels of every class; and, certainly, the landing of the troops at Pell's-neck could not have been covered by any vessel of force sufficient for such a purpose, without which no prudent officer would have attempted a landing, anywhere.

But General Sir Henry Clinton has left a testimony on this subject, which disposes of every cavil. On the margin of his own copy of Stedman's History of the American War, (i. 211,) he wrote these words: "It "had been proposed to Sir William Howe that the troops should have "been marched to Harlem Point" [Hoern's Hook, at the mouth of the Harlem River, opposite Hell-gate,] "there met by the boats, passed to City "Orchard" [City-island?] thence to Mill's Creek," [New Rochelle-harbor,] "and Rochelle. This was overruled; and the above move to Frog's "Point took place. Lord Howe objected to Mill's Creek, under an idea "that it would not be safe for ships to lay there."

[8] Speech of Sir William Howe before a Committee of the House of Commons, April 29, 1779.

[9] Although Throgg's-neck is only a short distance from where we have lived during the past twenty-seven years, we have never been on the ground; and we have depended, for what we have said of it, on General Heath, (Memoirs, 67,) and on our unwearied friend, William H. De Lancey, Esq., who is familiar with that portion of the County.

Hand, of the First Regiment of Continental Foot; and, in doing so, he had "taken a view" of the causeway and the bridge, between the mainland and the Neck, at the western end of which a large quantity of cord-wood had been piled, "as advantageously situ-"ated to cover a party defending the pass, as if con-"structed for the very purpose," as he has stated. Considering it possible that the enemy might make a lodgment on Throgg's-neck, the General immediately ordered Colonel Hand to detail one of his best Subalterns and twenty-five picked men, to that pass, "as "their alarm-post, at all times," with orders, if the enemy should effect a landing on the Neck, immediately to take up the planks of the bridge; to oppose the movement of the enemy, to the mainland; and, in case the fire of the detachment should appear to be insufficient to check the advance of the enemy, over the causeway, to set fire to a tide-mill which stood on the mainland, at the western extremity of the bridge.[1] He also ordered Colonel Hand to detail another party to guard the fording-place, at the head of the creek; and to reinforce both these parties, if the enemy should effect a landing on the Neck; and he promised the Colonel that he should be properly supported. Colonel Hand carefully obeyed all these Orders, we are told;[2] and the only lines of communication with the mainland, from Throgg's-neck, were thus carefully guarded, when General Howe and his command debarked on that isolated ground.

When the enemy had effected a landing, on the Neck, in the morning, his advance pushed forward, towards the causeway, for the purpose of occupying that line of communication with the mainland; but the detachment whom Colonel Hand had sent for the protection of it, had taken up the flooring of the bridge, agreeably to the General's orders; and it also opened a fire on the enemy, with its rifles, compelling him to fall back to the main body. A similar movement of the enemy against the fording-place, at the head of the creek, met with a similar repulse; and no further movements, toward the mainland, appear to have been made; and, by way of precaution, a breastwork was thrown up, on the Neck, by the Royal troops, to cover the approach, by way of the causeway.[3]

Besides the despatch of an express to Head-quarters, with intelligence of the enemy's movements, to which reference has been made,[4] General Heath reinforced the guard, at the bridge, by ordering Colonel Prescott, the hero of Bunker's-hill, with his Regiment, and Captain-lieutenant Bryant, of the Artillery, with a three-pounder, to march to that place; and Colonel Graham, of the New York Line, with his Regiment, and Lieutenant Jackson, of the Artillery, with a six-pounder, was ordered to march to the head of the creek, for the reinforcement of the guard who had been posted at that place. Besides the throwing up of an earthwork, opposite the western end of the causeway, the addition of the Brigade commanded by General McDougal to General Heath's command, and an irregular, scattering fire which was indulged in, by both parties, nothing further was done by either of the Armies, during that day.[5]

When the intelligence of the movement of the greater portion of the Royal Army into Westchester-county, reached Head-quarters, General Washington appears to have given way to despair, in view of his powerlessness, and to have become despondent; although he appears to have really believed that the movement was not anything else than a feint. It is true that he ordered every Regiment who was under his immediate command, to be under arms, there, that it might be ready to act as occasion might require; that he authorized General Heath to make such disposition of the troops, in Westchester-county, including two Regiments of Militia who were posted near Kings-bridge, as he should think proper; and that he begged and trusted that every possible opposition would be given to the enemy, adding "God bless and lead you "on to Victory;"[6] but it was hardly consistent with his duty, as Commander-in-chief of the Army, at that important moment, to remain at Head-quarters; to give the absolute command of all the troops which were before the enemy to an Officer, excellent though he evidently was, as a subordinate, whose experience

[1] We are indebted to our friend, Edward F. de Lancey, Esq., of Mamaroneck, for the following account of that old Mill:

"The Mill and dam, at Westchester, were built by Colonel Caleb "Heathcote, the first Mayor of the Borough-Town of Westchester, at his "own expense. It stood till February, 1875, when it was accidentally "burnt. The outside had been renewed, from time to time; but the frame "was the original one, of massive hewn timber; and at the time of its "destruction, it was the oldest Mill, in Westchester-county, and, probably, "in the State.

"By the original Grant to Colonel Heathcote, the inhabitants reserved "the right to have their own grain ground, free. This was afterwards "commuted to a toll, payable to the present 'town' of Westchester, "which the Town enjoyed, as a source of revenue, till the Mill was burnt; "and the right to which it still retains, if the Mill shall be rebuilt."

[6] General Washington, by his Secretary, Colonel Robert H. Harrison, to General Heath, "HEAD-QUARTERS, 12 October, 1776."

In the same connection, it is a noticeable fact that the General Orders of the day and there were no After Orders, on that eventful twelfth of October, made no mention whatever of the movement of the enemy or of the disposition of the American troops; that they were written, entirely, in only three short lines—(General Orders, "HEAD QUARTERS, HARLEM "HEIGHTS, October 12, 1776")—that General Washington, on that day, appears to have completed none of his letters which were unfinished when General Heath's express arrived at Head-quarters; and that no allusion whatever was made, by him, to the enemy's occupation of Westchester-county nor to any movement of his own command, consequent on that occupation, in anything which he wrote or ordered to be written on that day, which we have found, except in that note, written by his Secretary, under his own eye, to General Heath, of which mention has been made in the text. As stated in the text, he certainly rode over to the village of Westchester and to the head of the creek, towards night, and looked at the preparations which had been made, at those places, to check any movement which the enemy should make; but, beyond that informal inspection, he evidently did nothing whatever, as the Commander in chief of the American Army.

was so very limited; to transfer to that officer the entire responsibility of the opposition which was to be made against the powerful enemy who was actually moving against the very existence of the young States, not yet confederated and very poorly connected even by the ties of a common danger; and to give to him his parting if not his farewell blessing; and nothing else than the bitterness of despair, the hopelessness which seemed to overwhelm all other traits of his character, could, possibly, have produced such unusual, such remarkable, such extremely dangerous results. It is, indeed, stated that he rode over to the village of Westchester and to the head of the creek, late in the afternoon; but no one has pretended that he issued an Order or did any other act which the Commander-in-chief, under such peculiar circumstances, might have been expected to have done.[1]

When General Greene, who was at Fort Constitution, as Fort Lee was then called, heard of the movement of the enemy, he wrote to General Washington, stating that three Brigades, at that time in New Jersey, were in readiness to be sent over the river, for the reinforcement of the main Army; and he hoped, if the force which was then on the eastern side of the river was insufficient to repel the enemy, that those Brigades, and he with them, might be ordered to cross the river, for its reinforcement, during the latter part of the coming night, as the enemy's shipping might move up, from below, and impede, if they should not totally stop, the troops from crossing.[2] But the proffered help was not accepted;[3] and Greene, notwithstanding his honorable anxiety, appears to have remained in New Jersey, without having received any answer to either his offer of help or his reasonable enquiries.

But the interregnum continued only during a few hours; and, gradually, the reason of the Commander-in-chief resumed its sway, his mental and physical strength was restored, and he was, again, the responsible head of the American Army. During the evening, as we have already seen, the Brigade commanded by General McDougal was ordered to move for the reinforcement of General Heath's command;[4] and, with that Order, the record of that great day in the history of Westchester-county was closed.

On the following morning, [Sunday, October 13, 1776,] General Washington became almost satisfied that the enemy's movement was not a feint; that his main body was on Throgg's-neck; and that he "had "in view the prosecution of his original plan, that of "getting in the rear of the Americans and of cutting "off their communication with the country."[5] That change in the General's opinion, as far as there was a change, appears to have been produced by the fact that General Howe had made no attempt to make a landing at Morrisania, as the former had supposed he would have done; and, the first time, he "thought it "would be advisable" to reinforce and protect the troops who had been, for more than twenty-four hours, guarding the two passes through which the enemy could open communications with the mainland; and he "recommended" the posting of small bodies of observation, at Pell's-point, at the mouth of Hutchinson's-river, at Hunt's-point, and at Willett's-point, without, however, giving an Order, for the execution of either of these.[6] At the same time, he strengthened the force already in Westchester-county, by moving the Brigade which had formerly been commanded by General Heath, for its support.[7]

He also ordered Colonel Tash, with his Regiment of New Hampshire Militia, then at the White Plains, to march to Fishkill, "with all possible despatch," for the assistance of the Committee of Safety, in holding the disaffected in check;[8] he called a meeting of the General Officers, at noon, "at or near King's "Bridge,"—as "we are strangers to a suitable place," it was left for General Heath to determine where he would have them meet;[9] and, finally, in these ringing sentences, he attempted to arouse the Army to a sense of its duty, to the country and to the world: "As the "enemy seem, now, to be endeavouring to strike some "stroke, before the close of the Campaign," were his words, "the General most earnestly conjures both Offi- "cers and men, if they have any love for their country "and concern for its liberties and regard to the safety "of their parents, wives, children, and countrymen, "that they will act with bravery and spirit, becoming "the cause in which they are engaged; and to encour- "age and animate them so to do, there is every ad- "vantage of ground and situation, so that, if we do "not conquer, it must be our own faults. How much "better will it be to die honourably, fighting in the "field, than to return home, covered with shame and "disgrace, even if the cruelty of the enemy should "allow you to return! A brave and gallant beha- "viour, for a few days, and patience, under some lit- "tle hardships, may save our country and enable us "to go into Winter-quarters with safety and honour."[1]

New York: 1867, i., 235;) but he gave no authority for the statement, and we have found none; and we prefer to believe that the proffered help was not accepted, at that time, although some portions of General Greene's command were moved into Westchester-county, within a day or two, and after the Commander-in chief had recovered from his temporary despondency and had resumed the command of the Army.

He also recommends strongly to "your attention, the keeping a good look-out at Pell's-point, at the mouth "of Eastchester-creek, and at Hunt's and Willett's-points, for the sake of "gaining intelligence, these posts to be regarded as look-outs only." It was stated in Colonel Reed's note that "it being necessary, since the "late movement of the enemy, to form some plan" of operations for the American Army, it is only reasonable to suppose the General Officers were called together, for an interchange of opinions, on that subject. The Council was evidently convened at General Heath's quarters, (Memoirs of General Heath, 71;) but nothing appears to have been done, because, it is said, of the absence of Generals Lee, Greene, and Mercer.

On the morning of the fourteenth of October, General Heath, with all the Generals under his command, reconnoitred the enemy, on Throgg's-neck;[2] and, soon afterwards, General Washington, accompanied by the Generals of the Army who were at Head-quarters, also visited all the posts, beyond Kingsbridge, and the several passes and roadways which led from Throgg's-neck and from the adjacent Necks, into the country,[3] acquainting himself, as far as he could do so, by personal reconnaissance, with the strength and position and purposes of the enemy; with the character and condition of the outlets, from Throgg's-neck and from the other similar, but lesser, Necks, in that vicinity, from which the enemy might incline to move into the interior of the County; with the capabilities, for defensive purposes, which those outlets severally possessed; and with the necessities, for military purposes, which each of these several subjects presented, for his attention.

During the same day, [October 14,] General Lee reached Head-quarters, on his return from the South; and the command of all the troops in Westchester-county, then the greater portion of the Army, was given to him, with the request, however, that he would not assume the command until he should have made himself acquainted with the different portions of the post, their circumstances, and the arrangements of the troops which had been made;[4] and, in the General Orders of the day, the Commander-in-chief ordered Colonel Bailey's Regiment to join General Clinton's Brigade, and Colonel Lippet's Regiment to join General McDougal's Brigade—each of them "to take their tents and cooking utensils, "and to lose no time;"—the two Connecticut Regiments, commanded, respectively, by Colonel Storrs and Major Graves, were ordered "to be in readiness "to march into Westchester, at a moment's warning;" and Generals Putnam and Spencer, the former commanding Heard's, Beall's, and Weedon's Brigades, and the latter commanding Lord Stirling's, Wadsworth's, and Fellows's Brigades, were ordered to remain on Harlem Heights and to continue the works of entrenchment thereon, General Putnam on all those proposed defensive works which were above Head-quarters, including those of Fort Washington:[5] those below Head-quarters, immediately in front of the enemy's works, which were occupied by Lieutenant-general the Earl of Percy and three Brigades, having been assigned to General Spencer.[6]

As General Heath was continued in the command of all the troops within Westchester-county, until further orders, notwithstanding the assignment of General Lee to the same command, the former instructed General Nixon, who had been ordered from New Jersey, with his Brigade, to "have the troops "which have marched, this day, to the eastward of "the Bridge, by Williams's,"[7] [Williams's-bridge,] "completely ready to turn out, in case the enemy "should make an attack, that night;" instructing him, at the same time, "should the attack be made

There is nothing which indicated the general consciousness of the helplessness of the country, at the time of which we write, as much as the general dependence of the country, as well as that of the Army, on General Charles Lee, an officer of large military pretentions; the ambitious leader of that party, in the Congress and elsewhere—mainly New Englanders—who was inclined to depreciate, if not to officially embarrass, General Washington; and the self-appointed and very willing and very unscrupulous critic of everything and everybody, unless of himself and of those who were pandering to his unholy ambition and applauding even his scurrility. He wielded a very glib, but a very poisonous, tongue, and a sharp and venomous pen, both of which were ready for immediate use, whenever his passions or his interests required their co operation. He was generally haughty, in his demeanor; he was always unprincipled, for good; he never ceased to be avaricious, even to meanness and dishonesty. A huckster of his own political and military opinions and associations, he was never contented with the prices which his wares commanded in the market of the world; and, after he had disgusted even his own party and had become, himself, disgusted with all mankind, he died, "unwept, unhonored, and unsung."

The country has had other men of straw whom it has also grasped, in its hours of great anxiety and great danger, almost counterparts of that on whom the Army and the country leaned, so confidently and so lovingly, from early in 1775 until the Summer of 1778; and just as the broken reed of that early period pierced the hand which leaned on it, so have these latter pretenders, these latter selfish and unpatriotic tools of unscrupulous and designing men, wounded those whose confidence they had secured, and brought shame and dishonor on the country which had petted them.

[5] The position assigned to Major-general Putnam, not immediately in front of the enemy, but, in the rear, where he could do no more than oversee the construction of certain specified defensive works, is peculiarly noteworthy—the disaster on Long Island was too distinctly remembered to allow him to be posted, again, where he could possibly do any harm.

[6] General Orders, "HEAD-QUARTERS, HARLEM HEIGHTS, October 14, "1776."

[7] We have not found any other description of these troops than what General Heath and David How wrote concerning them: the former saying, "two or three Brigades have moved, this day, beyond Wil- "liams's;" (Letter to Colonel Sargent, "KING'S BRIDGE, October 14, "1776;") and the latter, "14. There has been two Brigades March[d] By "hear This Day Towards forgg's point." (Diary, "October 14, 1776.")

"towards Frog's Point," to "endeavour to support "the Regiments that are posted at the passes, there;" "should the attack be made at or near East Chester "landing," to "make the best disposition of his "troops and repel the enemy;" and if any new movement of the enemy should be discovered, "to "send notice thereof, immediately, by one of the "Light-horsemen." General Heath also informed General Nixon "that a guard was absolutely necessary at "Rodman's-point," [the same as Pell's-point, on the opposite side of the Hutchinson's-river, from Throgg's-neck,] "next to East-Chester-creek." He said that Colonel How was near the landing-place, "with a "Regiment of Militia;" but it was evident that not enough was known of Colonel How's military qualifications for the command of so important a position; and General Nixon was directed to make inquiries on the subject.[1]

While the military authorities were thus engaged in preparing to meet the enemy, in arms, whenever the latter should endeavor to move from the Neck on which he was then quietly encamped, the Convention of New York, by its Committee of Safety, as we have already stated in our review of the proceedings of that Convention,[2] as soon as information could have possibly reached it, that the enemy had moved towards Westchester-county, provided for the immediate disposition of all the Cattle, Horses, Hogs, Sheep, Grain, Straw, and Hay, on the well-cultivated farms throughout that County, in order that the enemy should not secure them for his Commissariat;[3] and the careful reader may gather from that decided action of the Committee of Safety, how completely desolated all that flourishing County must have become, before that enemy secured a foothold on the main-land—indeed, before that foothold had been secured, all that portion of the County which was below Tarrytown, the White Plains, and Rye had, probably, been generally stripped of the various agricultural productions of that season, excepting only the Potatoes, the Buckwheat, and the Corn; and, of the Live-stock, of every description, it is scarcely probable that any remained, within that portion of the County.

In connection with this notice of the removal of the Live-stock and Crops, we may properly mention that, very largely, the inhabitants of those portions of the County which were likely to be exposed to the depredations of either of the two Armies—and one of these Armies was quite as bad as the other, in the work of plunder and devastation and outrage—removed from their several rural homes, with as many of their effects as they could take with them, to places of supposed greater safety;[4] and it is scarcely probable that, in all the lower Towns of the County, in which the tramp of armed men was soon to be heard, many of the inhabitants remained, unless, here and there, where the head of a family, accompanied by a faithful negro, lingered on the deserted homestead, in order that the property which could not be removed might not be left entirely uncared for.

The Convention was also mindful of the danger to which the records of the City and County of New York, as well as those of the Borough of Westchester and those of the County of Westchester, were exposed, by the movement of the enemy into the last-named County. All these had been removed from their proper places and lodged, for greater safety, in private houses, in different parts of the County, where, it was feared, they would become exposed to the enemy: and William Miller, of Harrison's Precinct, Theodorus Bartow, of New Rochelle, and John Cozine were appointed Commissioners for collecting them and removing them to Kingston, in Ulster-county, with instructions to gather and remove the scattered papers, "with all possible expedition," and to deliver them, at Kingston, to Dirck Wynkoop, Abraham Hasbrouck, and Christopher Tappen; and the Commissioners were authorized to call for a military guard, "to attend the said records, in their removal."[5]

On the fifteenth of October, the local Committee of Poundridge became so much alarmed, by reason of the movements of the "disaffected," in its vicinity, that the subject was laid before the Convention;[6] and the local Convention, and even individual members of that body, continued to worry General Washington

[4] The Morris family had left Morrisania, at the first appearance of danger, (Lewis Morris to the Convention, "PHILADELPHIA, Septr. 24, 1776.") John Jay obtained a leave of absence, on the fifteenth of October, to assist in the removal of his aged parents, with their effects, from their home, at Rye, to a place of safety, one of the most honorable acts of his life, (Journal of the Convention, "Tuesday afternoon, 15 October. 1776.") The pathetic story of Phœbe Oakley, (Petition, December 2, 1776,) and other evidences of equal value, clearly indicate that, among those who are less known to fame but equally worthy of respect, the removal of families and their effects, to places of supposed greater safety, at the time of which we write, very generally prevailed.

[6] As the note of the Committee indicated the feeling of the more active of the disaffected, at that time—although the great body of those who were discontented made no attempt to take up arms or to join the Royal Army, preferring to remain at home, in peace—we make room for it, in this place; with recitals of dangers from the "disaffected" who, singular as it appeared to those local despots, were not inclined to submit, passively, to whatever of insult or of injury those in revolution should be inclined to impose on them—only in very exceptional instances, however, did that "disaffection" extend beyond a disinclination to approve, in formal words, all which the Congresses had done, while the inclination to approve the Colonial policy of Great Britain was no stronger; and the general disinclination to leave their homes and their families and to resort to arms, or to rènder any assistance whatever, which the "disaffected," everywhere, presented, was as productive of disappointment to the commanders of the Royal Army as it was to General Washington. Neither General Howe nor General Washington understood of what that "disaffection" was generally composed; and partisan writers and partisan orators, from that day to this, have delighted to make that "disaffection" something else than it really was, and to invest the "disaffected," as a class, with characteristics and aims to which, unless in exceptional instances, they were strangers. Had the conservative farmers of Westchester-county—and these were not unlike the great bodies of the farmers, in all the Colonies—been permitted to dissent, quietly, from the policies of both the Home Government and the Continental Congress, and to have approved, quietly, of the spirited opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government and of the almost audacious demands for a redress of the grievances of the Colonies, which were made by the General Assembly of the Colony of New York, as they were certainly and generally inclined to do; and had not the aristocratic and haughty leaders of the revolutionary faction, in New York, attempted to secure uniformity of merely political opinions—and those to be only such opinions as they should dictate, by the methods which characterized the bigoted and relentless Clergy, in cases of religious dissent from their Calvinistic Congregationalism, in puritannic Massachusetts and Connecticut—as the those high-toned leaders persistently attempted, it is doubtful if "disaffection" would have been heard of, unless in some individual instances, which would have been harmless because of their insignificance; and it is morally certain that, if the love of home and the sense of wrongs inflicted by the Mother Country and the respect for those bearing authority, which everywhere prevailed, had been permitted to exercise the influences which they would have surely exercised, especially if they had been supported by that forbearance and by that respect for freedom of conscience, in political affairs, and by those appeals for harmony which every Christian man would have employed and none but civilized savages would have declined to employ, New York, if not the entire Continent, would have appeared, in the Autumn of 1776, as she had appeared in the Spring of 1774, before the spirit of factional strife had blighted the hopes of patriots, united, as one man, regardless of family feuds and ecclesiatical differences and social inequalities, demanding and, if needs be, supporting in arms, the Rights and the honor of the Colony and of the Continent. But that controlling faction had other ends than those of the country's welfare in view; and a narrow, bigoted, haughty, and relentless proscription and persecution of those whose political opinions differed from their own, very reasonably caused "disaffection" among the victims, without, however, leading them, to any considerable extent,[1] to strike, in retaliation—they would have been worthy of all which was heaped on them, had they endured that proscription and that persecution, without becoming "disaffected:" it was honorable that, although "disaffected," they declined to take up arms, even in retaliation or self-defence, when those arms, thus employed, would have been employed against their own country.

There does not appear to have been any movement, which is worthy of especial notice, in either Army, on the fifteenth of October; but in the General Orders of that day, Colonel Joseph Reed's Regiment was ordered to join the Brigade commanded by General McDougal; and Colonel Hutchinson's Regiment was ordered to join the Brigade commanded by General Clinton. The Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Sargent, Ward, and Chester and by Lieutenant-colonel Storrs, were formed into a Brigade, to be commanded by Colonel Sargent; and the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Douglass, Ely, Horseford, and by Majors Rogers and Graves, were, also, formed into a Brigade, to be commanded by General Saltonstall. The several Brigades of the Army were formed into Divisions,[2] those commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Heard, Beall, and Weedon were to form the Division to be commanded by Major-general Putnam; those commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Lord Stirling, Wadsworth, and Fellows were to form the Division to be commanded by Major-general Spencer; those commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Nixon, McDougal, and James Clinton, the last commanded by Colonel Glover, were to form the Division to be commanded by Major-general Lee; those commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Parsons, Scott, and George Clinton were to form the Division to be com-

[1] The reader has been, already, informed of what General Howe stated on the backwardness of the Colonists, even of those who had claimed to have been loyal, in taking up arms against their own country, (vide pages 388, 401, ante.) We need not repeat the statements.

[2] It is a noticeable fact, and one which has seriously perplexed those who have attempted to study the history of that period and, very often, has led them astray, that, until the time now under notice, the Regiments of the Army were not, generally, arranged into Brigades and Divisions; and that neither Brigadier-generals nor Major-generals had any specified Regiments under their especial command—they commanded those who were present and on duty, wherever they might happen to be; and it is hardly to be wondered at, th t there was so little of order and discipline in the Army: it is rather remarkable there were as much of them as there appears to have been.

manded by Major-general Heath; those commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Saltonstall, Sargent, and Hand were to form the Division to be commanded by Major-general Sullivan; and the Massachusetts Militia, then serving with the Army, was to be formed into a Division to be commanded by Major-general Lincoln.[1] At the same time, the General, in the most pressing terms, exhorted all Officers commanding Divisions, Brigades, and Regiments, to have their Officers and the men under their respective commands properly informed of what was expected from them, that no confusion might arise in case they should be suddenly called to action, which, there was no kind of doubt, was near at hand; and he hoped and flattered himself that the only contention would be who should render the most acceptable service to his country and his posterity. He also desired that the Officers would be particularly attentive to the mens's Arms and ammunition, that there might be no deficiency or application for Cartridges when they were called into the field.[2]

On Wednesday, the sixteenth of October, General Washington, accompanied by the other Generals, made a careful reconnaissance of the ground at and near Pell's or Rodman's-neck,[3] towards which, it is very evident, his attention had been particularly directed, as the point towards which the next movement of the enemy would probably be directed.[4]

With all the information, concerning "the enemy's "intention to surround" the American Army, which the General had been able to secure; with all the knowledge which his personal and careful reconnaissance of the country had imparted to him; and with all the intelligence concerning "the turbulence of "the disaffected in the upper parts of this State," which the Convention had communicated to him, he re-assembled the Council of War which had met and adjourned on the preceding Sunday,[5] [October 13;] and he laid all these matters before it, for its consideration.

That very notable Council was assembled at the Head-quarters of General Lee; and, besides the Commander-in-chief, Major-generals Lee, Putnam, Heath, Spencer, and Sullivan; Brigadier-generals Lord Stirling, Mifflin, McDougal, Parsons, Nixon, Wadsworth, Scott, Fellows, Clinton, and Lincoln; and Colonel Knox, commanding the Artillery, were present—although General Greene was at the Head-quarters of the Army, on Harlem-heights, he was evidently out of humor and was not present.[6] After the Commander-in-chief had communicated to the assembled Generals those letters from the Convention of the State and those "accounts of deserters showing the enemy's "intention to surround" the American Army, to which reference has been made, and after much consideration and debate, the following question was stated: "Whether, (it having appeared that the ob-"structions in the North River have proved insuffi-"cient, and that the enemy's whole force is now in "our rear, on Frog Point,) it is now deemed possible, "in our present situation, to prevent the enemy from "cutting off the communication with the country and "compelling us to fight them, at all disadvantages, "or surrender prisoners at discretion?" With only one dissenting voice, that of General George Clinton, the Council agreed that "it is not possible to prevent "the communication from being cut off; and that "one of the consequences mentioned in the question "must certainly follow." Largely, if not entirely, in deference to the expressed will of the Continental Congress, the Council resolved, however, apparently with entire unanimity, "that Fort Washington be re-"tained as long as possible."[7]

[1] Although General Lincoln was considered and named, in the General Order now under notice, as a Major-general, it is probable that that was only his rank in the Militia of Massachusetts, since, in the Council of War, which was held on the following day, [October 16,] he was ranked as only a Brigadier-general, and then only at the lower end of the line of Brigadiers.

[4] The first reconnaissance which the General made, after the enemy's occupation of Throgg's-neck, included "the Necks adjacent," so that he was not ignorant of the character of the ground on and near Pell's-neck; but, on the morning of the sixteenth—probably because of information received, on the preceding day, from some deserters from the fleet, who had been taken to Head-quarters and personally examined by the General, with evident confidence in their testimony, (General Washington to Governor Trumbull, "Head-quarters, Heights of Harlem, Octo-"ber 16, 1776,")—another and more minute examination of the ground was made, as stated in the text.

Singular as it would appear to be, were not the propensity for securing all the honor which belongs to them and as much more as is possible, so generally prevalent among those who have occupied public places, Gordon, who was so largely the exponent of General Greene's opinions and pretensions, made the latter take a leading part, in the Council, in opposing the movement of the Army from Harlem-Heights; but the official Minutes of the Council clearly show that General Greene was not present, and, therefore, could not have taken any part in the proceedings of that body, (Compare the Proceedings of a Council of General Officers at the Head-quarters of General Lee, October 16, 1776, with Gordon's History of the American Revolution, ii., 338.)

Because of evident errors in the copy of that paper which is printed in Force's American Archives, V., ii., 1117, 1118, we have preferred the copy of it, evidently taken from the original manuscript, which appears in Sparks's Writings of George Washington, Ed. Boston: 1834, iv., 155, note.

In his evidently new-born zeal, adverse to the military and personal character of General Charles Lee, Bancroft has exposed his entire inability to understand and correctly describe a military movement, whatever his capability of understanding and correctly describing a political movement may be, in what he has written concerning "the origin of "the retirement of the American Army from New York." (History of the United States, Edit. Boston: 1866, ix., 175, note; the same, centenary edition, v., 440, note.)

In his attempt to take from General Lee everthing of credit for having united with others, in advising that "retirement of the Amer-"ican Army from New York," which is now under consideration, that venerable and distinguished historian has entirely disregarded the action of that Council of War, in which the Commander-in-chief was officially informed, the first time, of the opinions of the General Officers, concerning the further occupation of the Heights of Harlem by the main body of the American Army, on which opinions the General Orders for

The several positions occupied by the different portions of the Army, from day to day, have not been noticed, with any degree of particularity, in any of the official documents or publications of that period, as far as we have knowledge; but it is evident that the command of Major-general Spencer was moved from the exterior lines, on the Heights of Harlem, to which it had been ordered on the preceding Monday, [October 14,][1] and carried into Westchester-county—the Brigades commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Wadsworth and Fellows were moved to Kingsbridge,[2] probably further northward; and the Brigade commanded by Brigadier-general Lord Stirling, to which the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Weedon and Reed were added,[3] was pushed forward, first, to the Mile Square and, afterwards, to the White Plains.[4] A portion, if not the whole, of the Brigade commanded by Colonel Glover was evidently moved to support whatever guard there may have been posted on the outlet from Pell's, or Rodman's, neck;[5] two Regiments of the Massachusetts Militia, from the command of Major-general Lincoln, were "sent up the river," [the Hudson-river,] "to watch the motions of the ships," [the Phœnix, the Roebuck, and the Tartar, then lying off Tarrytown,] "and to oppose any landing of men, that they may attempt;"[6] while the Head-quarters of that small Division and, probably, the two remaining Regiments, were posted on Valentine's-hill,[7] in the Town of Yonkers, one of those ridges which formed, and which still form, a distinguishing feature in the topography of Westchester-county; and, at the time of which we write, the most southerly of those high grounds, extending northerly as far as the White Plains, which were subsequently occupied by detachments of the American Army, while the main body of that Army was laboriously and painfully occupied in its famous retreat, with its baggage and stores, from the Heights of Harlem to the high grounds at the last mentioned-place;[8] and General Heath's Division was posted in a line extending from Fort Independence to Valentine's-hill.[9] It is said, also, that a line of entrenched encampments was also formed, along the high grounds, on the western side of the Bronx-river, from Valentine's-hill, on the South, to Chatterton's-hill, opposite the White Plains, on the North;[10] but by which of the Regiments they were that "retirement" were largely based, and from the date of which officially expressed opinions, alone, that of "the origin of the retirement of the American Army from New York" can be accurately ascertained.

Surely the historian could not have been sincere when he described the hurried movement of the Regiment commanded by Colonel Smallwood, on the twelfth of October, to oppose the progress of the enemy from Throgg's-neck, as a "retirement of the American Army from New York;" and because the weight of his authorities, in support of his fancy, was confined to a single letter, written by the Adjutant-general of the Army to his wife, on the day after the enemy landed on Throgg's-neck, in which that officer said, "The principal part of this Army is "moved off this island"—a movement from the works on Harlem Heights, which was only for the purpose of holding the enemy in check, and that not, by any means, in fact, approaching a movement of "the "principal part of the Army," nor with either an intimation or a pretense that it was a "retirement of the American Army" from its strong position—without any other testimony whatever to support it, we are constrained to attribute the statement under consideration, either to have been an ebullition of his antipathy against General Lee or one of the reasonable results of his ignorance of what was necessary to constitute a "retirement of the American Army from New York."

It would have been more creditable to the authorial reputation of that venerable writer of history, had he read what General Washington instructed his Secretary to write to the President of the Congress, on the seventeenth of October, the day after the Council had advised him of the inexpediency of holding the Heights of Harlem, with the main body of the Army, on the subject of the "change of our disposition, to counteract the operations of the enemy, declining an attack on our front." Had he read that very simple statement, he would have ascertained that the Commander-in chief was not aware, on the seventeenth of October, that any portion of the Army, at that time, had been "taken from "hence," in the sense of a "retirement of the Army;" that the "change "of the disposition" of the Army had not, then, been made; that that proposed "change of our disposition" was frankly stated to have been "determined" on, in the Council of General Officers, on the preceding day; and that "General Lee, who arrived on Monday, had strongly "urged the absolute necessity of the measure," not yet executed.

A PLAN of the COUNTRY from FROGS POINT to CHOTON RIVER shewing the Positions of the American and British Armies from the 12th of October 1776 until the ENGAGEMENT on the WHITE PLAINS on the 28th constructed and by whom occupied, we are unable to state with certainty, although we suspect that the Massachusetts Militia, commanded by General Lincoln, and the two Brigades of General Spencer's Division, commanded, respectively, by Generals Fellows and Wadsworth, who had been moved from the Heights of Harlem to Kingsbridge, on the seventeenth of October, were the artificers who constructed and the soldiers who occupied that very greatly important line of hastily constructed earthworks.

There had not been much haste displayed in the American Army, in changing its position on the Heights of Harlem, made really strong by the outlay of immense labor, notwithstanding the enemy had completely turned its left flank, occupied a position on its rear, and with the veriest mite of an effort was capable of throwing a strong force across its entire rear, of seizing every line of communication and every strong position, and of forming such a line of offensive operations, covered, on either flank, by the ships off Tarrytown and the fleet off Throgg's-neck, which the Americans, in their generally unknown weakness and poverty of supplies, could scarcely have hoped to overcome. But General Washington had a lingering suspicion that the movement of the enemy to Throgg's-neck was only a feint; that he remained in that unseemly position only to await the proper time when he could quickly embark again, and drop down to Morrisania, on one tide; and that caution was necessary.[1] Besides that caution, in the Commander-in-chief, there was a great scarcity of the means for transporting the Stores and Baggage to another and distant position;[2] and, with commendaby Claude Joseph Sauthier, a celebrated Engineer in the service of the King, and published by William Faden, in London, in 1777; the other, drawn by the Engineers of the American Army for, and preserved by, General Washington, and engraved, from the original manuscript, for the illustration of the original edition of Chief-justice Marshall's Life of George Washington, published in Philadelphia, in 1804.

As both of these Maps were originally official, one British and the other American; as both were published from the respective manuscripts, as nearly as possible in fac-simile; and as both are historical authorities of the highest character, they will be frequently referred to, in our narrative of the Military Operations in Westchester-county; and, in order that our readers may also enjoy the benefits to be derived from a use of them, while reading the story of Westchester-county's revolutionary history, the Publishers have re-produced them, at our request, as nearly in exact fac-simile of the original publications, as possible. Sauthier's Map will be found opposite page 227 of this work, ante; and General Washington's Map will be found opposite this page of the same.

We may be permitted, however, to call the reader's attention to a singular error which was made in lettering the British Map. Where "Philipsburgh," [Philipsborough,] or Yonkers, should have been designated the word "Wepperham"—intended for "Neperhan," the name of the stream, popularly known as the "Sawmill-river," at the mouth of which Philipsborough, or Yonkers, stood—has been erroneously inserted; and, instead of designating Tarrytown, not "Terrytown," as situated miles above the Pocantico, on which the upper Manorhouse of the Manor of Philipsborough yet stands, that noted village ought to have been designated below that stream— indeed, the Pocantico is made to appear as if it were the Neperhan, or Sawmill-river; and Dobbs's-ferry and Tarrytown are consequently crowded up, into the immediate vicinity of the Croton-river, although they are several miles below that stream; and all the other lettering of the Map is similarly forced to the northward, unduly, in order that it may be made to correspond with the river-villages.

Probably misled by the errors referred to, in the official Map, the beautiful Map of the same Military Operations, which illustrates Stedman's History of the American War, has repeated the mistakes, in all their ugliness; and the first edition of Lossing's Field-book of the Revolution perpetuated the unwelcome errors.

On the morning of the eighteenth of October, while the enemy was seen in motion to the eastward of Throgg's neck, when that fact was communicated to General Washington, by General Heath, the latter was ordered to return to his command, which had been posted with its right at Valentine's and its left at Fort Independence, and to have it "formed, "ready for action, immediately, and to take such a position as might ap-"pear best calculated to oppose the enemy, should they attempt to land "another body of troops on Morrisania, which he thought not improba-"ble;" and General Heath "immediately obeyed the Order." (Memoirs of General Heath, 72.)

[2] That scarcity will be evident to the reader of General Orders of the seventeenth of October, in which "some Regiments" are ordered "to "move towards them," [the enemy,] in which Orders were also included for the government of those Regiments, in the transportation of their Tents and Baggage.

See, also, Quartermaster-general Mifflin to William Duer, "MOUNT WASH-"INGTON, October 20, 1776."

Gordon, when describing the movement from Harlem Heights, said, "The movement was attended with much difficulty, for want of Wag-"gons and Artillery horses. When a part was forwarded, the other was "fetched on. This was the general way of removing the Camp-equip-"page and other appendages of the Army. The few Teams which were "at hand, were in no wise equal to the service; and their deficiency "could be made up only by the bodily labor of the men." (History of the American Revolution, ii., 339, 340.)

It would be useful, were some one to ascertain and to inform the world of historical literature, just why there was such a remarkable scarcity of Teams, in such an old-settled agricultural community as occupied the lower Towns of Westchester county, in the Autumn of 1776, especially of those Teams which were required by the American Army, by whom that portion of the County had been occupied, during several weeks preceding the date of the retreat from Harlem Heights. There would be some curious revelations of the inefficiency of the Quarter-master-general's Department; but there would, also, be some very much more curious revelations of thefts of horses, by the Officers of the Army, not for their present purposes, but for their use, in the future, after their retirement from the service. Vide General Orders, October 31, 1776.

The farmers of Westchester-county were robbed, indiscriminately, not only by the camp followers and the privates of the Army, but by the Officers, including Field-officers;* and, in that work of plunder, the records are singularly ample in their evidence that the plunderers were almost exclusively men and Officers of the Massachusetts and Connecticut Lines.† At a later period than that which is now under consideration, even a Major-general of the Continental Army was confederated with similar thieves; and gave orders on the Paymasters of the Army for ble prudence, a removal of Head-quarters from the strong position which they, then, occupied, was not attempted until every possible preparation for a successful removal of them had been duly made. Every portion of the Army was so disposed, however, that all could be concentrated around Head-quarters, in a short time, should such a movement become necessary, although the enemy was, also, properly and effectively guarded; and, although there was no appearance of haste, in anything which was done, there was, also, abundant evidence that the Commander-in-chief, no longer given away to despondency, was entirely mindful of the great responsibility which, then, rested on him.

While all these anxieties had prevailed throughout the American Army, and while all these precautions were being taken by General Washington, General Howe and the main body of the Royal Army had been quietly encamped on Throgg's-neck. With the exception of a scattering fire across the marsh which separated the Neck from the mainland, which seems to have done no material damage,[1] there does not appear to have been any offensive movement whatever;[2] and there is very little reason for supposing that the entire period of the stay of the Army, at that place, was not duly occupied in the transportation of Stores and Provisions and means for Transportation and what must have been regarded as necessary reinforcements.[3]

It is not an uncommon occurrence for those who are without information, during a War, to condemn what they regard as the tardiness, sometimes as the criminal tardiness, of a commanding General, in the movement of his command on some enterprise on which the faultfinders have rested large, very often unduly large, expectations; and General Howe has not escaped from that very common condemnation. As we have already stated,[4] he has been condemned for having blundered because he occupied Throgg's-neck instead of some more favorable point, on the mainland; but, as we have also shown, whatever of censure there may have been due for having thus blundered in occupying that isolated Neck, if there was any blunder in the case, it belonged to Admiral Lord Howe instead of to the General, his brother. General Howe has been condemned, also, because of his long stay on Throgg's-neck, without having attempted to move from that position, in any direction whatever,[5] but surely no one would have desired him to move into an enemy's country, in the face of an active military force of that enemy, without a Commissariat, without the necessary military Stores which would become necessary in his conduct of the proposed movement into that enemy's country, and without the slightest pretense to the necessary means for transporting even his Officers' baggage, of all of which the first and second detachments had taken comparatively little to the Neck, and of all of which the subsequent and main supplies were held back by adverse winds, which prevented the vessels which bore them from passing through Hell-gate.[6] In addition to the delays in moving the Commissariat, the military Stores, and the Horses and Waggons of the Quarter-master-general's Department,[7] to which reference has been made, some delay was also experienced in moving three Battalions of Hessians, from Staten-island, for the reinforcement of the main body, on the Neck;[8] and thus, in General Howe's own words, "Four or five days had been "unavoidably taken up in landing at Frog's-Neck, "instead of going, at once, to Pell's-point, which "would have been an imprudent measure, as it could

[2] Judge Jones, in his remarkably accurate History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 122,) said of General Howe's occupation of Throgg's neck, "here a whole fortnight was spent in doing nothing "(plundering the inhabitants and stealing their horses excepted)." We incline to the belief, however, that General Howe had no communication with the mainland sufficient to enable him to seize horses; and there could not have been much opportunity for plunder, by the troops, unless on the Neck, for the same controlling reason.

The Judge was also evidently in error as to the period of General Howe's occupation of the Neck—he landed, there, on the twelfth of October, and he moved from it, on the eighteenth of the same month, which can hardly be said, with propriety, to have been "a whole fortnight."

[8] In his despatch to Lord George Germaine, "NEW-YORK, 30 Novem-"ber, 1776," General Howe stated that "three Battalions of Hessians "were drawn from Staten Island;" but in his Speech before a Committee of the House of Commons, April 29, 1779, when his conduct, as Commander-in-chief of the King's forces in North America, was under consideration, he stated, without contradiction, that the reinforcement consisted of "the Second Division of Hessians." We have preferred the former statement; because there was, then, only one Brigade of Hessians on Staten Island; and because the "Second Division of Hessians," under General Knyphausen, had not, then, reached America.

"not have been executed without much unnecessary "risk."[1]

Having at length, completely effected his occupation of Throgg's-neck and completely provided for his probable needs, General Howe determined to open his operations in Westchester-county, without further delay; and, at one o'clock in the morning of Friday, the eighteenth of October, the van of the Royal Army, consisting of the Light Infantry and Grenadiers of the British Regiments and a portion, at least, if not all, of the German Chasseurs, was re-embarked, in flat boats, on the western side of the Neck; and, having passed around the Point of Throgg's-neck, was landed on Pell's, or, as it was sometimes called, Rodman's, neck, on the opposite side of Hutchinson's-river, in the Town of Eastchester.[2] The main body of the Army crossed over to the eastern side of the Neck; and, during the day, that, also, with all its various appointments and stores and supplies, was carried over to Pell's-neck.[3]

It does not appear that the movement of the van of the Royal Army was seen by the Americans, through the darkness of the very early morning, notwithstanding one of the best of the Brigades in the American service, that of General James Clinton, then commanded by Colonel Glover of Marblehead, had been posted, as a guard, in front of Pell's-neck, the place of its debarkation; and not until daylight had revealed the similar movement of the main body of the Army, was there any suspicion, among the Americans, anywhere, that such a movement was imminent—indeed, the van had landed and moved up toward the main-land, a full mile and a half, before either of the movements was discovered.[4]

The movement of the main body, in upwards of two hundred boats, formed into four grand divisions and covered by the smaller armed vessels of the Fleet, was discovered, "early in the morning," by Colonel Glover himself; by whom, after he had sent Major Lee, the Brigade-Major, as an express to General Lee, whose Quarters were three miles away from that place, the entire Brigade which he commanded, was called to arms, and moved down the Neck, to oppose the landing of the enemy and to hold him in check, until reinforcements should be sent or other Orders be received.

Although the full strength of the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Shepard, Read, Baldwin, and Glover—the latter, at that time, commanded by Captain Curtis—was less than eight hundred effective men,[5] the brave fisherman who temporarily commanded the Brigade pushed forward toward the place where the enemy's Light Infantry and Grenadiers and Chasseurs had landed, and where the main body was about to land, although the rough and broken ground over which the Brigade was moved compelled him to leave, on his route, the three field-pieces which he had taken from his encampment. He had not marched more than half the distance, however, before his further progress was arrested by the unexpected appearance, on his front, of the advance-guard of the enemy's van, the main body of whom, as we have already stated, had been pushed forward, at an early hour, to occupy the landing-place and, if necessary, to cover the descent of the main body; and who, in the absence of any opposing force of the Americans, had evidently sent out a strong detachment of its force, to see what was to be seen and to take advantage of any favorable circumstances which should be presented, in a movement over the Neck, toward the main-land.

* This Regiment was formerly commanded by Colonel Learned, under whom William Shepard was Lieutenant-colonel; but, at the particular request of General Washington, (Letter dated "HEAD-QUARTERS, HEIGHTS "OF HARLEM, September 30, 1776,") the latter was promoted to the Colonelcy and the command of the Regiment, by a vote of the Continental Congress, on the second of October, 1776. (Journal of the Continental Congress, "Wednesday, October 2, 1776.")

As the Regiment really commanded by Colonel Shepard was often alluded to as "Late Learned's," this explanation becomes necessary, in order to enable the reader to understand the subject, correctly.

With admirable skill and with a deliberate coolness which would have done honor to a soldier of larger pretensions, Colonel Glover threw forward a Captain, with forty men, to feel of that advanced party of the enemy and, if possible, to mask the attempt to dispose of the main-body of his Brigade, in ambuscade, for the further obstruction of the enemy's advance towards the main-land, which was, also, a part of the Colonel's improvised plan of operations. The plan which was thus admirably devised, on the spur of the moment, by Colonel Glover, was quite as admirably and quite as successfully executed by the soldiers of his command — Colonel Read and his Regiment were concealed behind a stone wall, on the left side of the road; Colonel Shepard's Regiment was concealed behind "a fine double stone wall," on the opposite side of the road, and in the rear of Colonel Read's command; Colonel Baldwin and his Regiment were similarly posted, on the right and in the rear of Colonel Shepard's command; and Captain Curtis, with Colonel Glover's own Regiment, was similarly posted where the field-pieces had been left, some distance in the rear; the Captain and his command who had been thrown out, in front, having, meanwhile, evidently held the enemy's advance in check and successfully masked the very important movements of the Brigade, on their rear.

When the disposition of the Brigade had been thus successfully and satisfactorily effected, Colonel Glover rode forward to the Company whom he had employed as a mask, and personally assumed the command of it—the name of the Captain who had so boldly confronted the enemy and held him in check, before the Colonel had completed the disposition of the main body of the Brigade, behind the very convenient stone walls, on his rear, has not been recorded—ordering it to advance toward the enemy; which was promptly done. When it had marched to "within fifty yards" of the place where the enemy had halted, the latter opened his fire, without, however, inflicting any loss on his assailants; and the latter returned the fire, killing or seriously wounding four of the enemy —"we returned the fire and fell four of them," are the quaint words of Colonel Glover, in his description of the opening of this spirited affair. Five rounds were exchanged by the Americans; and they had sustained a loss of two men killed and several wounded, when the enemy, who had, meanwhile, been largely reinforced, pressed forward, in a charge on the gallant little party. As it would have been useless, under the existing circumstances, to have made any further resistance, Colonel Glover ordered the Captain commanding to fall back, which was done with order and coolness—"I ordered a retreat, "which was masterly well done by the Captain that "commanded the party," are the Colonel's words, descriptive of the retrograde movement—the enemy cheering and pushing forward, in pursuit.

Without supposing, for a moment, that the glory of a complete victory had not been already gained, the Chasseurs and Light Infantry and Grenadiers pressed forward, in column, along the narrow country road, until they approached, "within thirty yards," the heavy stone wall, on their right flank, behind which the Regiment commanded by Colonel Read, was concealed; when the latter rose and, from behind its substantial breastwork, poured into them a full and destructive fire. Without attempting to even return the fire, the advancing column broke and fell back and awaited the support of the main body, some portion of whom had evidently effected a landing; while Colonel Glover and his concealed command patiently and hopefully awaited a renewal of the movement.

An hour and a half are said to have passed, before the enemy again advanced, when, with what were supposed to have been four thousand men, strengthened with seven pieces of artillery, he again appeared, keeping up, as he advanced, a constant and noisy but entirely harmless fire, and approached the heavy stone wall, on his right flank, behind which Colonel Read and his men, made more confident by the result of their earlier success, were securely crouched, in complete readiness to receive him. The advancing column seems to have learned nothing from the lesson which the Americans had taught the advance, earlier in the morning; and, with an appearance of bravado, it moved forward, in the midst of the smoke of its own uselessly expended gunpowder, as if there were not an enemy within a day's march of it, until it had approached within fifty yards of the first line of the ambuscade, when Colonel Read and his command arose, as they had arisen when the advance had approached, earlier in the day, and threw on it a deliberate and destructive fire. The suddenness of the attack and the evident strength of its sheltered assailants brought the advancing column to a sudden halt; and it is said that the Americans maintained their ground until they had thrown seven well-directed volleys into the closed ranks of the enemy, by whom, meanwhile, the fire was returned "with "showers of musquetry and cannon-balls," as Colonel Glover has stated, concerning it.

Having thus bravely maintained his ground, until a retreat had become necessary, Colonel Read fell back, without returning to the roadway, until he had passed the left flank of the Regiment commanded by Colonel Shepard, who had remained, in concealment, on the opposite side of the road, during the entire morning; and there, covering Colonel Shepard's left flank, the Regiment was re-formed, and rested on its arms.

The enemy evidently misunderstood the character of the retreat of Colonel Read and his brave command—like the Officer commanding the detachment, in the morning, he appears to have supposed that he had repulsed the Americans; and that nothing remained to be done, except to gather the fruits of his success—and he cheered and pushed forward, along the narrow roadway, until the head of his column had advanced within easy gun-shot distance from the second line of the ambuscade, on his left flank, where Colonel Shepard and his command were concealed, as we have said, behind "a fine double stone wall;" when the latter sprang to their feet, and, from behind their all-sufficient shelter, poured into him a well-directed and effective fire. The column was again brought to a sudden and unexpected halt; and a long-continued and well-sustained fire was kept up, by each of the belligerent parties—it is said that seventeen volleys were fired by the Americans; and that the enemy's line was broken, "several times, once, in "particular, so far that a soldier of Colonel Shep-"ard's" [Regiment] "leaped over a wall, and took a "hat and canteen off of a Captain that lay dead on "the ground they retreated from."

But the disparity of numbers between the opposing forces was so very great that prudence dictated a retreat of the two Regiments who had so successfully held the enemy in check; and Colonel Glover ordered them to fall back and re-form and rest on their arms, in the rear of the third line of the ambuscade, behind which the Regiment commanded by Colonel Baldwin was concealed.

The advancing column of the enemy was again put in motion; but the record of the events of the day make no mention of any mere waste of ammunition nor of any shouts of exultant success; and it is evident that it moved forward, soberly and cautiously, as was becoming, in view of the heavy losses which it had already sustained and of those to which it was predestined. It had not proceeded far before Colonel Baldwin and his command arose from their concealment, behind the third line of the ambuscade; and, suddenly and unexpectedly, they delivered a destructive fire, into the head of the column. It is said, however, that, in this instance, the ground was much in favor of the enemy, enabling him to bring his artillery to bear on the Americans; and that the opposition of the latter was, in consequence of those disadvantages, neither as spirited nor as effective as that which had been made by Colonels Read and Sheperd. The Americans were compelled to retreat "to the bottom of "the hill," or high ground on which the ambuscade was formed; through a brook, the bridge over which had been previously taken up, by Colonel Glover; and up the slope, on the opposite side of the brook, to the place, on the high ground, where Captain Curtis and Colonel Glover's Regiment and the three field-pieces were posted.

It appears that the enemy did not pursue the retreating Americans, but contented himself, until late in the day, with a continued fire of his artillery, over the little valley and the brook, the Americans, of course, returning it—the latter, without sustaining any loss whatever from the enemy's fire; while the former evidently sustained very little, if any, from the Americans' fire on him.

The Americans having been in front of the enemy, from an early hour, in the morning, all the day, without food or drink, "at dark," they fell back, three miles, and bivouaced—"after fighting all day, with-"out victuals or drink, lay as a picquet, all night, the "heavens over us, and the earth under us, which was "all we had, having left all our baggage at the old "encampment we left in the morning," are Colonel Glover's words, concerning that portion of his Brigade's movements—and, on the morning of Saturday, the nineteenth of October, they marched to the Mile Square, on the western side of the Bronx, in the Town of Yonkers.[1]

The strength of the Brigade commanded by Colonel Glover has been already stated, in detail, from official sources;[2] and, because Colonel Glover would not have left the encampment and all the baggage and stores of the Brigade without a sufficient guard, there is an evident truthfulness in his statement that he carried from his encampment only "about seven "hundred and fifty men and three field-pieces." But, in the same connection, it must be remembered that the two Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonel's Read and Shepard, sustained almost the entire attacks of the enemy—Colonel Baldwin fell back, without having sustained any other than an artillery-fire; and Captain Curtis only saw the enemy, in the distance, on the other side of the valley—and that, therefore, the number of Americans who were actually engaged did not, probably, exceed four hundred rank and file. The strength of the enemy who was actually engaged has not been stated by any of the foreign authorities; and we can do no more than state the facts which are well-authenticated, and to draw our conclusions from them. It is known that the detachment of the Royal Army which was first moved to Pell's-neck was composed of the Light

[1] We have depended, in this statement of the spirited action at Pelham, on Colonel Glover's homely description of it, contained in a letter, dated at "MILE-SQUARE, October 22, 1776," which was evidently written for the eye of a friend, although it very soon found its way into the newspapers, from one of which—The Freeman's Journal and New Hampshire Gazette, Vol. I., No. 27., PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 26, 1776—we made our copy. Force copied it, with some unimportant variations, in his American Archives, V., ii., 1188, 1189; but we have preferred to use the contemporary edition.

Infantry and Grenadiers of the Army;[1] and if the Chasseurs of the German auxiliaries were also included, as more than one of the authorities have stated,[2] and as was more than probable, the previously large force of the detachment was very largely increased. The advance-guard from that detachment was said to have been only thirty men;[3] and these were met and held in check by a Captain and forty men. These, naturally enough, fell back on the main body, not on that of the Army itself, but on that of the detachment which had been moved from Throgg's-neck, in advance of the main body of the Army; and, since that detachment had been thus sent forward, in advance, for the express purpose of holding back any force of the Americans who should incline to obstruct the landing of the main Army, there can be no reasonable doubt that almost the entire force of the detachment was moved forward, against Colonel Glover and his command. In the absence of official Returns, the number of men actually included in that detachment can be only surmised; but the Light Infantry and Grenadiers of the entire British Army, added to the Chasseurs and other Light Infantry and the Grenadiers of the German mercenaries—the Chasseurs taking with them their light regimental fieldpieces—could have been scarcely less than four thousand men, the number stated by Colonel Glover.

The losses sustained by the Americans, in this action, were six men killed,[4] and Colonel Shepard and twelve men wounded;[5] those of the British were three men, killed, and Lieutenant-colonel Musgrave, commanding the First Battalion of Light Infantry, and Captain Evelyn, of the Fourth Regiment of Foot, and twenty men, wounded;[6] those of the Chasseurs, on whom, in such mixed detachments as that under notice, the severest losses usually fell, have not been stated; but they were said to have been, and they probably were, very severe.[7]

It does not appear to have been pretended that General Lee gave any Order or any support to Colonel Glover, notwithstanding the latter despatched his Major of Brigade to the General, with information of the approach of the enemy to Pell's-neck, before he ordered his command to move down the Neck, to oppose the enemy's progress;[8] and, in truth, nothing whatever has been recorded of the doings of General Lee, on that eventful eighteenth of October. It is said, on the other hand, that, early in the morning of that day, the Officer commanding the Regiment which guarded the pass to Throgg's-neck, by way of the causeway and bridge, from the Village of Westchester, suspected the enemy was preparing to move from the Neck, and sent an express to General Heath, with the information; that the latter ordered one of his Aide's to gallop to Valentine's, near whose house General George Clinton and his Brigade were posted, with Orders that the Brigade should be formed, "instantly;" that General Heath reached Valentine's "by the time the Brigade was formed," and ordered the Officer in command "to march with the utmost expe-"dition, to the head of the causeway, to reinforce "the troops, there, himself moving on with them;" that, while on the march, another express met General Heath, informing him that the entire force of the enemy was in motion, and seemed to be moving towards the ford, at the head of the creek which separated Throgg's-neck from the mainland; that the [4] We are not insensible that Colonel Glover, in his letter of which so much use has been made, in the preparation of this narrative, stated that eight were killed; but the official Returns, referred to, below, clearly indicated that only six were killed—no Returns of the Wounded having been made, only the Killed can be noticed.

The Return of the Regiment commanded by Colonel Read shows that, of that Regiment, Samuel Cole, of Captain Pond's Company, Daniel Deland, of Captain Warren's Company, and Ezekiel Fuller, of Captain Peters's Company, were killed. (A Return of the Killed, Missing, etc., without date, in Force's American Archives, V., ii., 718.)

The Return of Colonel Shepard's Regiment shows that, of that Regiment, Sergeants James Scott and Charles Adams and Private Thaddeus Kemp, all of them of Captain Bolster's Company, were killed. (A Return of the Killed, Taken, and Missing of the Third Regiment, commanded by Colonel Shepard, etc., "NORTH-CASTLE, November 19, 1776.")

The Return of Colonel Baldwin's Regiment shows that that Regiment sustained no loss, on the day under consideration. (Return of the Killed, Wounded, Prisoners, and Missing in the Brigade commanded by Gurdon Saltonstall, Esq. "NORTH-CASTLE. November 19, 1776.")

The Return of Colonel Glover's Regiment shows that that Regiment, commanded by Captain Curtis, on the occasion now under consideration, sustained no loss—it was not under the enemy's fire. [7] It was not the practise, when this skirmish occurred, to notice, in detail, the operations of the German mercenary troops, in the despatches of the Royal Commander-in-chief to the Home Government; and the losses sustained by those troops, in whatever actions they were engaged, were seldom, if ever, included in the detailed Reports of Casualties which were sent to and published by the Government, at London. The Reports of the operations and the casualties of those troops were made to the several sovereign Princes, Electors, etc., of whom those troops were, respectively, subjects; and, except in some few instances, when individual enterprise has unearthed some of them, the text of those Reports and much of the official correspondence remain in their original repositories, unopened and seemingly, uncared for.

The reports of deserters and other unofficial reports made the total loss, including both British and German, from eight hundred to a thousand men; and it is difficult to make one believe that four hundred Americans, familiar from their childhood with the use of firearms, sheltered by ample defences from which they could fire deliberately and with their pieces rested on the tops of their defences, could have possibly fired volley after volley, into a large body of men, massed in a closely compacted column and cooped up in a narrow country roadway, without having inflicted as extended a damage on those who received their fire, as deserter after deserter, to the number of more than half a dozen, on different days, without any connection with each other, severally and separately declared had been inflicted on the enemy's advance, on the occasion now under consideration.

[8] Colonel Glover's letter dated "MILE SQUARE, October 22, 1776."

Brigade was immediately halted, the men were ordered to prime and load their pieces, and the rear Regiment was ordered "to file off by the left and to "march, briskly, to reinforce the Americans, at the "pass, at the head of the creek;" that, while the Brigade was thus halted, General Washington rode up, inquired and was informed of "the state of things;" ordered General Heath to return, immediately, evidently with all the troops who were with him, and to have the entire Division which he commanded formed, ready for action, and to take such a position as should appear to be best adapted for holding the enemy in check, if he should attempt to effect a landing at Morrisania, which the Commander-in-chief "thought not improbable;" and that such a disposition as was thus ordered, was promptly made of the three Brigades commanded, respectively, by Brigadier-generals Parsons, Scott, and George Clinton, of whom the Division commanded by Major-general Heath was then composed.[1] Indeed, notwithstanding the evident movement of the main body of the enemy, from Throgg's-neck, to the eastward, the controlling suspicion, to which we have already alluded,[2] that the real intention of General Howe was to deceive General Washington and, instead of making Pell's-neck or some other point further to the eastward the base of his operations, to effect a landing at Morrisania; to move from that point, as his base; and to take the Americans, on the Heights of Harlem, on their left flank or on their rear, induced General Washington to do little more, during that day, [Friday, October 18,] than to watch the movements of the enemy; to extend his line of detached parties, along the high grounds on the western bank of the Bronx-river, northward, as rapidly as the enemy should show an inclination to move, in force, in that direction; to continue the Head-quarters of the Army on the Heights of Harlem; and to hold the main body of that Army in constant readiness to move in whatever direction it should become necessary to confront and oppose the enemy. On Colonel Glover and on his Brigade, therefore, during that eventful Friday, rested the great responsibility—a greater responsibility than either the Colonel or his command had any knowledge of—of being the only armed force which was in front of the Royal Army, opposing the progress of the latter into the interior of Westchester-county; and of being the only force, of any kind, which, on that day, fired a shot on the advancing column of that Army—how well that opposition to the enemy's advance was directed and how entirely successful it was, in that opposition, have been already told and need not be repeated. Not until the dusk of the evening, nor then, until after Colonel Glover and his exhausted command had fallen back, three miles, in the direction of Dobbs's-ferry, did the powerful advance of the Royal Army venture to cross the little valley over which it had been cannonaded, by the Americans, during a large portion of the day;[3] and after its progress toward the mainland was thus resumed, it made no attempt to pursue the retreating Americans, contenting itself, on the contrary, with quietly moving eastward, toward New Rochelle, where it also bivouaced. and rested from the anxieties and the dangers to which it had been exposed,[4] the main body of the Army, meanwhile, lying on its arms, at the place of debarkation, during the whole of that day and the following night,[5] if, indeed, it did not do so until the twenty-first of October.[6]

The great service which Colonel Glover and his command had thus performed, and the great skill and the equally great bravery which they had displayed, in the discharge of that very important duty, were favorably noticed, officially, at that time;[7] and,

[6] We are not insensible of the fact that General Howe, in his despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-YORK, 30 November, 1776," said "the main body advanced, immediately, and laid, that night," [Friday, October 18,] "upon their arms, with the Left upon a creek "opposite to East Chester and the Right near New Rochelle;" and that Sauthier's Plan of the Operations of the King's Army confirmed the statement. But General Washington's Manuscript Plan of the Country took no notice of any such occupation of the mainland, as was thus stated, previously to the twenty-first; Captain Hall, who was in the Royal Army, made no mention whatever of any movement of that Army, during the intervening period, except of that of the advance, who encountered General Glover, (History of the Civil War in America, i., 205;) and Stedman, who is said to have been inspired by General Sir Henry Clinton, in his History of the American War, (i., 212,) was equally silent, on that subject. Colonel Harrison's letter to William Duer, "CAMP ON VALENTINE'S-HILLS, October 21, 1776"—"Since his "Excellency's letter of yesterday, nothing of importance has transpired, "unless the marching of the enemy, to-day, from Eastchester towards "New Rochelle, is considered in that light"—General George Clinton's Information relating to the Enemy, dated "October 21, 1776," in which the enemy was said to "now lay from where they first landed, extended "about one mile East of New Rochelle;" and General Washington's despatch to the Continental Congress, dated "HEAD-QUARTERS, WHITE-"PLAINS, 25 October, 1776," all clearly indicated that such a movement of the main body of the King's Army was not made on the eighteenth; and nobody has pretended that Colonel Glover confronted the entire Royal Army and held it in check, during the whole of the day, as he must have done, had that Army moved from Pell's-neck, on that day. We prefer to believe, therefore, that, although the advance and, possibly, some other detachments of that Army may have moved and occupied the country between Hutchinson's-river and New Rochelle, on the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth of October, "the main body" remained on Pell's-neck, until the twenty first, as stated, indirectly, by Hall and Stedman, confirmed by the testimony of General Washington.

Bolton, in his History of Westchester-county (original edition, i., 444; the same, second edition, i., 695,) informed his readers, that, "on the "eighteenth of October, 1776, Lord Howe, the British commander, took "post in the village" of New Rochelle; but it is very likely that "Lord "Howe," who was Admiral of the Fleet, remained on board one of the vessels-of-war—he, certainly, was not at New Rochelle, on the day of the debarkation of the Army, on Pell's-neck.

from that time until the present, with more or less minuteness and precision, they have been noticed by those, in Europe as well as in America, who have written of the events of the Campaign, in Westchester-county, in the Autumn of 1776.[1]

It is said, with some degree of probability, that, on the morning of the twentieth of October, the second day after the enemy occupied Pell's-neck, General Washington employed Colonel Rufus Putnam, an Officer and an Engineer in whom much confidence

"wanting to serve those brave Officers and men." (Extract of a letter from "CAMP AT MILE SQUARE IN EAST CHESTER," dated 23 October, 1776, in The Freeman's Journal or New-Hampshire Gazette, Vol. I., No. 25. PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 12, 1776.)

General Washington conveyed his sense of the merit of Colonel Glover and his command, in these words:

"GENERAL ORDERS.

"HEAD-QUARTERS, HARLEM HEIGHTS, October 21, 1776.

"(Parole, HEATH.) (Countersign, SULLIVAN.)

"The hurried situation of the General, for the two last days, having "prevented him from paying that attention to Colonel Glover and the "Officers and soldiers who were with him, in the skirmish, on Friday "last, that their merit and good behaviour deserved, he flatters himself "that his thanks, though delayed, will, nevertheless, be acceptable to "them, as they are offered with great sincerity and cordiality. At the "same time, he hopes that every other part of the Army will do their "duty with equal duty * and zeal, whenever called upon; and that "neither dangers, difficulties, nor hardships will discourage soldiers en "gaged in the cause of Liberty, and contending for all that freemen "hold dear and valuable."

[1] David How, in his homely Diary, under that date, [October 18,] noticed the engagement, in these words: "18. The Regulars Landed above "Frogg's point on the main Land. Our people fought Them Killed a "great many Both sides we have not The Particulars as yet." Lieutenant-colonel Tench Tilghman to William Duer, "HEAD-QUARTERS, KING'S "BRIDGE, October 20, 1776," made a passing and complimentary allusion to the affair: General Washington, through his Secretary, to the Continental Congress, "KING'S BRIDGE, October 20, 1776, half-after one o'clock, "P.M.," gave a brief and complimentary account of the skirmish; an Extract of a letter from Fort Lee, dated "October 20, 1776," and published in The Pennsylvania Journal, No. 1768, PHILADELPHIA, Wednesday, October 23, 1776, and by General Force, in his American Archives, V., ii., 1130, gave a very good and generally correct account of it; another Extract of a letter from Fort Lee, dated "October 20," and published in the same newspaper, on the following Wednesday, also gave a good, brief description; an Extract of a letter from an Officer, dated "NEAR NEW "ROCHELLE (IN THE VICINITY OF NEW-YORK) October 20, 1776," made a brief and exaggerated allusion to it; an Editorial article, in a Newport newspaper of the twenty-first of October, copied by The Freeman's Journal or New-Hampshire Gazette, Vol. I., No. 24., PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 5, 1776, and by General Force, in the American Archives, V., ii., 1174, contained a statement of the skirmish, giving the command to General Lee and making other serious errors; some Information relating to the enemy, communicated to the New-York Convention, evidently by General George Clinton, on the twenty-first of October, 1776, gave a brief description; an allusion which was made to it, with the report of a deserter as to the enemy's loss, may be seen in an Extract of a letter from Fort Lee, dated "October 22," and published in The Philadelphia Evening Post, Vol. II., No. 276, PHILADELPHIA, Saturday, October 26, 1776; with the letter, evidently written by General Glover, dated "MILE SQUARE, October 22, "1776," and published in The Freeman's Journal and New-Hampshire Gazette, Vol. I., No. 27, PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 26, 1776, and by General Force, in the American Archives, V., ii., 1188, 1189, the reader is already acquainted; an Extract of a letter from Mount Washington, dated October 23, 1776, written by an eye-witness of the engagement, and published in The Pennsylvania Journal, No. 1769, PHILADELPHIA, Wednesday, October 30, 1776, confirmed the statement that the loss was largely sustained by the German troops; and informed that deserters stated the entire loss, British and German, to have amounted to "more "than eight hundred men, killed and wounded;" a brief reference was made to the skirmish, in an Extract of a letter from East Chester, dated October 23, published in The Freeman's Journal or New-Hampshire Gazette, Vol. I, No. 24, PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 5, 1776; an excellent and very full description, evidently written by one who participated in the fight, appeared in an Extract of a letter from Camp at Mile Square in East Chester, dated 23 October, 1776, which was printed in The Freeman's Journal or New-Hampshire Gazette, Vol. I., No. 25, PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 12, 1776, whence it was re-printed by Frank Moore, in his Diary of the American Revolution, i., 326, 327; General Howe's despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-YORK, 30 November, 1776," contained the official report of the skirmish; Captain Hall, in his History of the Civil War in America, (i., 205,) made mention of it, stating, also, that the Light Infantry lost "about thirty killed and wounded," without making the slightest allusion to either the Grenadiers or the German troops; Stedman, in his History of the American War, (i., 211, 212,) described the skirmish, very briefly, stating "thirty-two were killed and wounded on "the side of the English," without alluding to that of any of the other troops; Judge Jones, in his History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 122,) made only a general reference to it, among a number of skirmishes in Westchester-county, and his Editor, de Lancey, made no mention of it; Gordon, in his History of the American Revolution, (ii., 339,) gave a singularly inaccurate description, making General Lee the commander, in person, without naming Colonel Glover, in any way; General Heath, in his Memoirs, (72, 73,) mentioned it with some particularity, but without alluding to Colonel Glover, in connection with it; Judge Marshall, in his Life of George Washington, (ii., 499,) briefly alluded to it; Ramsay, in his History of the American Revolution, (Edit. London: 1791, i., 308, 309,) gave the personal command to General Lee, without alluding to Colonel Glover; Mrs. Warren, in her Rise and Progress of the American Revolution, (i., 327,) grouped all the operations of the Armies, while en route to the White Plains, without making special mention of either; Adolphus, in his History of England, (Second edition, ii., 380,) made honorable mention of Colonel Glover and of the engagement; Sergeant Lamb, of the Royal Welsh Fusileers, in his Journal of Occurrences during the late American War, (Edit Dublin: 1809; 127,) made honorable mention of it, giving the personal command to General Lee; Paul Allen, in his History of the American Revolution, (i., 511, 512,) also gave the command to General Lee, requiring, however, the "whole force of the "British, in solid columns," to overcome the handful of Americans; Morse, in his Annals of the American Revolution, (Edit. Hartford: 1824, 262,) mentioned it, incidentally, giving the personal command to General Lee; Ramsay, in his Life of George Washington, (Sixth edition, 46,) did no more than to casually allude to the entire series of affairs, without particularly mentioning either of them; Dunlap, in his History of New York, (ii., 80,) did the same, honorably mentioning all, without selecting either, for special praise; Lossing, in his Pictorial Field-book of the Revolution, (original edition, ii., 820,) found room for no more than two lines of description of this gallant affair, which was a part of his subject: although he had devoted eight pages to Christopher Columbus and fourteen to Sir Walter Raleigh, Captain John Smith, and Pocahontas, which, certainly, had no connection with that subject, the American Revolution; and, in those two lines, he committed a singularly important error; Irving, in his Life of George Washington, (Edit. 1856, ii., 385, 386,) gave an excellent little notice of it; Bancroft, in his History of the United States, (original edition, ix., 177, and in the same, centenary edition, v., 441,) while he had been singularly profuse in what had no bearing whatever on the history of the United States, dismissed the subject in less than four lines; Dawson, in his Battles of the United States, (i., 177,) made only an incidental allusion to it, instead of appropriating a Chapter of his work to that special subject, as he should have done; Colonel Carrington, in his Battles of the American Revolution, (235,) made honorable mention of the affair; the local historian, Bolton, in his History of Westchester-county, (original edition; i., 153, and in the same work, second edition, i., 245,) probably alluded to this engagement, when in each instance, he devoted two lines and a half to the subject, in the course of which, however, in each instance, the reader was gravely informed that the Royal Army was, at that time, "under Lord Howe," the Admiral commanding the Fleet. In other parts of his work, (original edition, i., 546–548; second edition, ii., 73, 74,) he presented copies of what General Heath and two of the letter-writers had written on the subject, without a single additional word, where something of description of localities, if nothing else, would have been more than ordinarily useful. The Annual Register for 1776: History of Europe, *176; Murray, in his Impartial History of the War in America, (Edit. was justly reposed, to make a personal reconnaissance of the enemy's strength and position.[1] It is said that, in the discharge of that service, Colonel Putnam was accompanied by Adjutant-general Reed and a guard of twenty men. It is said, also, that, from the heights of Eastchester, they saw a small body of the enemy, near the Church, in that village, but could learn nothing from the inhabitants, as the houses were all deserted. The Adjutant-general is said to have left Colonel Putnam, at that place, to attend to other duties; and that the latter requested him to take back the guard, as he thought he could succeed better, in what he had to do, by himself. It is said, also, that Colonel Putnam then disguised himself, and set out for the White Plains, a place which he had never visited; nor did he know the road which led to it. Immediately afterwards, he came to a road which turned off, to the right, and which he followed, a short distance and until he came to a house, where a woman informed him that the road he was then on led to New Rochelle; that the enemy was there; and that the latter had posted a guard, at a house, then in sight. Returning to the roadway from which he had diverged, he continued his journey towards the White Plains, and had approached "within three or four miles of that place,"[2] when he saw a house, with men about it, only a short distance from him. Before he advanced, he carefully examined the men, with his field-glass; and having ascertained that the house was a Tavern and that the men were not British soldiers, he went forward; called for some oats for his horse; and, sitting quietly down, listened to the conversation of the assembled countrymen, whom he discovered to be Whigs. From these, Colonel Putnam ascertained that a large body of the Royal Army was lying near New Rochelle, which was about eleven miles distant from the White Plains, with good roads and an open, level country between the two places; and that at the Plains, was a large quantity of American Stores, guarded by only about three hundred Militia. He ascertained, also, that a detachment of the enemy was posted near Mamaroneck, only seven miles distant from the White Plains; while, on the other side, was the Hudson-river, on which were half a dozen armed vessels of the King's Fleet, within seven miles from the same place; and he understood, at once, that the principal Magazine of Provisions for the American Army, which General Washington had ordered to be brought to the White Plains, for the greater security of it, was enclosed, on three sides, by the King's forces, and was within easy striking distance from either of those three positions. Colonel Putnam waited no longer, at the Tavern, and proceeded no further, on the road towards the White Plains; but, turning his horse towards the Bronx-river, westward from Ward's Tavern,[3] where he then was, over Ward's Bridge, he hastened back to Head-quarters, "with his "all-important discoveries." It appears that Colonel Putnam and the Adjutant-general had passed over the same ground, in the morning; and the former was surprised, therefore, when he approached the high ground, westward from the Bronx-river, to see that it was occupied by armed men; but he ascertained with his field-glass that they were Americans; and when he reached the encampment, he found it was the Brigade commanded by Brigadier-general Lord Stirling, of Major-general Spencer's Division, who had been pushed forward, in advance of the main Army, during that day, to occupy that very important pass and to fortify it.[4]

After Colonel Putnam had refreshed himself and his horse at the Head-quarters of the Brigade—as Lord Stirling was a bon vivant and an extravagant liver, the weary Colonel was, undoubtedly, well-refreshed—he set out for Head-quarters, by way of Yonkers, a road on which he had not previously traveled; and as it was dark, and because the country over which he was to pass was largely inhabited by those who were unfriendly to the Americans, rendering it hazardous for him to make inquiries, his journey was peculiarly dangerous. It is said, however, that he reached Head-quarters, in safety, about nine o'clock; that he was received by General Washington, who heard his verbal Report and examined the sketch of the country which he made for the illustration of the Report and

New York: 1880, 313); although all of them made mention of the movement of the Royal Army from Throgg's neck, made no mention whatever, of this spirited and important skirmish.

Disregarding those who made no mention of Colonel Glover and his brave command, the reader will find in the character and number of those who did recognize and describe the achievements of those brave men, on that eighteenth of October, sufficient evidence of the great importance which those achievements possessed and the great influence which they secured, both in America and in Europe, both of which are our sufficient warrant for devoting both labor and space, in our presentation of them to our readers, in as complete and as accurate a form as possible.

to show the relative positions of the several bodies of the King's forces and the Magazine, at the White Plains; that the General was surprised that the Army was so greatly imperiled, "complaining, very feelingly, "of the gentlemen of New York, from whom he had "never been able to obtain a plan of the country, "and saying that it was by their advice he had or- "dered the Stores to the White Plains, as a place of "safety;" that General Greene and General George Clinton were called in, to vouch for the accuracy of the sketch; that Colonel Putnam "was charged with "a letter to Brigadier-general Lord Stirling, and "ordered immediately to his Camp, which he reach- "ed, by the same route, about two o'clock;" that, "before daylight, the Brigade was in motion, in full "march for the White Plains, where it arrived, about "nine o'clock, on the morning of the twenty-first of "October;" and that "thus was the American Army "saved by an interposition of Providence, from a "probably total destruction."

While these various movements were in progress, and while his attention to the great events which were passing immediately before him must have been close and constant, General Washington's interest in the future was not neglected. He determined, therefore, to establish a Magazine of Provisions, to the northward of the Highlands and "remote from the North River;" and the Quartermaster-general of the Army was instructed to ascertain the opinions of William Duer and Robert R. Livingston, on the subject; and, in the mean time, the former of the two, who was never absent when any opportunity for making money was presented, was ordered by the Quartermaster-general to purchase, without the slightest limitation of prices or any check whatever, as to qualities or quantities or places or times of delivery, thirty thousand bushels of Grain, one-half of it to be Corn and the other half to be Oats, one thousand tons of Hay, and five hundred tons of Rye-straw—as Robert R. Livingston was to be consulted concerning the places where all these should be delivered, it is very clear that the Quartermaster general intended that large liberty, in the expenditure of the public monies, which he had authorized, should be exercised within the Manor of Livingston, where that family and its adherents would enjoy the benefits to be derived from that questionable source, instead of expending those monies within those other portions of the State where the dominant party possessed no interest, although the former was perfectly secure from loss and the latter, very largely, were exposed to the inroads of the enemy. Instructions were also given, also without limitation, for the purchase of Horses and Oxen; and if they could not be purchased, the lucky agent was authorized to hire them, "at the most rea- "sonable rates."[1] It was for the purpose of making such opportunities as these, that the dominant faction had revolted; and in such hands as those of William Duer and the Livingstons, such opportunities never failed to be made useful, always to themselves and sometimes to the State and the Country.

There was ample reason, however, for the anxiety of General Washington, concerning Provisions for the supply of the Army, since, at the time when he ordered the establishment of a Magazine, in the upper part of Duchess-county, there were not more than fifteen hundred barrels of Flour and two hundred barrels of Pork, at Kingsbridge and on the Heights of Harlem; and there were very few live Cattle, of any kind, collected, at any place within the neighborhood of the Army. As the enemy had the control of the navigation on the Hudson-river, as well as of that on the Sound, there could not be any transportation of the much-needed supplies, by water; and the great scarcity of teams, growing more and more evident, day by day, rendered the prospect of a transportation, by land-carriage, of what would become necessary for the maintenance of the Army, exceedingly discouraging, especially since the enemy had indicated his intention to cut off the lines of communication by land, as well as those by water. The General was necessarily led, therefore, to concentrate whatever of supplies he had, at the White Plains; to request and entreat that every possible exertion should be made to have large quantities of Provisions carried to the interior parts of the country, out of the reach of the enemy, and with the utmost expedition; and to inform the Commissary-general of the Army that a failure to effect these would, he feared, he was certain, be productive of the fatal consequences attending on mutiny and plunder, adding, significantly, "indeed, the latter "will be authorized by necessity."[2]

With such testimony as this, and there is an abundance of other testimony which is even stronger in its terms, the honest historian of these events finds great difficulty in reconciling the facts with the persistent assertion that the War of the Revolution was originated by the great body of the Colonists arising, en masse, for the protection of their several properties and homes and families from outrages threatened or inflicted by a foreign tyrant; that it was conducted by that same great body of people, through agencies of its own appointment and under its control, always unselfishly and with nothing else than the common weal in view; and that the willing hands and the patriotic hearts of the entire body of the people were in accord with the patriotism of the Army which it had created, which it was sustaining with all which it possessed, and on which, alone, all its hopes for security, for happiness, for prosperity, and for peace, were rested. Surely, where mutiny and plundering were officially threatened in default of contributions, forced contributions, demanded and expected, there could not have been much sympathy between the Army and the body of the people; and, surely, in that condition of the popular feeling, the Army can scarcely be said, in truth, to have been fighting for the cause of the country, at large, but, on the contrary, as Armies have always fought, at the expense of the body of the people, of the working-bees of the hive, for the promotion, only, of the private ends and the private aims and the private interests of an individual or of a family or of a faction or of a party, neither of them a producer nor anything else than a cumbrance and a burden on those who have labored.

It will be seen, from General Washington's anxiety concerning his supplies and concerning the lines of communication between the Army and the country, and from other evidence, that he was becoming convinced that the enemy intended to take New Rochelle for the base of his proposed operations, and, from that place, by way of the White Plains, to form his command, in a line, to the Hudson-river,[1] at Tarrytown—a plan of operations, as we have already stated,[2] which was formed, after due consideration, before General Howe had left the City of New York, as will have been seen in the disposition of the Phœnix, the Roebuck, and the Tartar, off Tarrytown, to cover the objective point, the right of the proposed new line, of the Army,[3] and in the selection of Mill's-creek, or New Rochelle-harbor, as the base of his operations, the left of the proposed line,[4] and, because of that new-born conviction, as early as noon, on the twentieth of October, the entire military force, except the Regiments which were intended to garrison Fort Washington, was drawn into Westchester-county; every height and pass and advantageous ground, between New Rochelle and the Hudson-river, was occupied by an American force sufficiently strong to hold it, temporarily;[5] the Head-quarters of the Army were removed from Harlem Heights to Kingsbridge;[6] and, although there are no direct testimonies on the subject, it is very evident that, at least as early as the close of the twentieth of October, the proper dispositions for the movement of the main body of the Army—the garrison of Fort Washington and a guard at the barracks, at Fort Independence, only excepted—to the high grounds, to the northward and eastward of the White Plains, had, also, been entirely completed.

On the twentieth of October, Lieutenant-colonel Harcourt, with the greater portion of the Sixteenth Regiment of Light Dragoons—the other portion of the Regiment having embarked on a transport which had not come into port—and the whole of the Seventeenth Regiment of Light Dragoons, joined General Howe; and, on the next day, [October 21, 1776,] thus strengthened, the Right and Center of the Royal Army were moved to a position, about two miles to the northward of New Rochelle, on the road to the White Plains, Lieutenant-general Heister occupying the ground which had been thus abandoned, with one Brigade of British and two Brigades of Hessians, constituting the Left of the Army;[7] and, early in the morning of that day, the Queen's Rangers, a Corps of Loyalists commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Rogers, were detached and pushed forward, to take possession of Mamaroneck,[8] the last-named of which places was

We are not insensible that Bancroft, (History of the United States, original edition, ix. 177; centenary edition, 1876, v., 441,) said it was as early as his fifth day on Throgg's-neck, that General Howe "gave up the hope of "getting directly in Washington's rear;" and that, in consequence of that disappointment and at that time, "he resolved to strike at White "Plains." Little credit is given to General Howe and the very able Officers whom he commanded, by any one who can really suppose they would open a Campaign, or even a series of important movements, without having, previously, formed a plan, as carefully and as intelligently constructed as possible, for the general guidance of the operations of the Army; and if from nothing else, the selection of Tarrytown and New Rochelle-harbor, as the two extremes of the proposed line, while the Army was yet unknown on Throgg's-neck, might have indicated to a less experienced reader than the venerable ex-Secretary of War, that the proposed line from New Rochelle, by way of the White Plains, to Tarrytown, was vastly more, in the military operations of the Royal Army, than a sudden inspiration which sprung up to cheer the disappointed General, when, on the sixteenth of October, the latter is alleged to have given up all hope of getting in the rear of the Americans—the whole of it a finely constructed creation of the venerable historian's peculiarly lively and poetical imagination.

There is an abundance of testimony showing that General Howe's original purpose was to take Tarrytown and New Rochelle, as the extremes of his proposed lines; and, because the venerable historian did not appear to have been governed by it, preferring, rather, to pay deference to a phantom of his own creation, it must have been that he did not understand it. Whatever it may have been which inspired the historian, however, what he wrote, on the subject under notice, is not historical, although it bears the name of History.

[6] Sparks, (Writings of George Washington, iv., 152, note,) said, "Head-"quarters remained at Haerlem Heights, as appears by the Orderly Book, "till the twenty-first;" and the Orderly Book of both the twentieth and the twenty-first of October gives weight to his statement. But, because the entire military force, except the garrison of Fort Washington, had been moved into Westchester-county as early as noon, on the twentieth; because General Greene had found Head-quarters, "near King's Bridge," on the evening of the nineteenth, (Letter to the Continental Congress, "CAMP AT FORT LEE, (LATELY FORT CONSTITUTION,) October 20, 1776;") because Lieutenant-colonel Tench Tilghman, one of the General's Aids, had addressed a letter to William Duer, dated "HEAD-QUARTERS, KING'S "BRIDGE, October 20, 1776;" because Colonel Harrison, the General's Secretary, had addressed a letter to the President of the Continental Congress, dated "KING'S BRIDGE, October 20, 1776, half-after one o'clock, "P.M.;" and because General Washington, himself, had addressed a letter to Colonel Joseph Trumbull, Commissary-general of Provisions, dated, "HEAD-QUARTERS, KING'S BRIDGE, October 20, 1776," we prefer to consider the Orderly Book—which was in evident disorder, from the eighteenth until the twenty-third (only a single entry appearing in it, during that long interval)—and, necessarily, Doctor Sparks, to have been in error; and that Head-quarters were really at or very near to Kingsbridge, as early as the afternoon of the nineteenth.

shamefully abandoned by the Americans who were posted there, on the approach of the enemy; and that, "not for want of numbers, but for want of a "good Officer to lead the men." [1]

When the intelligence of the enemy's movements, on the twenty-first of October, was received at Head-quarters, which had been removed to Valentine's-hill, General Washington was absent, on a tour of inspection.[2] Evidently aroused by the information which he had received, on the preceding evening, from Colonel Putnam, he had left, early in the morning of that day, to visit the posts on the left of the American line and at the White Plains; and when the express arrived with the very important intelligence of the enemy's movements, it was immediately transmitted to him, by his Secretary, Colonel Harrison,[3] although he was evidently quite well informed of those movements, even of that towards Mamaroneck,[4] from other sources of intelligence.

While the General was at the White Plains, on that tour of inspection, [October 21, 1776,] he personally examined the Stores which had been accumulated at that place, and renewed his earnest entreaties[5] with the Commissary-general of Provisions to supply the posts in that vicinity, in time, with Flour and Beef, for present use; to form other Magazines of Provisions, "in secure places, removed from the wa- "ter, in Connecticut and at such others as were men- "tioned in my last, and circumstances may direct."[6] From the same place, the General ordered the Officer in command, at Mamaroneck, to make the best stand he could, with the troops under his command, against the enemy; and told him of his intention to order an attack on the enemy's flank [7]—how little the General thought that, at that very time, the Officer whom he was thus addressing had shown himself to be only a contemptible poltroon.[8] At the same time, he ordered Colonel Lachlan McIntosh, who was then in Connecticut, with two Regiments of Massachusetts troops, preparing to make a movement against the enemy, on Long Island, to suspend that proposed expedition, and, with Lieutenant-colonel Livingston, who was in the same State, with a considerable force, to march, immediately, towards Byram-river—that which forms the boundary between the States of New York and Connecticut, near the Sound—and to receive orders, on his arrival at the river, from Brigadier-general Lord Stirling, then at the White Plains, for the disposition of the men under his command.[9]

While the Commander-in-chief was thus employed, on the extreme left of the American line, General Howe having been equally active, during the same period, only a few miles distant,[10] the extreme right of that line, at Kingsbridge, was, also, the scene of bustle and active preparation for a movement—Orders had been issued for the movement of the Division commanded by Major-general Heath, then occupying the grounds around Kingsbridge and, thence, northward, to Valentine's-hill, to the extreme left of the proposed line, in the new position, to the northward and eastward of the White Plains, which had been selected for the immediate occupation of the Army.[11] That movement, as we have said,[12] had evidently been determined on, at least as early as during the preceding night, after the return of Colonel Putnam, and was not consequent on either the movement of the Royal Army, during the same morning, or the observations of General Washington, on his tour of inspection; but there was, evidently, some cause for the eight hours of delay, beyond the hour appointed for the movement of the Division;[13] and the extreme scarcity of Teams, for any purpose, as we have already stated,[14] which was producing great anxiety and trouble, throughout the entire Army, may have caused the delay.

The Division commanded by Major-general Heath, as we have said, (except General George Clinton, with the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Nicolls, Pawling, Graham, and Swartwout,) was ordered to move, left in front, at eight o'clock in the morning, if possible: the advance-guard was to consist of one hundred men, taken from General Scott's Brigade; and was to be followed by the heavy artillery, of which two heavy iron twelve-pounders were to be moved with that Division: the column was to follow, in platoons or by file, the six and three-pound guns to be moved between the first and second and between the third and fourth Regiments of each Brigade: each Regiment was ordered to throw out a flank-guard: and General Parsons was ordered to furnish a rear-guard of fifty men. Each of the Brigades of the Division was to have a wagon-load of Tools, which was ordered to be moved with the heavy artillery. A number of the Spears which were at Fort Independence was to be loaded on each wagon, with the Tools; and Colonel Thomas and Colonel Drake were respectively ordered to send to each of the Regiments of the Division, a Guide, who was well acquainted with the road to the White Plains and with the vicinity of that place. It was ordered, in case the Division should be attacked, while on its march, that the line should be instantly formed; with the reserves at one hundred paces distant, in the rear; with the light artillery as it was posted on the march; and with the heavy artillery posted on the nearest commanding height and covered by the Regiment commanded by Colonel Prescott. General George Clinton, with all the Regiments of his command, except the Westchester-county Regiment commanded by Colonel Thomas, was ordered to remain where he was then posted, until the afternoon, and to forward all the Stores, Provisions, etc., which would not be required for the use of the detachment which was to be left in the barracks, in Fort Independence; after which he was to move his Brigade, on the Albany road, as far as Dobbs's Ferry, where he would receive his Baggage, etc., from the boats on which they had been forwarded; and to join the Division, at the White Plains, without delay. A detachment of six hundred men, under the command of Colonel Lasher, was ordered to remain, near Kingsbridge, until further orders—two hundred and fifty of the number were to occupy the barracks of Colonel Thomas's Regiment; fifty were to be posted in Colonel Swartwout's regimental barracks; fifty were to be posted in General Scott's Brigade barracks; fifty were to occupy the regimental barracks of Colonel Prescott; fifty were to occupy the barracks of Colonel Pawling's Regiment; fifty were to be posted in the barracks of Colonel Nicoll's Regiment; and the remaining fifty were to be posted in the barracks of Colonel Graham's Regiment—and it was also ordered to mount the proper guards and pickets; and to establish alarm-posts, in the different works. The guards then posted at Morrisania were to be called in, during the evening of that day, and to follow the Division, on the following morning; and a small guard, evidently to be supplied from the detachment at Fort Independence, was to be continually posted on the high grounds, toward Morrisania, for the security of the detachment.[1] All these specific Orders, which were evidently issued much earlier than eight o'clock in the morning, were unquestionably obeyed, as far as they could be obeyed, with entire precision and promptitude; but, nevertheless, it was not until about four o'clock, in the afternoon of that October day, that the Division was enabled to move; not until eight o'clock in the evening, that it passed Headquarters, on Valentine's-hill; and, after a tedious and wearisome night-march, not until four o'clock, on the following morning—that of Tuesday, the twenty-second of October—that it reached Chatterton's-hill, the last of the line of entrenched works, near the village of the White Plains. During the same day, General Heath moved the Division to the high ground, to the northward of the little village; and, there, it evidently rested from the fatigue which was consequent on the laborious movements of the preceding thirty-six hours.[2]

It will be seen by the reader, that the Division which was thus pushed forward, to the White Plains, was in light marching order, evidently taking with it no more than the personal Baggage of the Officers and men; that it was pushed forward, with all possible expedition, if it may not properly be said to have been by a forced march; and that it was not halted on its line of march, until it had reached Chatterton's-hill. It had moved along the roadway leading to the White Plains, behind and under cover of the line of entrenched camps, stretched along the high grounds, westward from the Bronx-river, from Valentine's-hill, on the South, to the White Plains, on the North, which had, already, been thrown up and occupied,[3] and it reached the Plains and rested on the high grounds, at that place; and it was subsequently moved into the

We are not insensible of the fact that, in this instance, the greater number of those who have preceded us, in writing of that military retreat of the Americans, have maintained that those defensive works were thrown up by the retreating Army, on its march to the White Plains, instead of by detachments moved forward, for that specific purpose, before the retreat of the main body, from Kingsbridge, had been fully determined on. Among those from whom we have thus dissented, are the despatch of General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "NEW-YORK, "30 November, 1776;" Annual Register for 1776: History of Europe, *177; History of the War in America, Dublin: 1779, i., 194; [Hall's] History of the Civil War in America, i., 207; Gordon's History of the American Revolution, ii., 339; Stedman's History of the American War, i., 212; Marshall's Life of George Washington, ii., 500; Andrews's History of the War, ii., 244; Murray's Impartial History of the War in America, ii., 177; Ramsay's History of the American Revolution, i., 309; Morse's Annals of the American Revolution, 263; Sparks's Life of George Washington, 195; Irving's Life of George Washington, ii., 384, 385; Hamilton's History of the Republic, i., 130; Lossing's Pictorial Field-book of the American Revolution, ii., 821; Carrington's Battles of the American Revolution, 236, etc.; but we have preferred the testimony of Division Orders for the movement of the troops, the narrative of the movement which was written by the Major-general commanding the Division, the official Maps of the movement drawn by both the American and the Royal Engineers, and our own well-settled convictions of the improbability that the main Army had been employed in throwing up entrenchments or that its laborious retreat to the Plains was made more laborious by continuous halts for the purpose of throwing up earthworks, for any purpose. When the retreat was originally determined on, the necessity for a prompt and immediate occupation of the new-selected position was too evident to admit of any such halts, for any such purposes; and, in the great scarcity of Teams for the removal of the Stores and Baggage and Artillery, which required the men to take the places of beasts of burden, in dragging and carrying what needed to be transported, the main body of the Army needed no additional labor, nor is it in the slightest degree probable that any such additional labor was really imposed on it.

position which had been appointed for it, on the extreme left of the proposed line of the Army, its left resting on a "deep hollow, through which ran a small "brook,[1] which came from a mill-pond,[2] a little above."[3] On the eastern, or opposite side, of that "deep hol-"low," "there was a very commanding ground," from which the Division could have been enfiladed;[4] and the ground occupied by the Division, descended, gradually, from the extreme left to the right of the line.[5]

On the high ground, on the opposite side of the "deep hollow," General Heath posted the Regiment of New York troops commanded by Colonel William Malcolm, and Lieutenant Fenno of the Artillery, the latter with a field-piece, with instructions to occupy a position in the skirt of the wood which covered the upper portion of the high ground, "at the South brow "of the hill;" and there, that covering party remained, until the American Army retreated into the high grounds of Northcastle.[6]

While the Division commanded by General Heath was thus hurrying, by a forced march, towards the White Plains, during the night of the twenty-first of October, another portion of the American Army was engaged in a brilliant dash on the enemy's outpost, at Mamaroneck.

It will be remembered that, on the twenty-first of October, when the Right and Center of the main body of the Royal Army were moved forward to a position between New Rochelle and the White Plains, the Queen's Rangers, a select body of Loyalists, commanded by the celebrated partisan, Lieutenant-colonel Robert Rogers,[7] were pushed forward to Mamaroneck, which they had occupied early in the morning of that day.[8]

It will be remembered, also, that while General Washington was at the White Plains, on the twenty-first of October, he had received information of that occupation of Mamaroneck; and that he had determined to make an attack on the Queen's Rangers who were posted there.[9] In accordance with that determination and with Orders which were undoubtedly issued by General Washington,[10] General Lord Stirling, who had reached the White Plains, with his command, during the morning of that day, detached Major Green, with one hundred and fifty men from the First and Third Virginia Regiments, and Colonel John Haslet, with six hundred men from his own—the Delaware—and other Regiments, with orders to fall on the Rangers, during the coming night. The movement was made with good judgment and ability; the Rangers were entirely surprised, through the carelessness of their sentries; and, as was stated by an Officer in the Royal Army,[11] they were "very roughly "handled." In consequence of the bad conduct of the guides whom Colonel Haslet had employed,[12] however, the success was not as complete as it probably would have been, had the guides done their duty properly. As it was, Colonel Haslet and his gallant command handled the Rangers "very roughly," killing and wounding a considerable number;[13] carrying back, to the White Plains, thirty-six prisoners,[14] and

[7] The Queen's Rangers, subsequently so widely known, had been raised in Connecticut and the vicinity of New York, for the duties which their name implied; and, at the time of which we write, they were commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Robert Rogers, who had so much distinguished himself as a partisan, on the frontiers, during the War with France. They were "all Americans, and all Loyalists."—(Simcoe's Journal of the Operations of the Queen's Rangers, 18.)

These Rangers were said, by the biographer of their distinguished Commandant, of a later period, to have been "disciplined, not for parade, but "for active service. They were never to march in slow time; were directed "to fire with precision and steadiness; to wield the bayonet with force "and effect; to disperse and rally with rapidity. In short, in the in-"structions for the management of the Corps, its commander seems to "have anticipated the more modern tactics of the French Army."—(Memoir of Lieutenant colonel Simcoe,—Simcoe's Journal of the Operations of the Queen's Rangers, viii.)

[10] In Lieutenant-colonel Tilghman's letter to his father, dated "VAL-"ENTINE'S-HILL 4 MILES FROM KINGSBRIDGE 22 October 1776," it is expressly stated that "the General"—by which term he referred to General Washington, whose Aide-de-Camp he was and with whom he had been, while the Commander-in-Chief was at the White Plains—"detached "Major Green * * * to fall upon Rogers in the Night, which they "did," etc.

A list of thirty-one of those prisoners may be seen in Force's American Archives, V., ii., 1203; but the evident slaughter of the names has made that record useless to every one who is unacquainted with the names of including, among the trophies of their bravery, "a "pair of Colors, sixty stand of Arms, and a variety of "plunder,"[1] among the latter of which were "a good "many Blankets."[2] On the side of the Americans, "three or four were left, dead, and, about fifteen were "wounded, among the latter, Major Green, of the "Second Virginia Regiment, wounded in the shoul- "der, and Captain Pope, who acted as Major, and "behaved with great bravery, wounded in the leg."[3] General Lord Stirling is said to have been "so highly "pleased with the success of the expedition, that he "thanked Colonel Haslet and his command, pub- "licly, on the parade."[4]

On the twenty-second of October, General Howe strengthened his outpost, at Mamaroneck, which Colonel Haslet had so rudely assaulted, during the preceding night, by moving the Sixth Brigade of British troops, commanded by Brigadier-general Agnew, to that place;[5] and, on the same day, Lieutenant-general Knyphausen, with the Second Division of the Hessians and the Regiment of Waldeckers, numbering eight thousand men, who had arrived at New York, on the eighteenth,[6] landed on Myers-point, now known as Davenport's-neck, near New Rochelle,[7] to which place they had been taken, from the City of New York, on the flatboats of the Army.[8]

As all intercourse between the City of New York and the Army, which was so exceedingly important, depended on the King's troops and Navy being masters of the Sound, armed vessels were stationed, at short distances from each other, from Hell-gate to New Rochelle; and every possible assistance was afforded by Admiral Lord Howe, to facilitate the movements of the Army commanded by his brother. Indeed, in the words of one of the best-informed writers of the history of those operations of the King's Navy, himself an Officer of the Army and a personal witness of what he described, "a vigor "and exertion, unequalled in any former expedi- "tion, prevailed through all classes in the Navy, "extinguishing jealousies, and banishing all those "ideas of pre-eminence and rank that sometimes sub- "sist between the Fleet and the Army; and which Bancroft, in his History of the United States, (original edition, ix., 178; centenary edition, v. 442,) regarded the Rangers as only "a picket of "Rogers's Regiment of Rangers," notwithstanding General Howe had described it, definitely, as a detachment of the entire "Corps of Ran- "gers," not a portion of it, only, which had been sent forward, "to take possession of Mamaroneck;" and no one, of either Army, considered it as only a picket, or it would not have been mentioned in the despatches of both the Generals commanding nor have found a place on either of the official Maps of the Campaign.

"have too often fatally contributed to national "dishonor."[1]

During the following night, [Tuesday, October 22,] the Division of the American Army which was commanded by Major-general Sullivan reached the White Plains,[2] and, probably, occupied a position in the proposed new line of the Army, on the right of that already occupied by the Division commanded by Major-general Heath; although we have not found any information, on that subject, among the contemporary authorities.[3]

While General Sullivan and his command were thus moving towards the White Plains, a raid was made from the Regiment which occupied the entrenched Camp at Mile-Square, in which a Corporal and two Privates, with the approval of the Colonel, "went out to see what they could pick up," and succeeded in bringing in "a number of fat Cattle," without pretending, however, that they had belonged to the King's Army;[4] and, on the afternoon of the following day, [Wednesday, October 23,] the same small party went out, again, but in a different direction—"going "directly to the rear of the Hessian Camp," [near East Chester,] "they went into a house where they "washed for the Officers, and were bringing off three "tubs of Shirts, when the man of the house informed "the Camp." The marauders were, of course, compelled to retreat; but, meeting some of their comrades,—probably the party referred to in the following paragraph,—they rallied, drove back their Hessian pursuers, killed the Major who commanded the latter —from whom they took his Commission and ten guineas, in money—and a number of others, and captured three prisoners,[5] evidently securing to themselves, also, very great credit.

During the same day, [Wednesday, October 23,] Colonel Glover, commanding the Brigade of whom Brigadier-general James Clinton was the commander —the same who had distinguished themselves on the preceding Friday—sent out a party, mostly composed of men belonging to his own Regiment, to see what was to be seen and do what they could do. It is said that that Scouting-party met a body of the enemy and attacked it, killing, as has been already stated, twelve Hessians—one of them a Field-officer, on horseback—and taking three prisoners, besides the horse of the Officer who was killed; with the loss of one man, of Colonel Baldwin's Regiment, who was mortally wounded.[6]

On the same day, [Wednesday, October 23,] the Head-quarters of the Army were established "on the "Plain, near the cross-roads," at the White Plains.[7]

During the entire period succeeding the determination to move the main body of the American Army from the Heights of Harlem to the White Plains, there were the most active preparations to secure a successful retreat, throughout every portion of the Army. It is said the Mortars, some of the Cannon, a portion of General Washington's Baggage, and some of the Sick had been taken to the western side of the Hudson-river, before that determination was made;[8] on the morning of the twenty-second, the Sick who had not been sent over the Hudson-river, were sent [3] It is one of the singular portions of the history of that eventful Campaign, that the only mention which we have found, concerning General Sullivan's services, as Major-general commanding one of the great Divisions of the American Army, in Westchester-county, is that merely incidental remark, by General Heath, to which we have referred. There appears, also, in the manuscript papers of General Sullivan, which we have carefully examined, personally, next to nothing on the subject; there is nothing in the carefully-prepared Memoir of him, by his faithful biographer, Hon. Thomas C. Amory, which throws the faintest light on the subject; and Mr. Amory, whom it is our privilege to number among our oldest and dearest personal friends, is entirely unable to afford the slightest information.

In view of the fact that he was placed in command of a great Division of the Army, while older and more pretentious Major-generals were left in less important positions, it cannot be pretended that that silence was produced by any want of respect for either his military character or his military services.

In Lieutenant colonel Tench Tilghman's letter to William Duer, dated "HEAD-QUARTERS, WHITE-PLAINS, October 23, 1776," the narrative was differently told, giving the entire credit for the insignificant affair to General Lee, as was usually done, in such cases, and stating that it occurred on the evening of the twenty-second; and an Extract of a letter from Head-quarters, published, officially, by the Congress, "October 25, "1776," and copied into The Pennsylvania Journal, No. 1770, PHILADELPHIA, Wednesday, November 6, 1776, stated that the affair occurred on Wednesday, the twenty-third of October, as stated in the text; that the supporting party belonged to Colonel Hand's Regiment of Riflemen, instead of to Colonel Glover's Regiment; that the Americans buried ten of the Hessians, on the field; and that the only loss sustained by the Americans was "one lad wounded, supposed mortally." A letter from a Gentleman in the Army, dated "CAMP NEAR THE MILLS, ABOUT "THREE MILES NORTH OF THE WHITE PLAINS, November 1, 1776," published in Force's American Archives, V., iii., 473, stated that "our people "buried thirteen Hessians left dead on the field;" that "one wounded "Lieutenant was taken;" that, "although we had not one man killed "on the ground," we had "six or eight wounded, but one, it is thought, "mortally;" and that the Major's Commission was found on the ground; "but whether it belonged to any of the slain or to some Officer "who might be wounded and carried off, they could not determine."

*The structure of this letter clearly indicates that it was written by instalments—that it was commenced on the twenty-second, and received additions on the next day, on the succeeding Sunday, and after the engagement on Chatterton's-hill, which occurred on the following Monday.

This is stated in explanation of the seeming discrepancy in the date of the letter and that of the affair which is under notice.

to the White Plains, reaching that place on the following morning;[1] and the Commander-in-chief "was "almost the whole time on horseback,"[2] his Correspondence[3] and even the Orderly-books of the Army[4] clearly indicated that his personal supervision of the entire movement and of all which pertained to it was unstintingly given.

It is not now known when General Lee and his Division commenced its laborious march, towards the White Plains;[5] but it "was attended with much dif- "ficulty, for want of Wagons and Artillery-horses. "The Baggage and Artillery," it was said,[6] "were "carried or drawn off by hand. When a part was "forwarded, the other was fetched on. This was the "general way of removing the Camp-equipage and "other appendages of the Army. The few Teams "which were at hand, were no wise equal to the ser- "vice; and their deficiency could be made up only "by the bodily labor of the men." Sometimes, the toiling column was in open view of the enemy, and at no considerable distance from him; and it is not explained why he did not disturb it, which he did not, although he could have easily done so, and have captured the greater number of the Cannon, Wagons, Horses, etc., which the American Army possessed. Surely the little tree-fringed Bronx did not offer any serious obstruction: surely the entrenched Camps behind which the heavily laden column was slowly marching, and which were abandoned when the column reached them, those who had occupied them falling in and increasing the strength of the moving force, did not intimidate him: rather let it be supposed that General Howe's well-settled, well-supported policy of exposing his men, in assaults on entrenchments, only when the objects to be attained by such assaults were adequate to the loss of men, in such assaults—"not wantonly to commit His Majes- "ty's troops, where the object was inadequate," was his own description of it—controlled him, as it had done in Brooklyn, while the King's Army was on Long Island. It appears, however, that General Lee varied his duties by throwing a party of his command, over the Bronx, during the night of Wednesday, the twenty-third of October, in order to beat up the outposts of the enemy; and one of these, near Ward's Tavern, between Tuckahoe and Scarsdale, and occupied by two hundred and fifty Hessians, was successfully attacked, early in the following morning, [Thursday, October 24,] ten of the number having been killed, and two taken prisoners;[7] and it has been stated that, reciprocally, a dash was made on the rear of the slowly moving column, somewhere in the line of march, in which, among other losses, General Lee and Captain Alexander Hamilton, the latter of the New York State Artillery, lost their Baggage.[8] The column reached the White Plains, however, on Saturday, the twenty-sixth of October, with very little loss of either Stores or Troops.[9] The movement of eight thousand men, with a train of one hundred and fifty Wagons, which "filled the road for four "miles," and with Artillery,[10] under such peculiar circumstances, with such a scarcity of the means for transportation, and in the face—often, within half a

H. Harrison to the Continental Congress*, "HEAD-QUARTERS, WHITE-PLAINS, 25 October, 1776;") and did not join the main body of the Army, at the White Plains, until the twenty-sixth, (Memoirs of General Heath, 75;) possibly, not until the twenty-eighth. [8] Hon. James A. Hamilton, of Dobbs's-ferry, in a conversation with us, many years ago, told us that his father, Captain Alexander Hamilton, lost his Baggage, on the march of General Lee's command from Harlem Heights to the White Plains; and The Middlesex Journal and Evening Advertiser, No. 1209, LONDON: From Saturday, December 21, to Tuesday, December 24, 1776, contains a letter from Westchester, dated November 10, 1776, and carried to England by the Fowey, in which it was stated, "Upon landing at New-Rochelle, we found the church full of Salt.* Our "troops advanced to this place where we took General Lee's baggage."

In the same number of the same newspaper, another letter "from an "Officer in Gen. Howe's Army, in the Province of New York," dated "Nov. 11, 1776," is printed, in which it is said, "A little beyond West "Chester some of our people found a pipe of wine, directed for General "Lee, and nine puncheons of rum, which the General ordered to be "staved, lest the soldiers should get drunk."

[9] Memoirs of General Heath, 76; Stedman's History of the American War, i., 212; Marshall's Life of George Washington, ii., 502.

Colonel John Glover, in the letter from which we have learned so much of this Campaign, and who was with General Lee, stated, evidently erroneously, that the column did not reach the White Plains until ten o'clock on Monday morning, the twenty eighth of October, after having marched during the whole of the preceding night, (Colonel Glover's letter, dated "MILE-SQUARE, October 22, 1776," published in The Freeman's Journal and New-Hampshire Gazette, Volume I., Number 27, PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday, November 26, 1776;) but the Letter from a Gentleman in the Army, dated "CAMP NEAR THE MILLS, ABOUT THREE MILES NORTH OF "THE WHITE PLAINS, November 1, 1776," reprinted in Force's American Archives, V., iii., 471–474, stated that "General Lee reached the Plains, "and marched out, westward, between the main body of the Army and "the river," [that is, he occupied the right of the line, between General Sullivan's command and the Bronx-river.] "This was on the 25th and "26th of October," the author of the letter added. The official Plan of the Country from Frog's Point to Croton River and Sauthier's Plan of the Operations, etc., each stated that the column was not in motion after the twenty-seventh of October.

There is abundant evidence, within Colonel Glover's own letter, that he was in error, two days, in this particular statement.

mile and in open sight—of an active, powerful, well-supplied, and well-disciplined enemy, with very little, if with any, loss,[1] was a feat which reflected and continues to reflect, the highest honor on both the General in command and the men whom he commanded. The entire Army, except the troops who had been left on Mount Washington and at Kingsbridge—about fourteen hundred at the former, and six hundred at the latter—was, then, concentrated at the White Plains,[2] awaiting and preparing for the great events which were rapidly approaching.

The White Plains, the place which appeared to have been designated by both the great opposing powers, as if by mutual consent, for that on which the great questions then pending between Great Britain and the united States of America were to be determined by the arbitrament of Arms, the County-seat of the ancient County of Westchester, is situated on the upper extremity of a fine plain, about twenty-six miles from the City of New York. At the time of which we write, the Village was composed of a considerable number of comfortable dwellings, scattered along the sides of two or three roads which converged at that place, two Taverns, a Presbyterian Meeting-house and a Wesleyan Methodist Chapel, and the Court-house of the County, within which, probably, all the County-offices were, also, sheltered. About three quarters of a mile westward from the principal roadway of the unpretentious little Village, flowed the small stream which was, then, as it is, now, called "The Bronx-river," forming the western boundary of the plain referred to, and separating it from "The "Manor of Philipseborough;" to the Northwest and Northeast of the Village, respectively, were bold and sometimes abrupt elevations, united by less elevated ground with a gradual descent toward the Village, the whole forming the northern boundary of "the "White Plains," below; and beyond those flanking elevations and that intervening high ground, to the northward of the Village, and not more than a mile distant from the northern extremity of it, in the Town of Northcastle, was the high and rocky ground which is, now, so well known, in history, as that to which the American Army swung back, after the action on Chatterton's-hill.[3]

The site of the encampment which the American Army occupied was on the high grounds, northwestward and northeastward from the Village, and the lower grounds between them; with covering positions, on either flank. A temporary line of works had been previously constructed along the northerly line of the road which extended from the Meeting-house of the Presbyterian-church, past the house of Jacob Purdy, to the Bronx-river[4]—that road which connected the White Plains with Dobbs's-ferry; but the entrenchments which were thrown up for the defence of the Army, occupied a line from the Bronx-river, at a point which was nearly opposite to the residence of the late William Roberts, on the right; over the summit of the hill which is to the northward of the Harlem Railroad Station, then owned by 'Squire Jacob Purdy, more recently by his son, Jacob, and now by numerous owners, eastward, over properties more recently owned by the younger Jacob Purdy, Daniel Dusenberry, and Alexander C. Tompkins—those of Jacob Purdy being now owned by numerous persons; those of Daniel Dusenberry, by his children; and those of Alexander C. Tompkins, by his widow—to the Post-road, which was the principal street of the Village. Occupying the Post-road was a strong earthwork, some small remains of which, bearing an old howitzer, en barbette, may still be seen, opposite to the residence of Mrs. Tompkins, already referred to; and, eastward from that central earthwork, up the gradual slope, over properties recently owned by Leonard Miller, John Fisher, the widow of James Fisher, and Henry Willetts—those of Leonard Miller being now owned by his two sons; those of John Fisher, by numerous persons; and those of Henry Willetts, by Charles Deutermann—to what was then known as Horton's-pond, now known as "St. Mary's "Lake," of which mention has been already made.[5] The right flank of the line was covered by the Brigades commanded, respectively, by Generals McDougal and Lord Stirling;[6] and its left was covered by Bancroft, in his History of the United States, (original edition, ix., 179; the same, centenary edition, v., 443,) said "sixty or seventy barrels of "Provisions" were lost. We have heard of no other loss, except that of General Lee's Baggage and Wine.

[3] Our own knowledge of the ground, as it was, more than thirty years ago, forms the groundwork of this description; and we have been favored, further, in our work of describing the topography of that vicinity, with the assistance of our valued friend of many years, Hon. Lewis C. Platt, formerly Surrogate of the County, and with that of our not less esteemed friend, Hon. J. O. Dykman, Justice of the Supreme Court, both of whom are old residents of the Village, and perfectly familiar with the ground.

[4] Very much more importance has been recently attached to this evidently temporary line of defence than it was entitled to enjoy. It was probably thrown up by the small body of Militia who had occupied that position, as a guard of the Stores which had been accumulated at that place, while the main Army occupied the Heights of Harlem; but the subsequent occupation of the ground, which has been described in the text, by the main Army, was followed by the construction of a line of works, on the high ground, on the rear of that temporary line, the last-named of which was abandoned on Saturday, the twenty-sixth of October.*

[5] This description of the line of defences occupied by the American Army, at the White Plains, was originally prepared, more than thirty years ago, with great care, from every authority which was then known to us and from information derived from aged people who have since passed away; and the present ownership of the several properties over which the line extended has been ascertained and communicated to us by Hon. Lewis C. Platt and Hon. J. O. Dykman, to whom we have already gratefully referred.

the Brigades commanded, respectively, by Generals George Clinton, John Morin Scott, and Samuel H. Parsons, the two former having been posted near the Purchase,[1] and the latter at the head of King-street, near Rye pond.[2]

On the twenty-seventh of October, the small force which had been left in Fort Independence, when General Heath's Division was moved from near Kingsbridge to the White Plains,[3] was ordered to remove the Cannon and Stores from that post to Fort Washington; to burn the several Barracks which had been erected, there, with so much difficulty and at so great an expense; and, "with all possible dispatch," to move, by way of the Albany post-road, as far as Dobbs's-ferry, to the White Plains;[4] and, on the following day, without having removed the Cannon, three hundred stand of Small-arms, five tons of Bar-iron, and "a great quantity of Spears, Shot, Shells, "etc., too numerous to mention," which were within or near the Fort, and all of which were recklessly abandoned,[5] that small command, numbering not more than four hundred effective men,[6] joined the main body of the Division,[7] on the left of the line, at the White Plains. The enemy, who had occupied the entire lower portion of Westchester-county, since the American forces had been concentrated at the Plains, occupied the position, on the evening of the day on which Colonel Lasher had abandoned it.[8]

At the time of which we write, judging from The General Returns of the Army, dated on the third of November, the Army commanded by General Washington, in person, was composed, nominally, of about twenty-five thousand, four hundred, and fifty men, of whom about twelve thousand and fifty were sick, on independent commands, or on furlough; leaving only about thirteen thousand, four hundred, rank and file, present and fit for duty.[9] The supply of Provisions, as the reader has been already informed,[10] was exceedingly scanty;[11] the Medicine-chest was almost destitute of both instruments and drugs;[12] and Clothing was a luxury in which very few could comfortably indulge themselves.[13] The troops, as we have already stated,[14] were dispirited and, often, disaffected;

"General McDougal's Brigade, of which the Maryland Regulars is "a part, having laid in the woods for three nights," [preceding the day of the action on Chatterton's-hill, that is to say, on the nights of the twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh of October,] "two miles from this "place, and to the right of the main body, as a covering party, was or-"dered to advance along the road, about a mile, near a place called the "Mile-stone, and there take post, which was accordingly done." (Letter to a Gentleman in Annapolis, dated "WHITE-PLAINS, October 29, 1776," re-printed in Force's American Archives, V., ii., 1284.)

[1] "I am so closely confined to my post, on the left of the whole, as not "to have been a quarter mile West from this for four days past. Near "three thousand of the enemy, yesterday and the evening before, filed "off to the left, and were seen advancing towards King's street and the "Purchase road. . . . Our lines were manned all night, in con-"sequence of this; and a most horrid night it was to lay in cold "trenches. . . . I have only time to add that I am with usual "health, though in no better lodging than a soldier's tent, with our old "friend General Scott." (General George Clinton to John McKesson, "CAMP NEAR WHITE-PLAINS, October 31, 1776.")

[2] "On the same evening," [October 23,] "Col. Tyler's, Huntington's, and "Throop's Regiments, of General Parson's Brigade and of our General's "Division, moved, and took post at the head of King-street, near Rye-"pond."—(Memoirs of General Heath, 75, 76.)

[9] The General Returns of the Army, dated on the third of November, six days after the action on Chatterton's-hill, showed an aggregate of twenty-five thousand, two hundred, and seventeen, "rank and file," including the Matrosses of ten Companies of Artillery and excluding, of course, the Commissioned Officers, the Staff, and the Non-commissioned Officers of the Army. Adding to these, those who had been killed and missing during the period which had intervened between the time of which we write and the date of the Returns referred to, in which occurred the action on Chatterton's-hill and all the other military operations in the vicinity of the White Plains; and it will be seen that, when the Army occupied the high grounds, to the northward of that Village, excluding the Sick, those who were on Commands, and those who were absent, on Furloughs, the effective force was only thirteen thousand, four hundred, and four, "rank and file."

[11] "His," [General Washington's,] "apprehensions are exceedingly "great lest the Army should suffer much for want of necessary supplies "of Provisions, especially in the article of Flour. From the best in-"telligence he is able to obtain, there is not more, in Camp and at "the several places where it has been deposited, than will serve the "Army longer than four or five days, provided the utmost care and "economy were used in issuing it out; but from the waste and em-"bezzlement, for want of proper attention to it, as is reported to him, "it is not probable that it will last so long."—(Colonel Robert H. Harrison, Secretary of General Washington, to Colonel Joseph Trumbull, Commissary-general of Provisions "WHITE-PLAINS, November 1, 1776.")

The demand for Medicines is very great; and we "cannot procure a sufficiency, at any rate."—(Doctor John Morgan, Medical Director of the Army, to John Jay, "NORTH-CASTLE, October 28, "1776.")

A letter from Doctor John Pine, of the Maryland Line, to James Tilghman, of Annapolis, dated, "CAMP AT WHITE-PLAINS, November 7, "1776," contains a detailed statement of the entire destitution of the Army, and of the consequent sufferings of the sick and wounded.

[13] "The Rebel Army are in so wretched a condition, as to Clothing and "Accoutrements, that I believe no Nation ever saw such a set of tatterde-"malions. There are few Coats among them but what are out at "elbows; and in a whole Regiment there is scarce a pair of Breeches. "Judge, then, how they must be pinched by a Winter Campaign."—(Letter from an Officer of the Sixty-fourth Regiment to his friend in London, "NEW-YORK, October 30, 1776," re-printed in Force's American Archives, V., ii., 1293, 1294.)

the term of service of very many of them had nearly expired;[1] and, very largely, that short term was made very much shorter by shameful desertions.[2] There was no harmony of sentiment, no common feeling of patriotism, no sympathy with each other as fellow-countrymen engaged in a common cause, in any portion of the Army. The Eastern troops were stigmatized as, generally, nothing else than a mass of speculating poltroons, for which, very often, there was abundant reason;[3] and they, reciprocated the ill-feeling of those from the Middle and Southern States, by branding them as "Aristocrats" and "Maccaronis"—the former of the two sobriquets in allusion to the distinctions of rank which were maintained among those troops, so different from the practice of the New Englanders; the latter, in contemptuous reference to the Regiments, from the Middle and Southern States, who were uniformed, well-equipped, and properly disciplined[4]—adding fuel to the flame of discord, which, on more than one occasion, required all the good judgment and determination of which the Commander-in-chief was master, to prevent a serious outbreak.[5]

It will be remembered that, on Monday, the twenty-first of October, the Right and Centre of the Royal Army were moved to a position, on the road leading to the White Plains, about two miles to the northward of New Rochelle; and that Lieutenant-general Heister, with the Left of the Army, consisting of one Brigade of British and two Brigades of Hessian troops, moved forward and occupied the position which had been thus abandoned.[6] It will be remembered, also, that, on the same day, Lieutenant-colonel Rogers, with the Corps of Loyalists known as "The Queen's "Rangers," was detached from the main body of the Army, and pushed forward to take possession of Mamaroneck,[7] where, on the following night, he and his command "were roughly handled," by a party of Americans who had been despatched from the White Plains, for that purpose;[8] which led General Howe, on the following day, [Tuesday, October 22,] to move the Sixth Brigade of British troops, commanded by Brigadier-general Agnew, to sustain that important post.[9] It will be remembered, also, that, on Sunday, the twentieth of October, the Royal Army was strengthened by the addition of a portion of the Sixteenth and the whole of the Seventeenth Regiments of Light Dragoons, the former commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Harcourt, an Officer of great merit;[10] and that, on Tuesday, the twenty-second of October, it was further strengthened by the arrival, at New Rochelle, of Lieutenant-general Knyphausen, with the Second Division of Hessians and the Regiment of Waldeckers.[11]

Taking counsel of his experience, General Howe ordered Lieutenant-general Heister, with the Left of the Army, to join in the movement; and, on Thursday, the twenty-fourth, and on Friday, the twenty-fifth, of October, the main body of the Royal Army was moved from the positions on which it had rested, for several days, towards Scarsdale.[12] It moved in two

[1] Many of the troops were enlisted to serve only until the first of December; and the terms of service of the greater portion of the remainder would expire on the last day of December, ensuing.—(General Washington to the President of the Congress, "HEAD-QUARTERS, AT COLONEL "MORRIS'S HOUSE, 18 September, 1776;" etc.)

[3] The following is a specimen of a multitude of such testimonials of the speculative propensities of the New England troops, in the Army of the Revolution, and of their too frequent dishonesty in their operations, which are accessible to every one. Every careful student can command many such evidences; but this, written by the Commissary-general of Provisions of the Continental Army, himself a Connecticut-man, to his father, Jonathan Trumbull, who was, then, the Governor of Connecticut, will be sufficient, for the purposes under consideration.

"NORTH-CASTLE, 4th December, 1776.

"HONOURED SIR:

"Enclosed I send you Returns of some of the Regiments of Con-"necticut Militia under command of Major General Wooster, such as "I can get; though I have called and called again and again for them, "I believe there are but one of them really true, that is Major Brins-"made's, who seems to be the honestest man. The fact is, they can't "make their Weekly and Provision Returns agree; for this reason, "they have made a number of Brevet Officers. They doubt whether "these Officers will be allowed extra rations: to avoid that, they re-"turn so many more men as to cover the extra rations of those Offi-"cers. You'll see by adverting to the Returns, that some Companies "have more Officers than Privates, at best; but not content with that, "and instead of sending home the Officers who have very few men, "almost none, and turning over those few men into other Companies, "they add Brevet Officers, not only to pick the pockets of the pub-"lick, here, but, also, those Brevet Officers are to be dismissed from "the Militia Rolls, at home; and, in a few times more being called "forth, there will be no Militia left in the State.

"These things I thought it my duty to report to you, as the char-"acter of the State is at stake; and how the Officers who have done "these things will get along, here, I don't know, as we now make "Weekly Ration Returns as well as Returns of the Army, by which "they must be discovered. The consequence is bad to the Officers; how-"ever, they must take their fate.

"I am sorry to have the character of the State suffer by such conduct "of its Officers.

We have seen no evidence that either General Wooster or Commissary-general Trumbull took any steps for either the arrest of the offenders or a suppression of the offences.

[12] Information was received, at the White Plains, as early as two o'clock on Thursday afternoon, [October 24,] that the Royal Army had struck its tents, on its position near New Rochelle, "early this morning;" and that it was, then, "advancing from that to this place, along the common "road."—(General George Clinton to John McKesson, Secretary to the New-York Convention, "WHITE-PLAINS, October 24, 2 P. M., 1776.") columns, with great caution ;[1] and, on the twenty-fifth of October, when the heads of the columns reached Scarsdale, after their two days' march, they were halted; and the Army encamped in a line which was parallel with the Bronx-river and with the line of march, on the opposite side of that little stream, on which General Lee, with his heavily laden column, was transporting the Baggage and Stores of the American Army, to the White Plains[2]—in many places, the two were not more than a mile distant from each other ; and, in one place, if not in others, the toiling Americans were directly within sight of their powerful enemy.

The object of General Howe, in halting at Scarsdale, with his Right within four miles of the American lines, at the White Plains, and of remaining encamped at that place, without making a movement, of any kind, during nearly three days, was not understood by those, in Europe, who were inclined to condemn his conduct, as Commander-in-chief of the Army, before the Parliament and the country ; and the evidently studied silence, on that subject, which the General maintained, was not calculated to quiet, nor even to lessen, the fault-findings of those who were his political and personal enemies. But, whatever may have been thought and said of his failure to cross the Bronx and to attack the heavily laden column commanded by General Lee, the maxims of military science, at that time, forbade a movement towards the White Plains, then, leaving his left flank and his rear exposed to the three Divisions commanded, respectively, by Generals Lee, Spencer, and Lincoln.[3] There was a possibility that the separation of those three Divisions from the main body of the Army might have enabled him to attack the Americans, en detail, and to overcome them more completely than if they had been in one body ; but he had excellent evidence of the vigilance and the enterprise of those who were nearest to him ; and his ruling principle, to avoid an unnecessary exposure of his men evidently led him to the safe conclusion that, in such a series of undertakings on the divided forces of the Americans, if more than one attack on them were to be made, the last one of the series should be that on that portion of the American Army which, then, occupied the entrenched Camp, at the White Plains, a conclusion in which he would have been entirely sustained by every intelligent soldier, of that period, in Europe or in America.

Notwithstanding the silence of General Howe, concerning his purpose in moving his command to Scarsdale, instead of to the White Plains, there is reason for supposing that it was done for the purpose of cutting off the column commanded by General Lee, before it could join the main body ; that preparations for the movement, on the following morning, were made on the afternoon and evening of the day of the arrival of the Royal Army, at Scarsdale; and that it was prevented by the withdrawal of the column which it was intended to attack, from its designated route, into a road which was further westward, so that, when the time came for the attack, General Lee, by a forced march, during the night, was several miles nearer to the main body of the Army, and entirely beyond the reach of General Howe.[4]

In his letter to the President of the Congress, dated "HEAD-QUARTERS, "WHITE-PLAINS, 25 October, 1776," Colonel Robert H. Harrison, General Washington's Secretary, stated that "about two o'clock this afternoon, "intelligence was brought to Head-quarters, that three or four detach- "ments of the enemy were on their march, and had advanced within "about four miles of this place. It has been fully confirmed, since, by "a variety of persons, who have been out to reconnoitre."

If General Clinton did not make a mistake in the date of his letter, of which we have no evidence, the movement of the Royal Army was commenced on Thursday, [October 24 ;] and the letter of Colonel Harrison clearly indicated that it had already reached Scarsdale, within four miles of the Plains, before the movement was known at Head-quarters, at two o'clock in the afternoon of the following day, [Friday, October 25.]

The failure of General Washington to obtain information of the movements of the King's troops, of which so many instances have been seen, was nowhere more evident than in the instance now under consideration– one of the reasonable results of the outrages to which the inhabitants had been subjected, by both the Congresses and the Committees, on the one hand, and by the unrestrained thieves, among both the Officers and the Privates of the Army whom General Washington commanded, on the other.

[1] "General Howe thought it necessary to proceed with great circum- "spection. The progress was slow ; the march of the Army, close ; the "encampments, compact and well-guarded with artillery ; and the most "soldier-like caution used, in every respect."—(Annual Register for 1776 : History of Europe, 177.)

"The British continued moving up, but with great caution, their rear "scarcely advancing, when they came to encamp again, much further "than where the advance had moved from."—(Memoirs of Major-general Heath, 76.)

"The caution of the English General was increased by the evidences "of enterprise in his adversary. His object seems to have been to avoid "skirmishing, and to bring on a general action, if that could be effected "under favorable circumstances ; if not, he knew well the approaching "dissolution of the American Army, and calculated, not without reason, "to derive from that event nearly all the advantages of a victory. He "proceeded, therefore, slowly. His marches were in close order ; his "encampments compact, and well guarded with artillery ; and the ut- "most circumspection was used, not to expose any part which might be "vulnerable."—(Marshall's Life of George Washington, ii., 501.)

[2] General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "NEW-YORK, 30 November, "1776 ;" Sauthier's Plan of the Operations, etc.; Gordon's History of the American Revolution, ii., 340 ; etc.

[3] Other instances of that peculiar caution were seen, at the White Plains, three days after the instance now under notice, when the main body of the Army was halted, until the Americans had been driven from Chatterton's-hill, and, most disastrously to the Americans, in the following year, when the fruits of the victory, at Germantown, were lost by the halt of the main body, in order to dislodge a handful of the Royal Army who had occupied and who held the Chew mansion.

[4] In a letter which was written by an Officer of the Royal Army, dated on the tenth of November, and printed in The Middlesex Journal and Evening Advertiser, No. 1209, LONDON : From Saturday, December 21, to Tuesday, December 24, 1776, will be found our authority for what we have said of the purposes of General Howe, of his preparations for carrying out those purposes, and of the cause of his disappointment ; and a reference to the letter of Colonel Glover, with which our readers are already familiar, ("MILE-SQUARE, October 22, 1776,") there is an ample confirmation of each of the statements—the Colonel erroneously stated that the Royal Army was moved from New Rochelle, on Sunday, the twenty-seventh of October, instead of on Friday, the twenty-fifth of that month, and so continued to be two days too late, in each of his subsequent statements ; but, in all else, his statements of the movement of General Howe ; of the discovery, by General Lee, of the purpose to cut him off from the main body of the Army ; of the consequent detour of the column, into the Dobbs's-ferry road ; of its forced night-march ; and of

At length, all the necessary preparations having been completed, early in the morning of Monday, the twenty-eighth of October, the Royal Army struck its tents, in the encampment, at Scarsdale, which it had occupied since the preceding Friday; and, in two columns, right in front, it moved towards the White Plains.[1] The right column, which was composed mostly of British troops, was commanded by Lieutenant-general Sir Henry Clinton;[2] the left column, with whom was General Howe,[3] was composed mostly of German troops, and was commanded by Lieutenant-general Heister.[4]

The American pickets were driven in, by the Light Infantry, of the right column, and by the Chasseurs, of the left column;[5] and when the moving columns reached Hart's-corners—now known by the name of Hartsdale—they encountered a body of New England troops, composed of a "part of General Wadsworth's "Brigade, with some other Regiments,"[6] the whole under the command of Major-general Spencer,[7] and numbering not far from twenty-six hundred Officers and effective men,[8] whom General Washington had sent out, to hold the enemy in check. These were posted, advantageously, "on the old York road," it is said;[9] and it is also said that when the left column of the Royal Army "had advanced within musket-shot "of our troops, a full discharge of musketry warned "them of their danger. At first, they," [the Hessians,] "fell back; but, rallying again, immediately, and the" [right] "column of British troops having advanced "upon our" [General Spencer's] "left, it became nec-"essary" [for him] "to retire;"[10] taking the opportunity, "occasionally," to form behind the stone walls, on the line of his retreat, and to annoy those who pursued him[11]—it has been said, however, that the flight of that large detachment was hastened by the appearance, on its front, of the British Light Dragoons;[12] and that the retreat was not such an one as reflected credit on its discipline, as soldiers, or on its bravery, as men.[13] A large portion, if not the whole, of the detachment, terror-stricken and without any appearance of order, sought "the ford"—a shallow portion of the Bronx-river, apparently a short distance below the present railroad-bridge, between Hartsdale and the White Plains—closely pursued by Colonel Rall, with the Brigade, composed of the Regiments of Lossberg, Knyphausen, and Rall, whom he commanded;[14] and, having passed the little stream, the cowardly fugitives found refuge in the neighboring its arrival at the White Plains, at ten o'clock on the following morning, were in entire harmony with what was stated by the British Officer, through The Middlesex Journal.

We have learned from the Returns of the Killed, Wounded, and Missing, on that day, of Regiments who are known to have taken no part whatever in the subsequent action on Chatterton's-hill, of what Regiments that force who met the King's troops, near Hart's-corners, was composed: it contained the Regiments commanded by Colonels Silliman, Selden, Sage, and Douglass—the latter commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Arnold—all of them of the Brigade commanded by General Wadsworth; the Regiment commanded by Colonel Chester, of the Brigade commanded by Colonel Sargent; the Regiments commanded by Colonels Baldwin, Douglass, and Lieutenant-colonel Ely, of the Brigade commanded by General Saltonstall; and the Regiments commanded by Colonels Holman and Smith, of the Brigade commanded by General Fellows. All these made Returns of Casualties sustained by them, on that occasion: how many other Regiments there were, whose bashfulness forbade the making of any Returns, we have not ascertained.

[7] Letter from a Gentleman in the Army, "CAMP NEAR THE MILLS, ABOUT "THREE MILES NORTH OF WHITE-PLAINS, November 1, 1776;" Memoir of Colonel Benjamin Tallmadge, prepared by himself, at the request of his children, 13; etc.

[8] We are not insensible of the fact that "a Gentleman in the Army," from whose letter, dated "CAMP NEAR THE MILLS, ABOUT THREE MILES "NORTH OF WHITE-PLAINS, November 1, 1776," we have already made extracts, stated that the command of General Spencer, on the occasion under notice, "consisted, in the whole of five or six hundred men;" but, on the third of November, five days after the engagement, the same Regiments reported an aggregate strength of four thousand, seven hundred, and ninety-six, of whom five hundred and sixty Officers, non-commissioned Officers, and Musicians, and two thousand and seventy-six Privates "fit for duty," were present. (General Return of the Army in the service of the United States, November 3, 1776.) We have determined, therefore, that the effective strength of the Regiments, on the occasion under notice, before they were met by the enemy, was not far from twenty-six hundred men, as we have said in the text.

Lieutenant-colonel Tench Tilghman, one of the Aides of General Washington, in a letter to his father, dated "WHITE-PLAINS, 31st Octo-"ber, 1776," said, "On Monday morning we rec[d] Information that the "Enemy were in Motion and in March towards our Lines, all our Men "were immediately at their Alarm Posts and about 2000 detached to give "the Enemy as much annoyance as possible on their approach;" and Brigade-major Tallmadge, of the Brigade commanded by General Wadsworth, himself present and a participant in the affair, stated, (Memoir of Colonel Benjamin Tallmadge, prepared by himself, 13,) that it was "a detachment of 2000 or 3000 men;" both of which statements, from those who were entirely competent to make them with accuracy, go far to confirm what we have more definitely stated in the text.

[13] Brigade-major Tallmadge's description of the retreat, leaves no room for questioning the accuracy of our statement, in the text.

[14] It was that Brigade, commanded by the same Colonel, Rall, who was captured at Trenton, in the following December; and we have ascertained the Regiments of whom it was composed, from the despatch of General Howe to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-YORK, December "29, 1776," announcing that disaster to the Royal Army, to the Home Government.

In the despatch of General Washington to the Congress, dated "HEAD-"QUARTERS, NEWTOWN, 27th December, 1776," the Regiment of Lossberg is called the Regiment of Landspatch. We have preferred to follow General Howe, as our authority, in this instance.

hills of Greenburgh,[1] and were reported among the "Missing," which, in that Army, too often, afforded a resting-place for the name and the fame of a coward and poltroon.[2] In the instances now under consideration, many of these bashful New Englanders purged themselves of some portion of the reproach produced by their cowardice, by returning, as they found opportunities, in small parties,to the Camp, at the White Plains,[3] exemplifying the truth of the old couplet:

"He who fights and runs away,
"Will live to fight, another day;"

while their Hessian pursuers, probably checked in their further progress by their discovery of the troops on Chatterton's-hill, of whom the reader will learn more, hereafter, occupied a position on the high ground, westward from the Harlem Railroad, between Chatterton's-hill and the present railroad-station, at Hartsdale.[4]

An amusing incident connected with that disgraceful retreat of General Spencer's command, was related by Major Benjamin Tallmadge, then Brigade-major of General Wadsworth's Brigade and, himself, one of the fugitives—subsequently better known in connection with the detention of Major André. After having described the retreat of the detachment of Americans and the pursuit by the Brigade of Hessians, the rush of the former for the ford and the anxiety of the fugitives to pass the river, he said, "They," [the Americans,] "immediately entered the river and ascended "the hill; while I, being in the rear and mounted on "horseback, endeavored to hasten the last of our "troops, the Hessians being then within musket-"shot. When I reached the bank of the river, and "was about to enter it, our Chaplain, the Rev. Dr. "Trumbull, sprang up, behind me, on my horse, with "such force as to carry me, with my accoutrements, "together with himself, headlong into the river. This "so disconcerted me, that, by the time I reached the "opposite bank of the river, the Hessian troops were "about to enter it, and considered me their prisoner," in which, however, they reckoned without their host, since he watched for an opportunity, and escaped, by way of what have been more recently known as "the Mill-lane" and the road to Dobbs's-ferry, conveying to General Washington, at Head-quarters, information of the situation of the troops, on the opposite bank of the river.[5]

On the left of the line of march of the Royal Army and on the western bank of the Bronx-river, which flowed through a marshy valley of some extent, at its base, arose the bold and rocky height which was known, then, and is still known, as "Chatterton's-hill." It is one of the range of high grounds, on the western side of the Bronx, on which the line of entrenched encampments had been thrown up by detachments from the American Army, the latter then occupying the Heights of Harlem, for the purpose of preventing the enemy from crossing the Bronx and closing the line of communication between the Army and the country—the same line of defensive works, indeed, which subsequently covered the retreat of the Army, from Harlem Heights to the White Plains—and it extended, northwardly, to within a short distance from the American lines—the latter on the opposite side of the little stream and of the marshy intervale—and really, to some extent, it commanded the right and centre of them.[6] It had been occupied, and an earthwork of small pretensions had been thrown up, on it, probably by the Regiment of Massachusetts Militia, commanded by Colonel John Brooks, then of General Lincoln's Division and subsequently Governor of Massachusetts;[7] and, on the morning of Monday, the [1] Indeed, they were among those hills as soon as they had passed the Bronx, at the ford; and, there, they found safety, for a few days, as we shall see, hereafter.

Irving facetiously remarked, (Life of George Washington, ii., 393,) they "scattered themselves among the hills, but afterwards returned to "Head-quarters."

[2] It is amusing to see Connecticut-men claim that these poltroons were those who fought the Battle and defended Chatterton's hill, without alluding to any other troops, unless without giving them credit for having done anything worthy of notice. [6] Our personal knowledge of the ground is our authority for this description of it.

Stedman, in his History of the American War, (i., 214,) attempted to qualify that fact—"it rose so gradually from the Bronx," he said, "that "its crest was not within random cannon-shot, as was proved by many "of our Battalions lying upon it, on their arms, the whole evening after "the action;"—but, nevertheless, those who know the entire ground, composing Chatterton's-hill and its dependencies, will fully sustain us, in what we have said, in the text, on that subject.

[7] Because a portion of General Lincoln's Division, with all of that of General Spencer, had been detached from the main body of the Army, and sent forward, with orders to occupy all the high grounds, between Valentine's-hill and the White Plains, and to strengthen them with entrenchments; and because the Regiment commanded by Colonel Brooks formed a portion of one of the Divisions who were thus detailed to occupy and to strengthen those high grounds; and because we have not found the slightest allusion to the Regiment commanded by Colonel Brooks, in any of the descriptions of the movements of troops, at any time previous to the attack on Chatterton's-hill, by the Royal troops; and because we cannot find any Order, from Head-quarters, for any other occupation of Chatterton's-hill, until the morning of the twenty-eighth of October, when Colonel Haslet, with his well-tried command, was ordered by General Washington "to take possession of the hill beyond our lines "and the command of the Militia Regiment there posted," (Colonel Haslet to General Rodney, "November 12, 1776,") when a Regiment of Militia, whose subsequent conduct clearly identified it as that commanded by Colonel Brooks, was found in possession of the ground—all these reasons lead us to the conclusion stated in the text.

We are not insensible that words employed by Colonel Harrison, in his letter to the President of the Congress, dated "WHITE-PLAINS, 29 "October, 1776," have been construed to mean that troops had been sent down, on the morning of the twenty-eighth of October, "with a view of "throwing up some lines," on Chatterton's-hill; and that the biographer of Colonel Rufus Putnam, (Memoir of Colonel Rufus Putnam, in Hildreth's Biographical and Historical Memoirs of the Early Settlers of Ohio, twenty-eighth of October, General Washington ordered Colonel Haslet, with his Regiment of Delaware troops, and General McDougal, with his Brigade, the latter composed of the Regiment of New York troops whom he had formerly commanded, the Regiment of the same Line who was commanded by Colonel Ritzema, the Regiment of Maryland troops whom Colonel Smallwood commanded, and the Regiment of Connecticut troops commanded by Colonel Charles Webb, to occupy the same position.[1]

It appears that Colonel Haslet's command was the first of the reinforcements to reach the hill;[2] and it is very probable that it was either that Regiment or that commanded by Colonel Brooks or both, together, on the summit of the high ground, on his right, which led Colonel Rall to check his Hessian Regiments, in their pursuit of the fugitive New Englanders, and to occupy the position on the high ground, nearer to Hartsdale, to which reference has been made, whence he could move, if such a movement should become expedient, on the right flank and rear of whatever force of the Americans should occupy Chatterton's-hill—a movement, by the way, since it was evidently made by Colonel Rall, on his own impulse, which reflected great credit on the military abilities of that subsequently unfortunate Officer.[3]

While Colonel Rall was thus engaged, on the left of the enemy's line of march, the two columns continued their movements toward the American lines, "as if they meant to attack us, there," as General Washington's Secretary subsequently described the movement[4]—indeed, General Howe subsequently stated that "an assault upon the enemy's "right, which was opposed to the Hessian troops, "was intended."[5] The Army was formed, evidently, for a general movement on the right and center of the American lines, with its right resting on the road which led from the White Plains to Mamaroneck, about a mile from the center of the former, and its Left on the Bronx-river, about the same distance from the extreme right of the American entrenchments;[6] and what appeared to have been the decisive hour in which the future of America was to be determined, by the arbitrament of arms, had, at length, been reached. But the bright designs of God, concerning America, were widely different from those of men; the future of those thirteen new-born members of the community of nations, in His purposes, was not dependent on the result of an assault on the improvised lines of defense, on the high grounds, in the vicinity of the White Plains; and the powerful arm which was already uplifted and ready to strike a crushing blow on that which God had predestinated for other ends, was restrained by an unseen power, a power before which the King of Great Britain and all his Armies were as nothing, by the same power which had restrained the same arm, uplifted, at Gravesend and before Brooklyn, at Kip's-bay and on Throgg's-neck—the handful of American troops, on the summit of Chatterton's-hill, a phantom which seemed to augur ill for the left flank and rear of the Royal Army, was seen by General Howe; the further advance of the main body, toward the American lines, was stayed: the uplifted arm fell, without having struck the blow which was intended; the right and center of the American line remained, unharmed; and another opportunity for the determination of the great dispute, between Great Britain and America, was lost, never to be be regained.

64,) has stated that, on that morning, that Engineer had been ordered to that hill, to superintend the construction of some more important entrenchments. But there is nothing inconsistent with either of these statements, if not distorted, in what we have written concerning the probable pre-occupation of Chatterton's-hill, by the Regiment of Massachusetts Militia commanded by Colonel John Brooks.

It is very evident that whatever defensive works there may have been on the hill, at the time of the engagement, if there were any, they afforded no shelter for the men.—(Lieutenant-colonel Tilghman to William Duer, "HEAD-QUARTERS, WHITE-PLAINS, October 29, 1776.")

As the Delaware Regiment commanded by Colonel Haslet, was of the Brigade commanded by General Lord Stirling, and was ordered by General Washington "to take possession of the hill and the command of "the Militia Regiment there posted; which was done," of which there has been no question; and since the Brigade which was commanded by General McDougal subsequently moved up the same hill, which no one has ever pretended to deny, it is not evident why Colonel Carrington, (Battles of the American Revolution, 240,) without the slightest authority to sustain him, made a special attempt to belittle Colonel Haslet, individually, and as an Officer—he could not belittle his doings nor those of his command, on that field—because, in his Report of the action, to General Rodney—the only Report from an actual participant in the affair, which has come down to us—he described, in detail, his own and his gallant Regiment's portions of the doings on that historically important occasion.

[3] "Colonel Rall . . . took possession of it, with great alacrity, to "the approbation of Lieutenant-general Heister, who was acquainted with "this movement by Sir William Erskine," the Quartermaster-general of the British Army.—(General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "NEW-YORK, "30 November, 1776.")

It will be seen, from that paragraph, that the action of Colonel Rall, in thus occupying a position on the right flank of the Americans who were occupying Chatterton's-hill, received the favorable notices of both the British and the German Generals, commanding: we shall see, hereafter, how important that action was, in the subsequent engagement.

Stedman stated, (History of the American War, i., 214,) that "the "Right wing of the British did not extend beyond the center of the "American Army," which is in harmony with what General Howe had stated concerning the distance of his Right from the American lines—he referred to the center, without having made the slightest allusion to the left, where General Heath was posted. Stedman continued: "That "part of the enemy's position," [the American center,] "did not seem to "be considered: all the attention of the British Commander being fixed "on another part of the field"—as we have already seen, "an assault "upon the American right, which was opposed to the Hessian troops, "was intended;" and the British troops were to have been spared, for other services, elsewhere.

The force, on the summit of Chatterton's-hill, which had thus, insensibly, arrested the progress of the Royal Army, in its movement against the Right and Center of the American lines, was, of course, that of whom we have already made mention—the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Brooks and Haslet, the Brigade commanded by General McDougal not having reached the hill; and against that small force, the Hessian Artillery, from the Plain, on the opposite side of the Bronx, not far from the present railroad-station, at the White Plains, opened a vigorous fire,[1] with no other effect, however, than the wounding of one of the Militia, which so greatly alarmed his comrades that the entire Regiment "broke, and fled, and were not rallied, without much "difficulty."[2] Soon after the cannonade was commenced, General McDougal and his command reached the hill-top; and the command of the entire force devolved on and was assumed by that very inexperienced Officer. After several changes, in the positions of the several Regiments, the line was formed, with the Regiment of Massachusetts Militia, commanded by Colonel Brooks, sheltered by a stone wall, and supported by the Regiment of Marylanders commanded by Colonel Smallwood—the latter, the remains of that fine body of "Maccaronies," so called by the New Englanders, whose gallant conduct, at the Battle of Long Island, had won the admiration and sorrow of General Washington, and which has been generally honored in history—on the extreme right, confronting Colonel Rall and his Brigade, who were resting on their arms, on the summit of the adjacent hill, further to the southward. On the left of the Marylanders, was posted the Delaware Regiment, proud of its name of "The Blue Hen's Chickens," whom Colonel Haslet commanded: the remainder of General McDougal's Brigade, composed of the First Regiment of the New York Line, formerly commanded by Colonel McDougal, at that time, by one of its Captains, whose name was not recorded; the Third Regiment of the same Line, commanded by Colonel Rudolphus Ritzema; and the Regiment of the Connecticut Line, commanded by Colonel Charles Webb, occupying the left of the very feeble line[3]—with the exception of the Regiment commanded by Colonel Brooks, no portion of that force was composed of Militia: all, except that Regiment, were Continental troops.[4] The Company of New-York Artillery, with two small field-pieces, commanded by Captain Alexander Hamilton and forming a portion of the Brigade commanded by General McDougal, was, also, present; but history has not recorded the name of the Officer who, then, commanded it.[5]

The cannonade of the little party, on Chatterton's-hill, was continued by the Hessian Artillerists, without cessation, while the General Officers, it is said,[6] assembled in Council, without having dismounted; and it is probable that the noisy demonstration, so very characteristic of Germans, in their use of gunpowder, was continued, with unabated ardor, until the movement of their companions in arms, up the steep and rugged hill-side, of which the reader will learn more, hereafter, obliged the gunners to suspend their operations.[7]

"Upon viewing the situation," in deference to the [4] Colonel Carrington, (Battles of the American Revolution, 240,) was at some pains to introduce Colonel Morris Graham, of the New York Militia, and to place his name where it would appear among those of Colonels commanding Regiments who had occupied and defended Chatterton's-hill; but no other writer than he has thus honored Colonel Graham, himself unworthy of any such authorial favor; and, besides, Colonel Carrington could have easily ascertained that Colonel Graham's command was a portion of the Brigade commanded by General George Clinton, who was posted on the extreme left of the American line, not far from two miles from Chatterton's-hill.

No one has pretended that the Adjutant-general of the Army was on Chatterton's-hill, on that eventful Monday; but he must have been there, if Colonel Carrington is correct, since it was he who accused Colonel Graham of cowardice, on which Colonel Carrington has based his favor to the bashful New-Yorker.

[5] It is a notable fact that, notwithstanding all which has been written, in these latter days, of the great services of that Company, of which contemporary writers were entirely silent, the name of the Officer who was in actual command, on Chatterton's-hill, was not mentioned by any one, of that period, who wrote concerning the Battle.

There is a tradition that, a short time before the date under consideration, Captain Hamilton was in the City of New-York, then in possession of the King's Army; and there is, certainly, written evidence, over his own signature, that he was in the same City, on the sixth of November, eight days after the Battle: it is possible, therefore, that, because the command was not in the official commander, on the occasion under consideration, the name of the actual commander was not regarded as worthy of being recorded.

[6] "I saw their General Officers, on horseback, assemble in Council." —(Colonel Haslet to General Cæsar Rodney, "November 12, 1776.")

[7] There is, evidently, considerable exaggeration in what was written of that cannonade, by "a Gentleman in the Army," in his letter, already resorted to, dated "CAMP NEAR THE MILLS, ABOUT THREE MILES NORTH "OF THE WHITE PLAINS, November 1, 1776;" but we make room for it. "The scene was grand and solemn; all the adjacent hills smoked, as "though on fire, and bellowed and trembled with a perpetual cannonade "and fire of field-pieces, howitz, and mortars. The air groaned "with streams of cannon and musket-shot; the air and hills smoked and "echoed, terribly, with the bursting of shells; the fences and walls were "knocked down, and torn to pieces; and men's legs, arms, and bodies "mingled with cannon and grape-shot, all round us. I was in the ac-"tion, and under as good advantages as any one man, to observe all that "passed, and write these particulars of the action from my own observa-"tion."

A very near connection, by marriage, of our own family, then living where what was, lately, Hall's Tavern, at Hall's-corners, now known as Elmsford, on the road leading from the White Plains to Tarrytown, told us, many years ago, that he heard that severe cannonade, and saw the smoke occasioned by it, and very clearly remembered it; and, as may be reasonably supposed, under such circumstances, he regarded it as something more than ordinarily terrible.

What we have said concerning the extent of time thus occupied by the Hessian Artillerists, in their cannonade of the Americans, was authorized by Colonel Haslet, in his letter to General Rodney, already referred to; by Campbell's Revolutionary Services and Civil Life of General William Hull, 54; etc.

standard military maxim, of that period, which required the immediate removal of everything which might, possibly, jeopardize a flank or the rear of a column, no matter how insignificant it might otherwise be; and, undoubtedly, with the concurrence of the impromptu Council, of which mention has been made, General Howe determined to dislodge the Americans who had occupied Chatterton's-hill, before he proceeded further, in his movement against the main body of the American Army, then within its line of entrenchments, and awaiting his evidently intended assault. With that purpose in view, the main body of the Royal Army was ordered to rest on its arms, on the Plain, within a mile, and in open sight, from the American lines; orders were issued for a Battalion of Hessians to pass over the Bronx-river,[1] supported by the Second Brigade of British troops, composed of the Fifth, Twenty-eighth, Thirty-fifth, and Forty-ninth Regiments of Foot, commanded by Brigadier-general Leslie; and by the Brigade of Hessians, composed of Linsing's, Mingerode's, Lengereck's, and Kochler's Regiments of Grenadiers and his own Regiment of Chasseurs, commanded by Colonel Donop—the last mentioned Brigade to be taken from the right of the Army, where it had been posted —for the purpose of assaulting the position on Chatterton's-hill, in front; and Colonel Rall was ordered to move the Brigade which he commanded, on a charge, on the right of the Americans, simultaneously with the movement of the Hessian forlorn-hope and its supporting parties, on their front.[2]

The appearance of the Royal Army, as the main body was thus halted, with detachments moving towards the Bronx, for the proposed assault on Chatterton's-hill, was thus described by an eye-witness, himself an Officer among the Americans who were, then, awaiting the assault on their position: "Its appearance was truly magnificent. A bright autumnal "sun shed its full lustre on their polished arms; and "the rich array of dress and military equipage gave an "imposing grandeur to the scene, as they advanced, in "all the pomp and circumstances of War, to give us "battle;"[3] and, with the main bodies of the two armies, each resting on its arms, anxious spectators of the scene,[4] the Battalion of Hessians which had been designated for the forlorn-hope, in the proposed assault, and the British Regiments who had been detached for its support, moved, steadily, toward the Bronx, in front of the hill, on their mission of death.

It is probable that the little river, where the assaulting party attempted to pass it, was deeper than elsewhere, above or below that place, as it has been, during the entire period of our personal knowledge of the locality; and the Hessian forlorn-hope, consequently, found "some difficulty in passing" the stream;[5] but it struggled successfully, and evidently reached the opposite bank without having sustained any loss, the Twenty-eighth and Thirty-fifth Regiments of British Foot, followed by the Fifth and Forty-ninth Regiments of the same arm of the service, and, subsequently, by the Brigade of Hessians commanded by Colonel Donop,[6] finding "a place most practica-"ble"—probably "the ford," where the fugitive New Englanders and their Hessian pursuers had passed the river, earlier in the morning, was the more practicable place referred to[7]—hastening forward, in the

[1] General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "New-York, 30 November, "1776."

General Howe did not state which particular Battalion of Hessians was thus employed; and we have not found, in any of the contemporary authorities, anything which throws any light on the subject.

Bancroft, who has enjoyed unusual opportunities for acquiring information on the subject of the German mercenaries, has said, (History of the United States, original edition, ix., 181; centenary edition, v., 444,) that that forlorn-hope was composed of the Lossberg Battalion; but if, as he has conceded on another page, that Battalion was a portion of the Brigade commanded by Colonel Rall, it was, already on the western bank of the Bronx, and in position; and it is not to be supposed that it would have been withdrawn from that important position to the eastern bank of the river, by way of the ford, and then moved to the western bank, again, at a place where the depth of water made the passage much more difficult, as a forlorn-hope; while it could have acted as such a forlorn-hope, had that been desired, by simply marching up the Mill-lane, and climbing up the side of the hill, without the unnecessary labor and risk of passing and re-passing the river.

That Battalion of Hessians who formed the forlorn-hope continues to be, to us, a subject on which we need and seek for further information, especially since it was definitely and very reasonably stated in The Annual Register for 1776, (History of Europe, *178,) that it was one of the Battalions of the Brigade commanded by Colonel Donop; in which The History of the War in America, Edit. Dublin, 1779, (i., 195), concurred, both of which statements are in entire harmony with our own conclusions, on that subject, at the present time.

[2] General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "New-York, 30 November, "1776."

The Regiments of which the Second Brigade was composed were named in General Howe's despatch to Lord Germaine, above mentioned, and in the Return of the Killed, Wounded, etc., of the Brigade, in the action: those of which the Brigade commanded by Colonel Donop was composed may be seen in the same Return, as well as in the Report of the distribution of the Army, made by General Howe.

[3] Captain William Hull, quoted in The Revolutionary Services and Civil Life of General William Hull, by his daughter, 54.

Concerning the same subject, General Heath, who was on the opposite extremity of the line of the main body, wrote, (Memoirs, 78,) "The sun "shone bright; their arms glittered; and, perhaps, troops were never "shown to more advantage, than these now appeared."

It is very probable that it was that accidental separation of the Regiments composing the support of the Hessian forlorn-hope, and the consequent assault on the Americans in three distinct movements, which led Captain Hull, (in Campbell's Revolutionary Services and Civil Life of General William Hull, 55,) to suppose the assault had been originally ordered to be made, in that manner.

[7] In what manner the assaulting party crossed the Bronx-river has been made the subject of the speculations of several modern writers, led and, probably, inspired by the unscrupulous John C. Hamilton, (History of the Republic of the United States, i., 133,) who said the Hessian forlorn-hope "refused to wade the tangled stream; and a temporary bridge was begun" and, finally, completed,—of which bridge, he related several incidents, order in which we have named them, for the support of the shivering, half-drowned Germans, who were undoubtedly waiting, on the western bank of the stream, for their co-operation.

When the movement of the assaulting party, toward the ford, was seen from the summit of the hill, Colonel Haslet applied to General McDougal for the two field-pieces, in order that a fire might be opened on the advancing column; but General McDougal spared only one of the two guns; and that was so poorly appointed that the Colonel was obliged, personally, to assist in dragging it along the rear of his Regiment, to the place where he desired to post it. While it was being thus slowly dragged along the rear of the line of Americans, it is said that a shot from the Hessian guns struck its carriage, scattering the shot, etc., and leaving a wad of tow blazing in the middle of the debris. With the exception of a single man, who "was prevailed upon to tread out the blaze and col-"lect the shot," "all the Artillery-men fled," leaving Colonel Haslet and the field-piece entirely unsupported; but it appears that some of these later fugitives returned; made a couple of discharges on the enemy; and then retired, "with the field-piece," not to be seen again, until after they were securely quartered, with the main body of the Army, within the lines, on the other side of the river.[1]

The Twenty-eighth and Thirty-fifth Regiments were the first portion of the supporting party who succeeded in crossing the river;[2] and they moved from the ford, along the road which has more recently been known as "The Mill-lane," extending between the base of Chatterton's-hill and the bank of the Bronx, until they had reached a point which was opposite to the right of the American line, on the top of the hill,[3] when they faced to the left and, with the shivering Hessians on their front, they climbed up the steep and rugged hill-side, in good order and with the greatest steadiness,[4] the fire of the Hessian Artillerists, on the opposite side of the river, at least that portion of it which was directed against the American right, having been suspended, in order that they might not be exposed to unnecessary danger.[5]

On that portion of the American line which was exposed to that assault, on its front, as well as to the movement of the Hessian Brigade commanded by Colonel Rall, who had been ordered to charge on its right flank, simultaneously with the movement on its front, of each of which his father's Company of Artillery and his father were, invariably, the principal subjects.

Such a speculation would require little reflection, in order to show its improbability to any one; but Lossing, (Field-book of the Revolution, original edition, ii., 822;) Irving,* (Life of George Washington, ii., 392;) and others having followed that leader, and repeated his errors. But General Howe's despatch to Lord George Germaine left no room for doubting, and clearly indicated that the troops forded the stream; Sauthier's Plan of the Operations, etc., (the British official Map,) clearly indicated that the Royal troops crossed the river at "The Ford," designated on the Map; The Plan of the Country from Frog's Point to Croton River, (General Washington's Map,) did the same, also designating the "Ford;" The Annual Register for 1776, (History of Europe, 178,*) clearly understood the river was forded; Stedman, in his History of the American War, (i., 214,) said, "A part of our left wing passed the ford, which was "entirely under command of our cannon;" Sergeant Lamb, of the Welsh Fusileers, in his Journal of Occurrences during the late American War, (page 126,) said the entire assaulting party, whom he described, in detail, "marched down and crossed the ford;" Doctor Andrews, in his History of the War, (ii., 245,) stated the assaulting party "marched down "to the ford, and crossed it;" General Heath, an eye-witness of the movement, stated, in his Memoirs, (page 78,) that "a part of the left col-"umn, composed of British and Hessians, forded the river," etc.; Chief-justice Marshall, in his Life of George Washington, (ii., 504,) with General Washington's papers before him, clearly knew nothing of any bridge, constructed by the Royal Army; and Doctor Sparks, also with the papers of General Washington before him, in his Life of George Washington, (page 196,) after having described all the troops who had been ordered to make the assault, said, "they forded the Bronx, and "formed in good order on the other side;" and we prefer to follow our own convictions, that no bridge was constructed by the Royal Army, on that occasion, especially since those well-considered convictions are so amply sustained by such unquestionable authorities.

With the story of the bridge, other similarly groundless stories for which that phantom bridge had afforded foundations, notwithstanding the effect with which they have been related by their inventor, also vanish as the reader will shortly see.

* Mr. Irving, subsequently, explained to us, personally, how he had fallen into the error; and requested us to pay no respect to the erroneous statements, contained in his work, concerning them.

[1] Colonel Haslet to General Cæsar Rodney, "November 12, 1776."

Among the creations of John C. Hamilton's very able but very unscrupulous pen was one, based on the story of the bridge which we have already noticed, concerning the Artillery Company of which his father, Alexander Hamilton, was the Captain, and what he assumed to have been the wonderful services of that Company, on the occasion now under notice.

As we have already stated, (vide page 439, ante,) there are very grave doubts concerning Captain Hamilton's presence, with the Company, on Chatterton's-hill, on the eventful day of the Battle; and it is of questionable propriety, therefore, to identify him with the shortcomings of his command, so graphically portrayed by Colonel Haslet, in his letter to General Rodney, to which we have referred, in the text—shortcomings which were certainly such as reflected nothing else than disgrace on both the body of the Company and the Officer who was in command, on that occasion, whomsoever he may have been.

Generals Washington, Howe, Cornwallis, Robertson, and Heath, and Captains Harris and Hall, all of whom witnessed the action and described it, and Gordon, Stedman, Marshall, and Sparks, all of them standard historians, whose advantages for acquiring accurate information were in nowise neglected, were uniformly and rigidly silent on the subject of the alleged services of Captain Hamilton's Company of Artillery; while the adverse testimony of Colonel Haslet, which we have stated in the text, supported, in a great measure by that of Captain Hull, the latter concerning the other of the two pieces and those who manned it, on the extreme left of the line, (Campbell's The Revolutionary Services and Civil Life of General William Hull, 54,) leaves nothing, concerning that Company, on that occasion, to which the admirers of Alexander Hamilton can refer, with any pleasure, the pretensions of his son, to which we have referred, to the contrary notwithstanding.

were posted, as we have already stated, the Regiment of Massachusetts Militia commanded by Colonel Brooks, sheltered behind a stone wall and supported by the remains of the Maryland Regiment commanded by Colonel Smallwood,[1] and, probably, by the Third Regiment of New Yorkers commanded by Colonel Ritzema;[2] and, against these, the two assaulting parties simultaneously directed their overwhelming power. There was no Artillery to hurl destruction on either of the assailants: since, by that time, the Delaware Regiment, immediately on their left, was confronted by the Fifth and Forty-ninth Regiments, who had also crossed the river and were climbing the hill-side, "zealous to distinguish themselves," there was no support for the hard-pressed "Maccaronis" and their New York comrades: and nothing else than their own resolute wills and their strong arms and their not generally trusty and always ill-supplied muskets were there, to support those less than eleven hundred Officers and Privates in their approaching struggle with two well-disciplined, well-armed, well-commanded British Regiments, besides the Hessian forlorn-hope, on their front, and three equally well-disciplined, well-armed, and well-commanded Hessian Regiments, on their right flank.

It is recorded that the Regiment of Militia, commanded by Colonel Brooks, notwithstanding the shelter afforded by the stone wall, "fled in confusion, "without more than a random, scattering fire;"[3] leaving the Marylanders and New-Yorkers, alone and unsupported; and it also recorded that these last-named Regiments advanced to the brow of the hill, meeting their assailants, and throwing on them, while they were climbing the hill-side, an effective, plunging fire, compelling them to fall back.[4] But the retreat of the Militia, to whom appears to have been assigned the part of holding Colonel Rall in check, having entirely exposed the right flank of the two Regiments to the charge of his Brigade, while the three Regiments of British and Hessian troops who were climbing up the eastern face of the hill, notwithstanding the check which they had sustained, were rallied and renewed their assault on the front of the position, the conflict was too unequal to be long-sustained; and, notwithstanding the stubborn bravery which was necessary to sustain it, with such great odds against the Americans, during the long period of not less than a quarter of an hour,[5] the two brave Regiments were compelled to "give way"[6]—they fell back, fighting as they went, as brave men would be likely to do, under such circumstances.

But the action on Chatterton's-hill was not confined to the simultaneous assaults on the front and right flanks of the Americans who occupied it. Very closely after the Twenty-eighth and Thirty-fifth, the Fifth and Forty-ninth Regiments also forded the Bronx; and moved to the positions which had been assigned to them, respectively; and climbed up the side of the hill;[7] and assaulted the position which was occupied by "The Blue Hen's Chickens"—the Regiment of Delaware troops, commanded by Colonel Haslet—"foemen worthy of their steel." That Regiment numbered very few, if any more, than three hundred fighting Officers and Privates;[8] and yet, single-handed—the two Regiments on its right were already engaged, with assailants on both their front and flank; and the First New York Regiment and the Regiment of Connecticut troops, the latter commanded by Colonel Charles Webb, were also employed in opposing Colonel Donop's Brigade of Hessians, who were "ascending the height, with the greatest alacrity and "in the best of order"—that single regiment bravely sustained the attack, until after the Regiments which had covered its right had given way, when "part of "the first three Companies of the Regiment also re-"treated, in disorder," with considerable loss.[9] The left of the Regiment, however, with the greater number of its Officers, notwithstanding the retreat of the Regiments on its right and that of its own three Companies had exposed its right to the combined assaults of, at least, the Hessian Battalion who had been the forlorn-hope and two of the British Regiments and Colonel Rall's entire Brigade, while two other British Regiments were on its front, fell back only far enough to occupy "a fence, on the top of the hill," a position which it continued to occupy and defend, successfully, until the two Regiments which covered its left had also given way, when, it, also, "retired," the last of the Americans who remained on the hill, and that resolute force, small as it was, who held back the successful assailants, then eager to become pursuers, and covered the retreat of those who, then, remained of the defenders of Chatterton's-hill.[10]

[2] We have found no mention of the movement of the Regiment commanded by Colonel Ritzema for the support of the Regiments commanded by Colonel Brooks and Smallwood, on the right of the line; but it is reasonable that support was needed, there; and there is satisfactory evidence that Colonel Ritzema and his command were really there, during the action: we shall not stop to enquire just when they went to that very exposed position.

But the action was, also, not confined to the assaults on nor to the defences of the right and center of the Americans, on the top of that notable hill. The four Regiments composing the Brigade commanded by General Leslie, were soon followed, "with the "greatest alacrity and in the best order," through the river, at the ford, and up the Mill-lane, and up the eastern face of the hill, by the Chasseurs and by three, if not by, four, Regiments of Hessian Grenadiers, composing the Brigade commanded by Colonel Donop.[1] In front of these, on the summit of the hill, were the skeleton First New York Regiment, formerly commanded by General McDougal, but then evidently without Field-officers and commanded by one of its Captains; and the Regiment of Connecticut troops commanded by Colonel Charles Webb, very little stronger in effective men, than the other; and, very probably, one of the two field-pieces which constituted the armament of the Company of New-York Artillery of whom Alexander Hamilton was the official commander—the other of the two pieces, as the reader will remember, was posted on the extreme right of the line, under the command of Colonel Haslet.[2] All these numbered, in the aggregate, not many, if any, more than four hundred fighting Officers and Privates;[3] and, with their only piece of artillery dismounted, evidently before the assailants commenced to ascend the hill,[4] and without any support or defensive works, it is scarcely probable that much was expected from so feeble a body, in the face of so heavy a body of assailants. But the records indicate that all those of the two feeble Regiments who were present on the field, performed their duty satisfactorily to the Commander-in-chief;[5] and, we are told that, when an effort was made by the assailants to turn the left of the line, a detachment from Colonel Webb's Regiment, commanded by Captain William Hull, defeated the attempt, with spirit and promptitude, although he was opposed by more than double the number of his own command.[6]

On every part of the ground, except those portions which had been occupied by the Company of New-York Artillery and the Regiment of Massachusetts Militia, the battle had been resolutely sustained;[7] and the assailants, in more than one instance, had been compelled to fall back;[8] but the opposing forces were so unequal in their strength that a successful occupation of the hill could not have been expected, by any one—indeed, the fact that the entire detachment was not cut off from the main body of the Army, and captured by the enemy, reflects the highest honor on those who occupied the hill, and fills one with wonder and admiration. It is doubtful if any who were not too much disabled to be removed, were taken prisoners; all who were able to move off the hill, moved off, by the left flank, by way of the road which led from the White Plains to Dobbs's ferry[9]—they moved sullenly,[10] "in a great body, neither run-"ning nor observing the best order,"[11] covered by a portion of the Delaware Regiment[12]—and, having crossed the bridge over which the roadway passed the Bronx, the site of that which now affords a passage over the river, near the present railroad-station at the White Plains, they fell in on the rear of General Beall's Maryland Flying Camp, which General Putnam was leading for their support, on the hill;[13] and joined the main body of the Army, within the lines.

After he had gained possession of the hill, the enemy made no attempt whatever to pursue the retreating Americans; but formed and dressed his line,[14] and

It is possible that one of the Regiments of that Brigade had been detailed, to act as the forlorn-hope, in the assault, as we have already stated.

As the fire of the Hessian Artillerists had been suspended when the assailants had commenced to ascend the hill, it is very evident that, when Colonel Donop, the last to reach the ground, assaulted the left of the American line, there was no artillery on the hill, in front of him, mounted and effective.

General Howe, in his despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-"YORK, 30 November, 1776," stated that, after the engagement, "the "Hessian Grenadiers," [those who had assaulted the left of the Americans,] "were ordered forward, upon the heights, within cannon-shot of the "entrenchments, the Bronx, from its winding course, being still between prepared his dinner, for the purpose of doing which he tore down and burned a barn which belonged to John Hunt, on property, on the western portion of the hill, which, in our younger days, belonged to his two sons, Thomas and Jacob Hunt.[1]

The strength of the Americans, under General Spencer, who were engaged on the Plain; who were alarmed at either the Hessians or the Light Dragoons; and who fled, over the river and far away, among the hills of Greenburgh, was, as we have already stated, not far from twenty-five hundred effective Officers and Privates:[2] that of the Regiments who composed the force on the top of the hill, who defended the position, and who were really the heroes of the day, exclusive of the Company of Artillery, who rendered no effective service, was not far from seventeen hundred effective Officers and Privates.[1] The strength of all the force which was directed against that feeble body of men cannot be definitely ascertained, since the Hessian Artillerists, on the eastern bank of the river, whose fire was, certainly, to some extent, effective, were clearly as much a portion of that antagonistic force as those who crossed the river and assaulted the position or as those who charged on the right flank of the struggling Americans, and assisted in driving them from the hill. Besides those Hessian Artillerists, there were four Regiments of British troops, commanded by General Leslie; the Hessian Regiment, probably from Colonel Donop's command, who occupied the place of danger and honor, as the forlorn-hope; the three Regiments of Hessians, commanded by Colonel Rall; and the four or five Regiments of Hessians,

"them and the enemy's," [the American's,] "right flank; the Second "Brigade of British," [those who had assaulted the fronts of the right and centre of the Americans,] "formed in the rear of the Hessian Grena-"diers; and the two Brigades of Hessians, on the left of the Second "Brigade, with their left upon the road leading from Tarrytown to the "White Plains"—that is to say, the entire force, on the western bank of the Bronx, was moved northward, until its left was above that old road, still continued, which extends from the bridge, near the railroad-station, westward, over Chatterton's-hill.

[1] Information communicated to us, personally, more than thirty years since, by the two gentlemen named, who, then, were our near neighbors and personal friends.

[2] The Returns of the Killed, Wounded, and Missing, in each of the several Regiments who had formed that bashful detachment leave no room for doubt concerning the Regiments of whom it was really composed—indeed, there may have been others whose modesty forbade the making of any such Returns, and who have thereby escaped our notice.

The Regiments of whom we find mention, as we have already stated, were those commanded, respectively, by Colonels Silliman, Selden, Sage, and Douglass (the latter commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Arnold,) all belonging to the Brigade commanded by General Wadsworth; the Regiment commanded by Colonel Chester, of the Brigade commanded by Colonel Sargent; the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Baldwin, Douglass, and Lieutenant-colonel Ely, of the Brigade commanded by General Saltonstall; and the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Holman and Smith, of the Brigade commanded by General Fellows—all of them New Englanders and some of them experts in running, as was shown at Kip's-bay, in the preceding September.

The Returns of the strength of each of those several Regiments, on the twenty-first of September, on the fifth of October, and on the third of November,—the last, five days after the action,—were as follows:

It will be seen that five hundred and sixty Officers, Staff, non-commissioned Officers and Musicians, and two thousand and seventy-six Privates, present and fit for duty, survived the hazards of the engagement, and had returned to the Camp, five days after the Battle; and the reader will readily perceive that our estimate of the effective strength of the detachment on the occasion under consideration, is a reasonable one, sustained as it is by the contemporary statement of Lieutenant-colonel Tilghman, one of the Aides of General Washington, (Letter to his father, "WHITE-PLAINS, 31st October, 1776;") and by that of Brigade-major Tallmadge, of General Wadsworth's Brigade, himself a participant in the affair on the Plain and in the discreditable retreat, (Memoir of Colonel Benjamin Tallmadge, prepared by himself, 13;) for both of which see pages 436, 437, ante.

The loss sustained by the Americans was not as great as was, at first, supposed[2]—the return to the Camp of the greater number of the fugitive New Englanders reduced the supposed losses from "between "four or five hundred in killed, wounded, and miss-"ing," which was the first estimate, to twenty-two killed, twenty-four wounded, and one missing, in the detachment commanded by General Spencer;[3] and, exclusive of the losses sustained by the Regiments commanded, respectively, by Colonels Haslet and Brooks, of which no Returns have been found, the loss of those who were on the top of the hill and who fought the battle, was two Captains, four Sergeants, one Corporal, and eighteen Privates, killed; one Colonel, three Lieutenants, one Ensign, four Sergeants, and forty-three Privates, wounded; and sixteen Pri-

It will be seen that three hundred and forty Officers, Staff, non-commissioned Officers, and Musicians, and one thousand, four hundred, and forty-two Privates, present and fit for duty, survived the Battle, and, five days after that event, were returned as effective. The losses which they had sustained, in the action, and the probable absence of some, on that occasion, must be taken into the account; and we believe that the number of Officers and Privates who were actually engaged was about that which we have stated in the text.

(Life of General Washington, 196,) each with the papers of General Washington before him, stated the force under General McDougal was "about sixteen hundred" men.

[1] General Howe was silent concerning the numerical strength of the force which he had thus employed; and none of the British authorities were any more communicative. Stedman, however, (History of the American War, i., 215,) clearly intimated that the force which was required to take and occupy Chatterton's-hill, when diverted for that purpose, so greatly weakened the Royal Army, then on the White Plains, that "it was obvious that the latter could no longer expediently "attempt anything against the enemy's" [the Americans'] "main "body."

We may be allowed to say, in this connection, that the practise of that period, in making mention of the strength of detachments or of that of the Army itself, was to include only the Rank and File, excluding the Commissioned Officers, the Staff, and the non-commissioned Officers, all of them, to some extent, at least, effective fighting men.

[2] Compare the letter from Colonel Robert H. Harrison, the Secretary of General Washington, to the President of the Congress, dated "WHITE-"PLAINS, 29 October, 1776," with General Washington's letter to the same, dated "WHITE-PLAINS, 6 November, 1776," in the latter of which he said, "I am happy to inform you, that, in the engagement on Mon-"day se'nnight, I have reason to believe our loss was, by no means, so "considerable as was conjectured, at first."

vates, missing[1]—among those who were killed were Captains Bracco and Scott, of Colonel Smallwood's Regiment; and, among those who were wounded, were Colonel Smallwood and Lieutenants Goldsmith and Waters, of the same Regiment.[2] General Howe reported to the Home Government, evidently including all who were captured in Westchester-county, that one Captain, two Lieutenants, one Quarter-master, and thirty-five Privates were taken, "October 12—"White Plains;"[3] but we have no means for ascertaining who of these were taken prisoners on the twenty-eighth of October. The loss sustained by the Second Brigade of British troops, commanded by General Leslie, was Lieutenant-colonel Carr, Captains Deering and Gore, Lieutenant Jocelyn, Ensign Eagle, one Sergeant, and twenty-nine Rank and File,[4] killed; Lieutenant-colonel Walcott,[5] Captain Fitzgerald, Captain-lieutenant Massey,[6] Lieutenants Taylor, Banks, and Roberts, twelve Sergeants, and one hundred and two Rank and File,[7] wounded; and two Rank and File,[8] missing.[9] The three Regiments composing the Brigade commanded by Colonel Rall sustained a loss of eight Rank and File, killed; Lieutenant Muhlhausen, one Sergeant, and forty-four Rank and File, wounded; and one horse, killed. The Regiment of Chasseurs and the four Regiments of Grenadiers—one of them, probably, the half-drowned forlorn-hope—composing the Brigade commanded by Colonel Donop, sustained a loss of four Rank and File, killed; Captain De Westerhagen, Lieutenant De Rau, and fourteen Rank and File, wounded; and two Rank and File, missing.[10]

As far as our knowledge of it extends, history is wholly silent, concerning the influences which controlled General Washington and concerning the objects which he had in view, when he determined to occupy Chatterton's-hill, with so large a proportion of his already feeble and uncertain Army, including three of the best, if not the best three, of his Regiments;[11] and, especially, at a later hour, when, at a critical moment and in the face of an overwhelming enemy, he determined, also, to strengthen the force whom he had already sent, and to hold the position, at all hazards, sending, for those purposes, another very strong detachment of those troops in whom he reposed his greatest confidence, as soldiers, and whom he could ill-spare from the insufficiently manned lines which he, himself, was then occupying.

At best, Chatterton's-hill, at that time, was an isolated position; beyond the American lines; too distant to be supported from the main body, in the presence of an enemy occupying the Plains, unless in force and at great risk; with no line of communication with the main body, which was not commanded by the enemy; and with no opening for a retreat of the occupying force, in case of a disaster, unless to the westward, into the neighboring hills of Greenburgh, which were already occupied by the fugitive New Englanders whom General Spencer had attempted to command. It could hardly be considered, therefore, with any degree of propriety, as anything else than a detached and independent position, form-

Doctor Pine, in his letter to James Tilghman, dated "CAMP AT THE "WHITE-PLAINS, November 7, 1776," Said, "the number of killed and "wounded, as the report is, in the Camp, amounts only to about ninety; "but from the wounded I saw, myself, in the hospital and adjacent "houses, there must, at least, be an hundred and thirty wounded. The "number of killed I don't know."

[3] Return of Prisoners taken during the Campaign, 1776, signed by "Jos-"Loring, Commissary of Prisoners," appended to General Howe's despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-YORK, 3 December, 1776."

[4] In General Leslie's Return, the killed were stated to have been only twenty-two Rank and File.

[5] In General Leslie's Return, no mention was made of a Field-officer of the Fifth Regiment having been wounded.

[6] In General Leslie's Return of Officers wounded, Captain Massey's name is among those of the Lieutenants, although the tabular statement returns him as a Captain, in which it agrees with General Howe's Report. He was a Captain-Lieutenant.

[7] In General Leslie's Return, the wounded were stated to have numbered one hundred and twelve Rank and File.

[8] In General Leslie's Return, no mention was made of any missing Rank and File.

[9] In this statement, we have followed General Howe's Return of Commissioned and Non-commissioned Officers, Rank and File, Killed, Wounded, and Missing, etc., appended to his despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-YORK, 3 December, 1776." We have compared it with the Return of the Killed and Wounded of the Second Brigade, etc., made by General Leslie; and find that, although the details of the classifications differ, the aggregate of the British loss is the same—one hundred and fifty-seven Officers and Men.

[10] General Howe's Return of Commissioned and Non-commissioned Officers, Rank and File, Killed, Wounded, and Missing, appended to his despatch to Lord George Germaine, dated "NEW-YORK, 3 December, 1776."

It is proper for us to say, however, that that Return included all the losses sustained by the Regiments referred to, from the nineteenth to the twenty-eighth of October, both these dates included; and it is possible, therefore, that some of the casualties named in the text were sustained elsewhere than on or near Chatterton's-hill. We have no means for ascertaining their exact losses, on the twenty-eighth of October.

[11] We are not insensible that Stedman, in his History of the American War, (i., 214,) said "the reason of their" [the Americans,] "occupying "this posture," [on Chatterton's-hill,] "is inexplicable, unless it be that "they could not be contained within the works of their Camp;" but the reason assigned was too evidently ridiculous to be regarded with the slightest respect.

* No Returns from these Regiments have been found.

ing no portion of the American lines; and nothing else than a supposition, on the part of General Washington's advisers and on that of the General himself, that the continued occupation of it was absolutely essential to the safety of the main body, in the position which it then occupied, could possibly have led him to make such a costly and hazardous experiment, under the existing circumstances and in the immediate presence of such an overwhelming enemy, as the continued occupation and defence of Chatterton's-hill. But General Washington had evidently planned better than he knew; and, in the providence of God, some results which were more beneficial to the Americans than any which he had conceived and hoped for, were unquestionably derived from that seemingly unpromising experiment of occupying and holding that exceedingly exposed position, on the western bank of the Bronx; among which results, in America, we may mention the effect of that occupation, as an apparent menace against the left flank and rear of the Royal Army, in whatever movement that Army, under General Howe, should make against the American lines; the delay in that evidently projected movement of the Royal Army, to enable its commanding General to remove what appeared to have been a dangerous element from Chatterton's-hill—a delay which enabled the Americans to strengthen their defensive works and to become better prepared for defending them, whenever the Royal Army should move against them;—and the reduction of that great Army, which was, then, in front of the American lines, and ready to move against them, for the purpose of assaulting the Americans who had occupied the hill as well for that of holding the hill, subsequently, which reduction of the strength of his main body compelled General Howe to wait for the arrival of reinforcements, to abandon his intention to assault the works which sheltered the main body of the American Army, and, finally, to retire from Westchester-county—the first-mentioned of which consequences affording still further time and opportunities to General Washington and his feeble command: the latter two affording to the Americans, everywhere, the éclat, as well as some of the advantages, of better generalship and of consequent success. All these, among other not much less-important results, although they were probably hidden from General Washington, when he devised and ordered the movement, were, unquestionably, among the results, in America, of that "inexplicable" occupation of Chatterton's-hill, on the morning of the twenty-eighth of October, 1776: with the results, in Europe, of that occupation, we have nothing to do, in this place.[1]

As we have elsewhere stated, the advancing columns of the Royal Army had been formed, in line, with the Right resting on the road leading from the White Plains to Mamaroneck, and the Left resting on the Bronx; and that it had been halted, within a mile of the American lines, to enable a heavy detachment of both British and Hessian troops to dispossess a body of American troops who had occupied Chatterton's-hill, and who appeared to menace the left flank and rear of the Left, in its proposed movement against the American lines.[1] The result of that assault on Chatterton's-hill has, also, been duly noticed;[2] but the success of that movement did not disturb the main body, who remained, resting on its arms, where it had been halted, during the remainder of the day and throughout the following night; and, there, "with "very little alteration," it encamped, on the following day [3]—it had been so much reduced, in effective strength, by the withdrawal of the assaulting parties, and, as was said by an intelligent officer, "the diffi-"culty of co-operation between the Left and Right "wings of our Army was such, that it was obvious "that the latter could no longer expediently attempt "anything against the enemy's main body."[4] It appears, however, that the Right of the Royal Army, who was not expected to participate in the proposed assault on the American lines, and who was not concerned in the assault on Chatterton's-hill, further than to detach the Hessians commanded by Colonel Donop, who were in that wing of the Army, for the purpose of assisting in that important operation, was not inclined to rest, as the Left of the Army had been ordered to do and had done; and a portion of it, at least, was moved forward, on the main road of the Village, in front of the Left of the American lines, which was occupied, as the reader will remember, by the Division commanded by General Heath.[5]

We have been told that the advancing column was led by a detachment of about twenty Light Dragoons, capering and brandishing their sabres, who leaped the fence of a wheat-field, situated at the foot of the hill on which the Regiment commanded by Colonel Malcolm had been posted.[6] The horsemen evidently supposed the hill was unoccupied; and, it is probable, they expected to turn the flank of the American lines, and to secure an easy victory; but Lieutenant Fenno and his field-piece were also on "the South brow of "the hill;"[7] and, when the horsemen approached, he gave them a shot which, "by striking in the midst "of them," killed one of them.[8] The troop was immediately "wheeled, short about, and galloped out of "the field as fast as they came in; rode behind a little "hill, in the road; and faced about;" the other portions of the column, at the same time, as they successively came up, wheeling to the left, by platoons; and, passing through a gateway or bars, directed their march, westward, to the place where the Left of the Army had been halted.[9] With that movement of the extreme Right of the Army, and with that of the Hessian and British troops, on the high grounds, on the western bank of the Bronx, on its extreme Left, already mentioned, the Royal Army closed the operations of the day.

It is undoubtedly true that the delay which was produced by the halt of the Royal Army, on the Plain, was the salvation of the American Army, within the lines; since it afforded time for strengthening the works behind which the latter was, then, posted, and for preparing it for falling back, soon afterwards, and occupying another position, which would be more defensible and not so accessible to the King's troops. But it is scarcely true that, since the morning of the preceding day, the Americans had "drawn back their encampment" and "strengthened their lines by additional works," to such an extent, in either instance, that "the designed "attack upon them," on the morning after the engagement, [Tuesday, October 29,] need have been "deferred," for no other reasons than these, notwithstanding General Howe is reported to have informed the Home Government that such had been the case [10]—the reported withdrawal of the American encampment was, probably, nothing more than the removal of the Stores, back, to the high grounds of Newcastle, which was commenced on that day; [11] and, notwithstanding the interval had been undoubtedly occupied by the Americans, in industriously strengthening their position, they could scarcely have made defensible and formidable what, only a few hours previous, had been hardly respectable. Indeed, at no time, even under the most favorable circumstances, were the defences of the American lines, immediately above the Plains, in any respect formidable; and the center, where the post-road passed through them, was decidedly the weakest portion. They had been hastily constructed, without the superintendence of experienced Engineers. The stony soil prevented the ditch from being made of any troublesome depth or the parapet of a troublesome height: the latter was not fraised: only where it was least needed—probably because the construction of it, elsewhere, had been interfered with—was there the slightest appearance of an abatis.[1] There was little foundation, therefore, for General Howe's transparent excuses; and it would have been more creditable to his candor, had he told the true reason for his failure to assault the lines, on the morning after the Battle and while the troops who had been designated to make the assault, with their line unbroken, were resting on their arms, within a mile and in open sight from the works which they were expecting to assault, and ready to move against them, at a moment's notice—the fact was simply this, as we have already seen,[2] "the Army could no longer expediently attempt "anything against the enemy's" [the Americans'] "main body;" and it was necessary that it should be reinforced, before the Americans should be attacked.

During Tuesday, the twenty-ninth of October, as we have seen, the Royal Army, "with very little al-"teration" in its position, encamped on the Plain, and awaited the arrival of reinforcements;[3] and, notwithstanding the loss of Chatterton's-hill, in the opinion of some of the American Officers,[4] had made it necessary for the American Army to abandon the position, the work of strengthening its lines was continued, with unabated industry.[5]

During Wednesday, the thirtieth of October, the King's troops were occupied in throwing up some defensive works and redoubts, on the Plain, in front of the American lines,[6] and an entrenchment on the summit of Chatterton's-hill;[7] and, during the afternoon of the same day, four Regiments, from the lines on New-York-island,[8] and two Regiments of the Sixth Brigade, who had been posted at Mamaroneck, after the Queen's Rangers had been so "roughly

[1] In this description of the character of the American defenses, we have followed Stedman, (History of the American War, i., 213,) who was probably present, in the Royal Army.

We are not insensible that Bancroft, (History of the United States, original edition, ix., 180; the same, centenary edition, v., 444,) has so framed his sentence that his readers must suppose the abatis was as extended as the "lines of entrenchments;" but the feebleness of the Army and the scarcity of teams could not have secured so great a work, in so short a time; neither General Washington nor General Heath nor General Knox, among the Americans, nor General Howe nor General Lord Cornwallis, among the King's troops, all of whom have more or less described the American defenses, has made the slightest allusion to such a general defense, before the long line of American entrenchments; and Stedman expressly stated that "the point of the hill, on the enemy's "right," [that on the line of the Harlem Railroad, immediately northward from the Railroad-station,] "exceedingly steep and rocky, was covered by "a strong abatis in front of the entrenchment," the very place, as we have said in the text, where such an additional mean of defense was least needed. For these reasons, we prefer to believe that the American lines were not, generally, furnished with an abatis.

[3] General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "NEW-YORK, 30 November, "1776."

[4] General Heath said, (Memoirs, 79,) "the British having got posses-"sion of this hill, it gave them a vast advantage of the American lines, "almost down to the center;" and General Knox, in a letter to his brother, dated "NEAR WHITE-PLAINS, 32 MILES FROM NEW-YORK, 1 "Nov: 1776," said "the enemy's having possession of this hill obliged "us to abandon some slight lines thrown up on the White Plains."

[5] There was something which required explanation in what was written by General Washington's Secretary and, undoubtedly, with his approval, to the President of the Congress, when he said, "Our post, from "its situation, is not so advantageous as could be wished; and was only "intended as temporary and occasional, till the Stores belonging to the "Army, which had been deposited, here, could be removed."—(Colonel Robert H. Harrison to the President of the Congress, "WHITE-PLAINS, 29 "October, 1776."

"The Stores belonging to the Army," at that time and for some time previous, had not been so abundant as to have been burdensome; and, if there had been judicious oversight, they could have been carried a couple of miles further, to a place of greater safety, when they were carried to the White Plains, saving the repeated re-handling of them and the construction of two distinct lines of works for nothing else than for the "temporary and occasional" protection of them.

There is, generally, a prodigality in the expenditure of both money and materials and labor, in all which relates to Armies; but there seems to have been an excess of prodigality in the use of all these, of which the American Army had such an insufficient supply, if the only purpose of the two lines of entrenchments, one at the foot and the other on the crest of the high grounds, at the White Plains, had been only for the "temporary and occasional" protection of a few Stores, handled and re-handled, over and over again, the whole of which could have been consumed by the Army, in less than six days, probably in half that time.*

If there had been, in fact, no other reason than these, for occupying and fortifying that position, there was reason for General George Clinton's doubts, when he wrote, "Uncovered, as we are; daily on fatigue; "making redoubts, flèches, abatis, and lines; and retreating from "them and the little temporary huts made for our comfort, before they "are well finished, I fear, will ultimately destroy our Army, without "fighting." . . . "However, I would not be understood to con-"demn measures. They may be right, for aught I know. I do not un-"derstand much of the refined art of War: it is said to consist of "strategem and deception."—(General George Clinton to John McKesson, "CAMP NEAR THE WHITE-PLAINS, October 31, 1776.")

"handled" by the Americans,[1] joined the main body of the Army, on the Plain, for the reinforcement of it.[2]

During the same day, [Wednesday, October 30,] the Americans were not idle—they probably kept up an appearance of continuing their labor in strengthening their works, while they were, also, preparing for an abandonment of them;[3] but no official record has come down to us, concerning their doings, on that day.

Having been strengthened by the addition of six fresh and effective Regiments to his already powerful command, General Howe determined to attack the American lines, on the following day, [Thursday, October 31;] and, for that purpose, all necessary preparations were duly made; but the preceding night and the morning of that day were very rainy; and the proposed movement was necessarily postponed.[4]

During the same day, [Thursday, October 31,] the Americans remained within their works, quietly preparing for the abandonment of them and carefully watching every movement of their enemy.

Supposing that one of the objects of General Howe was to turn the flank of the lines; to seize the bridge over the Croton-river; and, thereby, to cut off the communication of the Army with the upper country, General Washington detached General Rezin Beall, with three fine Regiments of Marylanders, to occupy that very important pass; and General Lord Stirling was ordered, with the Brigade which he commanded, "to keep pace with the enemy's left flank, and to "push up, also, to Croton-river, should he plainly "perceive that the enemy's route lays that way."[5] At the same time that the Army was being rapidly diminished by the desertions of the Militia,[6] to say nothing of stragglers,[7] those who remained at their post were evidently diligently employed in preparing to move to a new position—an operation in which the great scarcity of teams added, very greatly, to the personal labor of the men[8]—and, during the following night, that of Thursday, the thirty-first of October,[9] the entire line of the Army, taking the extreme left of the line for the pivot,[10] swung back, from the lines which it had constructed, with so much labor, on the high grounds, above the Plains, until its rear rested on the more advantageous high grounds of Northcastle;[11] within a mile from the position which it had abandoned;[12] and authoritatively described as "grounds which were strong and advantageous, and "such as they," [the King's troops,] "could not have "gained without much loss of blood, in case an "attempt had been made."[13]

A strong party was left in possession of the lines

[9] Chief justice Marshall, (Life of George Washington, ii., 505,) stated, in harmony with what General Howe also stated in his despatches to Lord George Germaine, (vide page 448, ante,) that the American Army was withdrawn from the lines on the night after the engagement on Chatterton's-hill; and that it was moved, a second time, during the night of the thirty first of October, to the high grounds of Northcastle, which he erroneously supposed to have been five miles from the White Plains.

We cannot reconcile either of these statements, without some qualification, with well-known facts which indicate, beyond a peradventure, that the lines which the main body had occupied, from the beginning, were fully occupied until the evening of the thirty-first of October, as stated in the text; and we await the appearance of new evidence which can throw more light on the subject, without permitting our own well-considered convictions to be, in the meantime, disturbed by what appears to have been written ambiguously.

[10] "The left of our General's Division was not to move; but the re-"mainder of his Division and all the other Divisions of the Army "were to fall back and form," on that stationery pivot, (Memoirs of General Heath, 79;) the whole occupying a new line, without having disturbed the relative positions of any of the Regiments or Divisions of whom the Army was composed.

[12] Hall and Stedman erroneously supposed the new position was North of the Croton-river. General Howe, very accurately, stated it was "one "mile back from their entrenchments." Chief justice Marshall, as we have seen, erroneously supposed it was five miles from the White Plains. Hildreth, (History of the United States. iii., 154,) said it was two miles in the rear of the first line. Irving, (Life of George Washington, ii., 397,) said it was five miles distant. Lossing, (Pictorial Field-book of the Revolution, ii., 823,) said, uncertainly, it was "toward the Croton River." General Knox, in a letter written to his brother, dated "NEAR WHITE-"PLAINS, 32 MILES FROM NEW-YORK, 1 Nov. 1776," said "the enemy's "possession of this hill obliged us to abandon some slight lines thrown "up on the White Plains. This we did, this morning, and retired to "some hills about half a mile in the rear."

As the left of the former line did not move from the position which it had occupied since the twenty-second of October; and because the remainder of the Army without disturbing the formation of the line, did no more than to swing back, on a pivot, into its new position, the extreme right could not have been more than two miles distant from the former line, probably it was not much more than half that distance.

which had been vacated;[1] and, during the night, it set fire to several barns and one house, which contained forage; and some Provisions which, for the want of teams, could not be removed, were also destroyed.[2]

On the morning after the withdrawal of the main body of the American Army from its lines, at the head of the White Plains, [Friday, November 1, 1776,] General Howe gave orders for the occupation of those lines, by the Royal Army; but, again, a violent rain interposed; and the project was abandoned.[3] At a later hour, however, the Hessian Grenadiers were moved from Chatterton's-hill, and occupied those lines,[4] very possibly as the beginning of a movement against the new position of the American Army, which, after a due examination of its strength, was conducted no further.[5]

On the morning of Friday, the first of November, simultaneously with the movement of the Hessian Grenadiers and with other equally important preparations—the whole, we believe, preparatory to an assault on the new position of the American Army, in the high grounds of North Castle,—a heavy body, from the Right of the Royal Army, with a number of field-pieces, was moved against the extreme left of the American lines, where the Division commanded by General Heath was posted, and opened a heavy fire; which was returned by Captain-lieutenant Bryant and Lieutenant Jackson, of the American Artillery, neither party sustaining any loss which was particularly worthy of record.[6] A violent rain, however, again interposed; and the project, whatever it may have been, was abandoned.[7]

General Howe and several others have fallen into the error of supposing that the Village of the White-Plains was also burned, on the occasion now under notice: it was not burned until the night of the fifth of November, when, after he had robbed the houses, it was destroyed by a party of Massachusetts troops, commanded by Major Austin.

[3] In the cross-examination of General Lord Cornwallis, by the members of a Committee of the House of Commons, on the sixth of May, 1779, his Lordship was asked, "Was there not a time, at the White "Plains, when our Army lay on their arms, intending to attack the "enemy, but were prevented by rain?," to which he replied, "After "the enemy fell back to the heights, near North-Castle, they left an "advance Corps on the heights of the White Plains; there were or-"ders given for an attack of that Corps, which was prevented by a vi-"olent rain. We did not lay upon our arms." The inquiry was continued by the Committee asking, "From the situation of the rebel "Army and of our's, was that storm in their or our faces?" to which his Lordship replied, "I do not apprehend that the attack was pre-"vented by the storm of rain being in either of our faces; there are "other effects of a storm, such as spoiling the roads and preventing "the drawing of artillery up steep hills." The Committee continued, by asking, "Whether if the powder was wet, on both sides, the at-"tacks might not have been made by bayonets?;" to which his Lord ship replied, "I do not recollect that I said the powder was wet;" and, there, the subject was dropped.—(Almon's Parliamentary Register, Fifth Session of the Fourteenth Parliament of Great Britain, xiii., 14.)

[4] General Howe to Lord George Germaine, "NEW-YORK, 30 November, "1776."

[5] Although it was not stated, at the time, and notwithstanding it has not been stated, since that time, that General Howe proposed to attack the Americans, in their new position, on the morning after it was taken by them, we are sure that that was his purpose, when he ordered the Hessian Grenadiers from Chatterton's-hill; and made the preparations for "drawing of artillery up steep hills," to which General Lord Cornwallis referred, in his testimony; and ordered or approved the movement on the extreme left of the American lines, of which mention will be made, hereafter. Nothing else than such a project, it seems to us, could have warranted all these operations; and, certainly, nothing else could have led some of the British writers, including Captain Hall, (History of the Civil War in America, i., 210,) to consider the occupation of the abandoned lines, by the Hessian Grenadiers, as a pursuit of the fugitive Americans.

[6] General Heath has left a very minute description of the movements of the enemy and of his own preparations to oppose those movements, (Memoirs of General Heath, 80, 81;) and we make room for it, because of its great local interest, in the vicinity of the White Plains: "Our Gen-"eral's first anxiety," General Heath stated, speaking of himself, "was "for Colonel Malcolm's Regiment, on the hill, to the East of the hollow, "on the left, * lest the enemy should push a Column into the hollow, "and cut the Regiment off from the Division. He, therefore, ordered "Major Keith, one of his Aides, to gallop over, and order Colonel Mal-"colm to come off, immediately, with Lieutenant Fenno's Artillery; but, "upon a more critical view of the ground, in the hollow, (at the head "of which there was a heavy stone wall, well-situated to cover a body of "troops to throw a heavy fire directly down it, while an oblique fire "could be thrown in, on both sides,) he ordered Major Pollard, his other "Aide, to gallop after Keith, and countermand the first order; and to "direct the Colonel to remain at his post; and he should be supported. "A strong Regiment was ordered to the head of the hollow, to occupy "the wall.

"The cannonade was brisk, on both sides, through which the two "Aides-de-camp passed, in going and returning. At this instant, Gen-"eral Washington rode up to the hill. His first question to our General, "was, 'How is your Division?' He was answered, 'They are all in or-"'der.' 'Have you,' said the Commander-in-chief, 'any troops on the hill, "'over the hollow?' He was answered, 'Malcolm's Regiment is there.' 'If "'you do not call them off, immediately,' says the General, 'you may lose "'them, if the enemy push a column up the hollow.' He was answered, "'that, even in that case, their retreat should be made safe; that a strong "Regiment was posted at the head of the hollow, behind the wall; that "this Regiment, with the oblique fire of the Division, would so check the "enemy, as to allow Malcolm to make a safe retreat. The Commander-"in-chief concluded by saying, 'Take care that you do not lose them.'

"The Artillery of the Division was so well directed as to throw the "British artillery-men, several times, into confusion; and, finding that "they could not, here, make any impression, they drew back their pieces, "the Column not advancing," [probably because of the failure of the main body to advance against the American lines, in cooperation with this detachment, as we have already stated.]

"The British Artillery now made a circuitous movement; and came "down, toward the American right. Here, unknown to them, were "some twelve-pounders, upon the discharge of which, they made off, "with their field-pieces, as fast as their horses could draw them.

"A shot from the American cannon, at this place, took off the head of a "Hessian artillery-man: they also left one of their artillery-horses, dead "on the field. What other loss they sustained, was not known. Of our "General's Division, one man, only, belonging to Colonel Paulding's "Regiment of New-York troops, was killed."†

Having been thus frustrated in all his efforts to cut off the communications of the American Army with the upper country as well as with New England and to draw General Washington to give him battle, in a general engagement—in other words, having been completely outgeneraled by the Commander-in-chief of the forces whom his associates in arms had so contemptuously ridiculed—General Howe determined to abandon the attempt;[1] and to withdraw his great and powerful command from Westchester-county, in search of laurels on other and more inviting fields. The two Armies continued in their respective lines, not more than a long cannon-shot from each other,[2] until the following Saturday night, [November 2,] when the American sentries heard what they supposed to have been the rumbling sound of moving artillery.[3] On Monday night, the fourth of November, however, the entire encampment of the enemy was broken up; and, on the following morning, [Tuesday, November 5,] he made a sudden and unexpected movement from all the posts, in front of the American lines, which he had previously taken[4]—as early as the preceding Monday, [October 28,] evidently preparatory to this movement, General Knyphausen, who had been left at New Rochelle, with the Second Division of the German troops, to keep open the communication between the Army and the Fleet,[5] had been ordered to leave the Regiment of Waldeckers, who formed a portion of his command, at that place, and to move with the remainder of the Division, six fresh Battalions of Hessians, towards Kingsbridge; and, on Saturday, the second of November, he had occupied a position, on New-York-island, near that place: on Sunday, the third of November, the entire Army had been ordered to provide itself with forage, for three day's consumption: on the following day, [Monday, November 4,] Major-general Grant, with the Fourth Brigade of British troops, had been moved down to Mile-Square and Valentine's-hill; General Agnew, with the Sixth Brigade of British troops, the same who had been moved to Mamaroneck, on the morning after the Queen's Rangers had been so "roughly handled" by Colonel Haslet and his command,[6] had been moved from that place to a bridge over the Bronx-river, near De Lancey's Mill, [now the village of West Farms,] in the Town of Westchester; and the Waldeckers whom General Knyphausen had left at New Rochelle, on the preceding Monday, was moved to another bridge, also over the Bronx-river, three miles above the other, [then and now known as Williams's-bridge:] and every other necessary preparation for an orderly and undisturbed retreat had, in the meanwhile, been taken.[7]

During the evening of Tuesday, the fifth of November, inspired by the teachings of General Israel Putnam,[8] and in harmony with the advanced New England ideas, of that period, with which the inhabitants of Westchester-county had already become well-acquainted,[9] as well as with those of an immediately subsequent period,[10] a body of Massachusetts troops, led by Major Austin, of Colonel Brewer's Regiment, left the Camp, and went down into the Village of the White Plains, which the enemy has abandoned, during the earlier portions of the day. The purposes of that party were such as New Englanders of that period were apt to regard as peculiarly "patriotic"—they evidently went down to see what the merciless Hessian and British soldiery had left, when the Royal Army had retreated; to select, for their own or their families' uses, and to carry away, into New England, whatever, of that remainder, should best suit their own tastes; to dispossess the women and children who were mostly the occupants of the houses; and to burn what they did not care to steal, sparing almost nothing of either public or private properties, just to "strike terrour into the Tories and influence in our "favour," as these New England thieves "patriotically" expressed it. That was the prevailing New England idea of the period, taught and illustrated by

[1] "I did not think the driving their rear-guard further back, an object "of the least consequence," were General Howe's official words, descriptive of that very important determination.

[9] The reader will remember the unauthorized raids of the banditti,, under Isaac Sears, David Waterbury, David Wooster, and other "patriotic" New Englanders, during which the most barefaced robberies of the farmers' properties, throughout Westchester-county, had been perpetrated by large bodies of armed men, from Connecticut, against whom the isolated and unarmed farmers had been powerless.

[10] "The enemy have retreated from the White Plains. It was a happy "thought, the burning of a few houses, upon our retreat from thence. "The measure convinced them they had little to expect from penetrating the country. They saw how much we would sacrifice," [of the property of others,] "to the safety of our Army and disadvantage of "theirs; at the same time, it must have struck terrour into the Tories "and influence in our favour, from the strong motive of interest, as "they perceive their dwellings, etc., depend on our success."—(Colonel Jed. Huntington to Governor Trumbull, "CAMP, NORTH-CASTLE, 7th November, 1776.")

New Englanders of the most elevated stations; and it was evidently regarded, by the New England Major and his "Christian" followers, not only a duty but a virtue, to obey the teachings of such "patriotic" and "virtuous" preceptors.

The Major and his men entered house after house, as they went down the roadways leading through the Village; carrying from each, such articles as pleased their cupidity;[1] hastening the occupants from the houses, without suffering them to dress the children, where there were children, "but drove them out of "doors, naked;"[2] carrying the sick and helpless, out-doors, on their beds, and leaving them exposed to the rigors of that November night;[3] insulting the females, with ill language and threats, in the presence of the Major; and, then, setting fire to the houses.[5] The Court-house, the Meeting-house of the Presbyterian-church, and the greater number of the dwellings, including that of Doctor Graham,[6] together with all, of furniture and provisions and clothing, which the rapacious enemy had spared for the use and support and protection of the helpless inhabitants, unless such portions of each, which the new-comers had taken away, to the Major's marquee or elsewhere, were thus wantonly and criminally destroyed.[7]

That great outrage, inflicted on the inhabitants of Westchester-county, called forth the denunciations of the Commander-in-chief, in the General Orders of the Army,[8] and those of the Committee of Safety of the State;[9] the leader of the band of ruffians who had inflicted the great wrong, only after the most vigorous effort of General Lee, was mildly "dis-"missed from the service," by the verdict of a second Court-martial, who sat in judgment, on the culprit;[10] and he was turned over to the Convention of the State, to be dealt with, in an action by the State, resulting in his escape from the Jail at Kingston, which closed the subject, on the pages of history.

On Wednesday, the sixth of November, General Howe, with that portion of the Royal Army whom he had not pushed forward toward Kingsbridge, encamped at Dobbs's-ferry;[11] and, on the same day, General Washington called a Council of his General Officers, to consult on such measures as should be adopted, in case the enemy should continue to fall back, on the City of New York.[12]

On Thursday, the seventh of November, the enemy's park of Artillery was moved to Kingsbridge, under a strong escort, with a detachment of Chasseurs, to join the Division commanded by General Knyphausen;[13] and his foraging parties were busily employed in collecting Grain and Hay, and in driving in Cattle, from all those portions of the County which were below Tarrytown, the Plains, and Rye.[14]

On Friday, the eighth of November, two Battalions of Light Infantry and the remainder of the Chasseurs, with four field-pieces, took post on the line of communication with Kingsbridge;[15] and, on the part of the Americans, the troops belonging to New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the more Southern States, began to file off, from the lines which were occupied by the American Army, "as fast as our situation and circum-"stances would admit, in order to be transported over "the river, with all expedition."[16]

On Saturday, the ninth of November, the Division commanded by General Heath, who had performed so distinguished a part in the military operations, in Westchester-county, was moved from the extreme left

The Council referred to agreed, unanimously, that, in case the enemy was really retreating towards New York, it would be proper, immediately, to throw a body of troops, into New Jersey; that those troops who were from the States to the westward of the Hudson, should be thus detached, the others to be subject to "the movements of the enemy and "the circumstances of the American Army;" and that three thousand men should be detailed to take post at Peekskill and the passes in the Highlands, for the defence of those posts, for erecting fortifications, etc.

of the line, which it had so honorably occupied; and took up its line of march, towards Peekskill, where it was to be permanently posted, for the defense of the Highlands;[1] and, on Sunday, the tenth of November, General Washington left the White Plains, to take command of those troops who had crossed the Hudson-river, and who, soon afterwards, were engaged in that disastrous retreat, through the Jerseys, and in that subsequent recovery of the greater part of that State, which so greatly distinguished him, as a commanding General, and which have been recorded, with such entire approbation, on the pages of history.[2] General Lee was left at the White Plains, with his own Division and those commanded by Generals Spencer and Sullivan, generally New York and New England troops, with orders to watch the movements of the enemy; to secure and carry off the Stores; and, then, to follow the main body of the Army, into the Jerseys.[3]

While General Washington and the main body of the American Army were thus falling back from their position, at North Castle, General Howe and the main body of the Royal Army continued to fall back and approach Kingsbridge. On Sunday, the tenth of November, a Brigade of Hessians was moved to that place, to increase the strength of General Knyphausen's already strong Division;[4] and, two days afterwards, [Tuesday, November 12,] the main body of the Royal Army broke up the encampment, at Dobbs's-ferry, which it had occupied since the preceding Wednesday, and, in two columns, moved towards Kingsbridge, resting, on the following day, [Wednesday, November 13,] on the heights of Fordham, and forming a line, with the Right upon the road leading to the Borough Town of Westchester, and covered by the Bronx-river, and with the Left on the Hudson-river,[5] where it remained, until the preparations for the assault on Fort Washington, which had been reasonably determined on, had been completed.[6]

The progress of the Royal Army through Westchester-county was distinguished by the outrages which were inflicted on the inhabitants, without respect to persons or sexes, on both those who were entirely conservative and disposed to favor the Royal cause and those who were radically and actively opposed to it—as General Washington described them, while forewarning the Governor of New Jersey of what the fate of that people would be, "they have treated all, "here, without discrimination: the distinction of "Whig and Tory has been lost in one general scene "of ravage and desolation."[7] In that work, the Hessians and the British troops were equally notorious; and what the soldiery spared, was frequently carried away by the soldiers' wives and mistresses, who formed a part of the retinue of the Army.[8] Indeed, the warmth of controversy called out from one of the most prominent Loyalists of that period, the following graphic description of the outrages inflicted by the King's troops: "The inhuman treatment alluded to, "was the indiscriminate plunder suffered to be committed, by the soldiery under his command, on "Staten Island, Long Island, the White Plains, and "in the Province of New Jersey, where friend and "foe, loyalist and rebel, met with the same fate—a "series of continued plunder, which was a disgrace to "an Army pretending to discipline, and which, while "it tended to relax the discipline of the troops, could "not fail to create the greatest aversion, even in the "breast of loyalty itself, to a service which, under the "fair pretence of giving them protection, robbed them, "in many instances, of even the necessaries of life."[9]

But the sufferings endured by the inhabitants of Westchester-county were not confined to those which were produced by the outrages inflicted by the Royal Army and its followers. We have already alluded,[10] incidentally, to the robberies of Horses which were inflicted on the farmers of that County, by Officers of the American Army, for their private uses, at their respective homes—not by the Rank and File, nor by the soldiers' wives and concubines, nor in a foreign country; but by the Commissioned Officers of the Army of Americans who had been moved into the County, for the protection of the inhabitants and of their properties. To such an extent were those robberies of Horses, to be sent to the homes of the thieves, for their private uses, carried on, that, after several General Orders, bearing on the subject, had been issued, without having checked the career of robbery, General Washington was constrained to issue another, in these words, sufficiently illustrative of the practices and of his views concerning them: "It is with astonishment the General hears that some "Officers have taken Horses, between the enemy's "Camp and ours, and sent them into the country, for "their private use. Can it be possible that per- "sons bearing Commissions and fighting in such "a cause, can degrade themselves into plunderers of "Horses? He hopes every Officer will set his face "against it, in future; and does insist that the "Colonels and commanding Officers of Regiments im- "mediately inquire into the matter, and report to him "who have been guilty of these practices; and that "they take an account of the Horses in their re- "spective encampments; and send to the Quarter- "master-general all that are not in some public "service."[1]

While some of the Officers of the American Army were thus employed in replenishing their own stables, at their respective homes, from the stables of the farmers of Westchester-county, others of that Army, Officers and Privates, were systematically visiting the houses of those farmers and robbing them of whatever was acceptable to them. Like the British and Hessians, they were not respecters of either the friends of the American cause or those of the King; nor did they hesitate to rob helpless and unprotected females and their families; sometimes turning them out of their houses, undressed and in their night-clothes; and, generally, adding personal abuse of their victims to the crime of robbing them. Nothing whatever was unacceptable to the thieves; and the bags of Feathers and of unmanufactured Wool, the Desks and Tea-tables and Chairs, the Book-cases and Books, the Andirons and brass and copper Kettles, the linen Curtains and Looking-glasses and women's Hats, the Churns and Washtubs, the sets of Sleigh-harness and skips of Bees, which appear recorded among the articles which were thus stolen by the soldiers whom Massachusetts and Connecticut had sent into the Army, very clearly indicated that while the Horses of the farmers of Westchester-county were stolen for the supplying of the stables of the thieves, at their respective homes, the Household Furniture belonging to the same farmers, and the Clothing of their wives, and their unmanufactured Wool and Feathers, and their Bees, were also stolen for the purpose of enriching the homes and the work-rooms and the gardens of those same "Christian" New Englanders, and the wardrobes of their families. Among those who were thus robbed were Miles Oakley, who was the Landlord of the Tavern, contiguous to the Court-house, in the Village of the White Plains;[2] John Martine, the grandfather of the late Caleb Martine of Greenburgh and of the widow of the late Thomas Dean of Tarrytown, whose homestead is now occupied by Isaac F. Van Wart, of Greenburgh; Talman Pugsley, who is said to have lived where the brick School-house now stands, opposite to the residence of Abraham Beare, of Greenburgh; Phœbe Oakley, who was the sister-in-law of Talman Pugsley; Marmaduke Foster, who was the son-in-law of John Martine; and Solomon Pugsley and the widow Elizabeth Pugsley, whose places of residence are not known to us; and their Depositions and Statements and the Schedules of the articles stolen from John Martine and his son-in-law, afford, at once, the evidence of the robberies and of the comforts which were to be found in the homes of the quiet and industrious and intelligent residents of Westchester-county, at that time.[3] Among the thieves whose names have come down to us, were Major Bacon, Captains Gale, Shaddock, and Ford, and others, of Colonel Brewer's Regiment of Artificers, of the Massachusetts Line; and Officers and Privates of the Regiment of Connecticut troops, commanded by Colonel Charles Webb.[4]

In view of these great outrages, and of many others of which no records have been preserved, the Committee of Safety for the State addressed a letter to the President of the Continental Congress, in which are these concluding words: "I have the satisfaction "to assure you that the fortitude of this State and "their zeal for the glorious cause in which we are "engaged, is not abated; on the contrary, we are "prepared to meet even severer misfortunes, with a "spirit and firmness becoming the generous advo-

[2] On page 68, ante, note 1, we referred to a Tavern, also contiguous to the Court-house, which, in April, 1775, was said to have been the meeting-place of Lewis Morris and his friends; to have been kept by Isaac Oakley; and to have stood until about 1868, when it was burned.

Unless there were two Taverns, in the White Plains, with Oakleys for their Landlords, in 1775 and 1776; or, unless Miles had succeeded Isaac, as the Landlord of the one Tavern which was "Oakley's "Tavern," between April, 1775, and November, 1776, we were probably in error, in our former statement, concerning the name of the Oakley who was the Landlord of that Tavern which was, there, mentioned: and if only one "Oakley's Tavern" was in existence, in the White Plains, at that time, it was among the buildings which were burned by Major Austin, on the fifth of November, 1776, (vide pages 452, 453, ante;) and, therefore, was not standing until 1868, as stated on page 244.

We have not been able to ascertain the facts; and so leave the matter in doubt.

"cates for Liberty. Unhappily am I to add, that, "amidst all our suffering, the Army employed for "the protection of America have not refrained from "embittering even the calamities of War. At a "time when the utmost resources of this State were "laid open to their wants, and the members of Con-"vention personally submitted to the labour and "fatigue which were necessary, on a sudden emer-"gency, and after frequent losses of Provisions and "Barracks, to supply two numerous Armies, aug-"mented by the Militia, with every article which "they required, the Court-house and the remains of "the Village, at the White Plains, which had been "spared, on the retreat of our forces, was, after the "enemy had, in their turn, retired, wantonly de-"stroyed, without the Orders and to the infinite re-"gret of our worthy General. Besides, in spite of "all his Excellency's efforts, wherever our troops "have marched or been stationed, they have done "infinite damage to the possessions and farms, and "have pilfered the property of the people.

"I am directed, Sir, to submit it to the honourable "Congress, whether some effectual remedy ought "not to be provided against such disorderly and dis-"graceful proceedings. The soldier who plunders "the country he is employed to protect, is no better "than a robber, and ought to be treated accordingly; "and a severe example ought, in the opinion of the "Committee, to be made of the Officer who, without "necessity or his General's permission, set fire to the "Court-house and other buildings, at the White "Plains. He is guilty of the crime of Arson; and if "he cannot be punished by the Articles of War, he "ought to be given up to the Laws of the land. If "so glaring a violation of every sentiment of human-"ity should be passed over, in silence, if the Army "is not seasonably restrained from such acts of bar-"barity, the consequence must be fatal to the cause "of a people whose exalted glory it is to be advocates "for the Rights of Mankind against the tyranny and "oppression of lawless power."[1]

The conduct of General Washington, in the trying events of that memorable Campaign, in Westchester-county, has received the unqualified approbation of his country and of the world, and secured for him the highest honors, as a Soldier and as a commanding General. The conduct of General Howe, during the same Campaign, received nothing else than the approval of the King, his step-brother, and that of the party of the Opposition, in the Parliament, of which he was a member, and which was, peculiarly, the party who was in sympathy with America.

Both the Admiral and the General, commanders, respectively, of the King's Fleet and Army, were accused, by the Press of Great Britain and in the Parliament, with want of wisdom, in the formation of their plans; and with want of vigor and energy, in the execution of those plans.[2] "A connection with "the Opposition, and a resolution, assumed before "their departure from England, to frustrate every "measure of the" [then] "present Administration, "and, thereby, to bring them" [the Administration,] "into disgrace with their Sovereign and the Nation," were, also, boldly charged on the two brothers;[3] while others "shrewdly suspected that their poverty, not "their will, consented"—they said that it was "ob-"vious to all, that, had the Admiral destroyed the "rebel ships, in their ports, or effectually blockaded "up their harbors, no valuable captures of Tobacco or "Indigo could have fallen to the share of the British "Admiral;" and they did not hesitate to assert that large fortunes were accumulated, from that source.[4] They also took advantage of the friendship which had existed between the family of Howe and the Americans, during the French War; and they boldly charged the brothers with positive friendship for the American cause.[5] All of these charges were, probably, more or less true. The two brothers were indolent men; fond of company, wine, and play: they were, in fact, identified with the party of the Opposition: they did not attempt to conceal the sympathy, which, to some extent, they felt for the Americans: like other Commanders, in both ancient and modern times, they probably kept a sharp eye on the spoils. But there were, also, other circumstances, of which their accusers knew nothing and of which the world, to-day, knows only very little, which largely controlled them; and it is only reasonable and fair, therefore, that the accused should, also, be heard on the subject—when a Committee of the House of Commons was charged with the grave duty of inquiring into the conduct of General Howe, during his command of the King's troops in North America, that distinguished Officer made a written defense, in which we find the following words, relative to the operations of the Royal Army, in Westchester-county:

"From the twelfth of October, the day the Army "landed on Frog's-neck, to the twenty-first of the "same month, we were employed in getting up Stores "and Provisions; and in bringing over the Dragoons, "the Second Division of Hessians, and the carriages "and horses for transportating Provisions, Artillery, "Ammunition, and Baggage. Four or five days had "been unavoidably taken up in landing at Frog's-"neck, instead of going, at once, to Pell's-point, "which would have been an imprudent measure, as it "could not have been executed without much un-"necessary risk.

"On the twenty-eighth of October, the engagement "at the White-Plains took place. But it has been "asserted, that, by my not attacking the lines, on the "day of that action, I lost an opportunity of destroy-"ing the Rebel Army; and it has been also said, "that I might have cut off the enemy's retreat by the "Croton-bridge. Sir: an assault upon the enemy's "right, which was opposed to the Hessian troops, "was intended. The Committee must give me credit "when I assure them, that I have political reasons, "and no other, for declining to explain why that as-"sault was not made. Upon a minute inquiry, those "reasons might, if necessary, be brought out, in evi-"dence, at the Bar. If, however, the assault had been "made, and the lines carried, the enemy would have "got off, without much loss; and no way had we, "that I could ever learn, of cutting off their retreat "by the Croton-bridge. I cannot conceive the foun-"dation of such an idea. By forcing the lines, we "should, undoubtedly, have gained a more brilliant "advantage, some Baggage, and some Provisions; but "we had no reason to suppose that the Rebel Army "could have been destroyed. The ground in their "rear was such as they could wish, for securing their "retreat, which, indeed, seemed to be their particular "object. And, Sir, I do not hesitate to confess that, "if I could, by any manœuvre, remove an enemy "from a very advantageous position, without hazard-"ing the consequences of an attack, where the point "to be carried was not adequate to the loss of men to "be expected from the enterprise, I should certainly "adopt that cautionary conduct, in the hopes of "meeting my adversary upon more equal terms."[1]

The careful student of that portion of the history of our own country which relates to the Campaign in Westchester-county, in 1776, will arise from the examination of it with the words on his lips which the Apostle Paul employed, in another connection: "God "hath chosen the foolish things of the world to con-"found the wise, and God hath chosen the weake "things of the world, to confound the mighty things, "and vile things of the world, and things which are "despised, hath God chosen, and things which are "not, to bring to nought things that are."[2]

CHAPTER VII.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS DURING THE COLONIAL AND PROVINCIAL PERIODS.

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, A.M. LL.D.

"THE history of nations," said Taine, "is the history of the men who make up nations; it is in the homes of the common people, their daily lives and their ambitions, that we find the motives which actuate the most important national events, revolutionize governments and change the political geography of continents." To no communities could this judicious comment of the keenest of critics be more aptly applied than to those which, derived from all the maritime peoples of Europe, laid broad and deep the stable foundations of Caucasian civilization in North America and erected upon them the impregnable structure of free government. Writers of history never so generally recognized as they do now that to construct an intelligent and comprehensive narrative of a State, or its divisions they must seek the source of truth and the springs of action at the firesides of the pioneers of population and the civil establishment. No department of historical research is more fascinating to the student or the reader than that which throws a penetrating light upon the domestic life of the founders of our present society and government, and brings them out in bold relief as they transacted their business and household affairs, paid court to the blooming maidens who became their wives, reared their children, mingled in their feasts and festivals, built their churches and struggled to bequeath to their children the heritage of honored names and goodly estates. Rich as were all the early settlements of North America in this field of study, no section is more attractive than that in which Westchester County is embraced. The successive tides of Dutch and English immigration, the original sharp definition of the lines which separated the two nationalities, the obliteration of those lines by a merging of racial interests, the institution of slavery, the growth of the colony toward moneyed prosperity, the influence of the Revolutionary War in domestic circles, the political and social readjustment which followed it—all these epochs are vitalized by stirring, important and interesting incidents and phases that are gifted with an enduring charm for the generations succeeding the actors in them.

Traders rather than colonists, the Dutch settlers were slow to move northward on the Hudson until the purchases of Indian lands by the West Indian Company, by Brons and by Adrian von der Donck. About 1623 they began to undertake the colonization of the valley of the Hudson, and were followed by the English and the Huguenots. "Westchester," writes Mrs. Catharine Van Cortlandt,[1] in a hitherto unpublished sketch of the early settlers, their manners and customs, "was not as Dutch a county as many others, although many of its settlers were Hollanders and their descendants. The Dutch language was not so much spoken as in Rockland or Orange. In the southern part of the county the Huguenot and English stocks prevailed, and the near proximity of New York caused an advance in their customs and manners. In the Dutch Churches in the northern part of the county the congregations clung tenaciously to their language and usages, yielding to the encroachments of the English step by step and grudgingly."

The few adventurers who challenged fortune outside of Manhattan [1] toward the close of the first quarter of the seventeenth century, and pushed up the river, invaded the primeval forests with a view of securing land for cultivation, or else established fisheries on the shore. Many probably made their first dwellings along the river in caves formed by digging into the bank; but they soon learned from the Indians the construction of bark wigwams, which afforded a much more comfortable abode, and which, when improved by the devices which suggested themselves to the European mind, became the log cabins renowned in song and story. The house of logs from which the bark had been peeled was a mark of gentility and a second story was a luxury, although the occupant might have to reach his chamber under the roof-poles by ascending steps on the outside, or by climbing up a perpendicular ladder within the house. A dwelling of logs hewn and squared with the broad axe and adze was the highest of the kind. But about 1635 a class of immigrants began to arrive who gave a new character to the Hudson region. They were Hollanders and Huguenots, who came with large amounts of ready money to occupy vast grants of land, most of which had manorial rights attached to them. With their large families and troops of servants, white and black, they of necessity erected large and comfortable mansions on the plan of those from which they had taken their departure in the Fatherland. "In New York and the region about the Hudson River," wrote Rev. Edward Eggleston, "the foundation form of the early dwelling was the Dutch house built with its gable to the street. The top of the gable wall was notched into corbel steps, and the black fire-bricks of the kiln were laid alternating with red or yellow ones to make checks on the gable front." Mrs. Van Cortlandt sketches the houses of the middle class and farmers, which, she says, were of rough stone when they were not of brick. She adds: "The windows were filled in with small panes of glass; the heavy wooden outside shutters swung upon massive iron hinges. They had usually a crescent cut near the top to admit the early light, and were held back by an iron somewhat in the shape of an S inserted in the stone wall. As ground was cheap, these houses were large in extent and commonly a story and a half in height, the roof sloping steeply from the ridge pole, and dormer windows broke its uniformity. Double-pitched houses were of later date, as were those in the interior of the county shingled on the sides as well as on the roof. The front door was invariably divided into halves; in the upper half were two bull's eyes of glass to light the hall, and it was graced with a heavy brass knocker. The lower half had a heavy latch. A wide piazza surrounded the house. In the villages a front stoop was common, with benches on each side. Here the families took their evening rest and the neighbors discussed the questions of the day. The houses mostly had a southern exposure. Attached to them was usually an extension for the kitchen and the use of the servants, which was generally built of brick. Many bricks were brought from Holland, but these extensions or wings were most frequently built of rough brick from the kilns on the Hudson River, of which early mention is made.

"In houses of much size the rooms were often wainscoted to the height of about three feet, or a chair board (a beveled moulding) ran about the same height from the floor. Sometimes the wainscot was carved, as well as the paneling about the deep wooden seats and the mantel-pieces. The fire-places occupied a large space, in some very old houses being placed cornerwise. Tiles, usually of Scripture scenes, adorned the fire-places. Some were of quite fine ware, entirely white, as in the Van Cortlandt Manor-house, where one or two were spared by the soldiers when removing the rest to use as plates. The fire-irons, fender and andirons were of solid brass and always as brilliant as hands could make them, forming with the fire a perfect picture, but alas for those who in biting winter days could not get close to that fire!"

As the colony grew stronger the Dutch scattered farther in the interior and luxury invaded the towns which they and the other settlers founded along the Hudson. As they built better houses they made or imported fine furniture for them, but the earlier equipments of the living rooms were as rude in character as scant in number. The pallet on the floor—"the Kermis bed," as the Dutch called it—was an occasional resort, even in good houses. The Labadist travelers in 1688 sojourned in a tavern near the Hudson that put its guests to sleep on a horse bedding of for much valuable information pertaining to the early history of Westchester County that could not elsewhere be obtained. The family records in her possession are improved in their historical worth by her arrangement of them, and by her clear and logical deductions from the facts which they contain. She has taken the utmost interest in the preparation of this history and has contributed to it material that is unique both in its character and importance.

[1] In the Indian language, Manahachtanienks—"the place where they all got drunk"—so called by the Indians, says that indefatigable chronicler John F. Watson, in commemoration of their first meeting with Captain Hudson, when that celebrated man made them acquainted with the peculiar effects of strong drink, which according to the tradition handed down to their descendants by these unsophisticated savages, "produced staggering and happy feeling."—Watson's "New York in the Olden Time."

hay before the fire; and a hundred years later Chateaubriand found an inn on the New York frontier where everybody slept about a central post that upheld the roof, heads outward and feet toward the centre. This was the manner common in England in King Alfred's day, thirteen centuries ago. Such poor people in the colonies as possessed tastes too luxurious to enjoy a deer-skin on the hearth, were accustomed to fill their bed-sacks and pillows with fibrous mistletoe, the down of the cat-tail flag, or with feathers of pigeons slaughtered from the innumerable migrating flocks. Cotton from the milk-weed, then called "silk grass," was used for pillows and cushions.

No contrast could be sharper than that between such primitive accommodations and the elegance which marked the manor-houses, which were the pride of the colony. The patroons, and indeed all the landed proprietors, gloried in the solid magnificence of their household appurtenances. Mrs. Van Cortlandt has written of these stately houses so graphically that pictures of them may be recreated in the mind's eye from her description: "The furniture of well-to-do people was massive and costly and that of the plainer classes good and made to last. Large sideboards were loaded with silver beakers, tankards, candlesticks and mugs. The latter were used at funerals to hold mulled wine. In Albany it was the custom to borrow these mugs of all the relatives and return them after the funeral filled with the fragrant compound, and doubtless this was also done in Westchester. The sideboards also held inlaid mahogany boxes, which contained the spoons and forks. A cellaret of mahogany bound in brass and lined with metal was the receptacle of the wine bottles. Heavy old mahogany chairs, with leather bottoms, and massive tables, whose leaves let down, completed the furniture of the dining-room. The cupboards set in the walls held china, which was often very beautiful, especially that of the favorite Lowestoffe and Chinese makes. The glassware was finely cut, and some of the goblets had stems adorned with spiral threads of opaque glass. Pewter platters, plates, dishes and mugs were in daily use.[1]

"The bed-room furniture embraced an enormous four-post bedstead, the posts handsomely carved and supporting a canopy or tester hung with dimity or fringed chintz curtains and a fringed valance to match.[2] A sacking bottom was pierced at intervals with large holes, worked with coarse linen thread in button-hole stitch. Through these orifices a stout rope was inserted and drawn around the corresponding pegs in the bedstead by strong hands, and upon this foundation great feather beds were piled. In the guest chamber, over the blankets and sheets was spread a white quilt, which was often a work of art, so beautifully was it quilted and so well were roses and tulips delineated by the needle upon its surface. The small wash-stands were frequently three-cornered, and the ware they held was usually dark blue and white. Venetian blinds shaded the windows, and were very troublesome because of the entangling of the cords which raised and lowered them. A large stuffed chair, covered with chintz or dimity, was an indispensable piece of furniture, as was also a bright brass warming-pan. After a while great tin-plate stoves warmed the bed chambers, the Franklin stoves being reserved for the parlors and sitting-rooms.

OLD STYLE SILVER TEA SERVICE.

"The toilet table was usually of wood, in half-moon shape, the top covered with linen or muslin beautifully quilted. I have such a cover, very artistically worked with oak leaves and acorns. Sometimes the bed and window-curtains were of chintz, worked with birds and flowers never known to nature. One set yet preserved represents Fame with a trumpet hovering over Washington, upon whose brow she is placing a laurel wreath. The curious and, in some cases, very beautiful blue and white counterpanes, still to be found in old houses, were woven at a factory in the interior of Westchester County. Infants

[1] These pewter utensils were highly valued. One man, in 1690, leaves to his wife "her bed and some small reversions of pewter," and to his daughter "two great charges of pewter, two pewter platters next to them, two lesser platters, a flaggon and a cow." A widow, in 1688, relinquishes her thirds in favor of her two sons, who promise her a certain yearly allowance—"only her wearing clothes, with her bed and what belonged to it and her peweter—those to remain to her and to be at her disposal."—History of Rye, by Rev. Chas. W. Baird.

[2] One must have slept in a Dutch bed to understand the bliss or agony resulting from its peculiar arrangement. Going to bed in this case is a science. The first difficulty for a novice is to let himself drop into the very middle of the feathery mass, on his back; he sinks and the soft mass closes round him, leaving but a longitudinal strip of his body exposed. Now comes the last and most difficult act. By an adroit twist of his wrist he must bring the narrow down coverlet right over the aperture; if he succeeds he soon falls into blissful oblivion; if he fails he will feel for the remainder of the night as though he were lying in a bed of hot ashes and having iced water poured over him. The "sloap banck," or "bunk," was an humbler style of bedstead in use, but it had also its bed of live-geese feathers.

were put to rest in heavy mahogany cradles, which had a sort of roof extending over the head to shield the child's eyes from the light.

"The parlors or drawing-rooms were laid with Turkey carpets, and round mirrors hung on the walls. They were topped with brass eagles, and fitted with branches for holding the wax candles used by the rich. Other mirrors were oblong, and divided by a gilt moulding about a foot and a half from the top. In some cases the upper division was of glass; but more frequently it held a picture. I have one the upper compartment of which displays a group of military weapons, drums, etc., with a female figure mourning the death of Washington. Mantel glasses were separated into three divisions by strips of narrow gilt moulding. Small tables, with claw feet holding a ball, were used, and mahogany stands, with tops that turned; these could be placed in the corners to occupy very little room.

"GRANDFATHER'S" CLOCK.

"Tall eight-day clocks in mahogany or ebony and gilt frames were found in all households of the better class. One that was stolen from the Van Cortlandt manor-house during the Revolution was cased in gilded ebony, and above its face was a painting of the Queen of Sheba on her way to lay her gifts at the feet of King Solomon. If these big time-pieces were not decorated with a figure-painting, a marine view or a landscape, they bore the sun and moon between the dial and the top of the frame.

"At the entertainments of the rich the tables fairly groaned under their weight of viands. All sorts of meats, fowl, fish, oysters and clams burdened them, while the choice wines tickled the palates of connoisseurs. Perhaps they favored none more than the renowned vintage of the south side of the island of Madeira. For a more potent drink they resorted to 'rack punch,' a concoction in which the strong arrack was the principal ingredient. Toasts were drunk at all dinners, the gentlemen proposing the ladies and the ladies the gentlemen.

"There was plenty of employment for sportsmen. Wild turkeys, pheasants, quail and other feathered game abounded, and Cooper tells us that as late as 1755 'nothing was easier than to knock over a buck in the Highlands.' The negroes were uniformly good shots, and used pointers and setters when hunting.

"The kitchen fire-places were of huge size. A large back-log was rolled into the yawning cavity by the united power of stout men-servants, and on the massive iron andirons hickory and other wood was piled, while the whole fiery mass was kept in place by a heavy fore-stick. The iron shovel and tongs seemed fit for the use of giants. Before these leaping flames and glowing logs stood, in the morning, a ponderous tin 'Dutch oven,' on whose spear-like spit revolved a turkey, a saddle of mutton or a roast of beef. The spit was turned by one of the many little darkeys who peopled the kitchen of every great homestead. In a corner of the fire-place stood, on thick squat legs, a bake-pot, filled with a savory mess, and its iron lid covered with hot embers. From beneath the chimney-piece swung the crane, whose long, horizontal arm bore a profusion of pot-hooks and trammels, from which depended innumerable pots, long-handled frying-pans and other paraphernalia of the cuisine. But no kitchen utensil was more unique than the wooden bowls which the Indians fashioned from the knots of the maple tree and sold to the house-keepers. Scoured to immaculate whiteness, they had their place in every family and were highly prized.

"At Christmas and other holiday seasons the stupendous brick ovens, without which no gentleman's house could be thought thoroughly equipped, would be filled three times a day—first with generous loaves of wheat and rye, then with chicken and game pastries, and lastly with the succulent mince, apple and cranberry pies.

"A necessary labor in spring and autumn was the making, or dipping, of tallow candles. Six cotton wicks would be doubled over a rod, then dipped in the melted tallow and drawn between the manipulator's finger and thumb until the tallow gained some consistency. The rod was hung up while the candles dried and a second dipping and drawing finished the work. Presently some unknown genius invented a frame that held thirty-six wicks, and eight or ten such frames made the labor quick and easy of performance. Tin molds were employed when a small supply of candles was needed, and the big box of 'dips' nearly empty. Mr. Jesse Ryder, of Ossining, says that at one time cotton was so high priced that tow was used for wicks, and the 'dips' gave a poor light. Candlesticks for the kitchen were cut from large, square wooden blocks.

"'Killing time' was a country festival. Before Christmas the oaken lard kegs and the capacious beef and pork casks were cleaned. Then the hogs and cattle were slaughtered, and abundant supplies of souse, sausage, hams, jowls, bacon, pork and beef laid away. Curing occupied much time with the rude implements of the day. Sausage meat cut into half-inch pieces was thrown into wooden boxes two and a-half or three feet long by ten inches deep, where men armed with spades ground to a razor-edge, chopped it into tiny fragments. By the help of a small tin tube, it was packed in small linen bags, or casings, as they were called.

"Soap-making was an occupation of the spring. Great leach tubs standing out of doors on high frames were filled with wood ashes, on which water was slowly poured to produce lye, and the work of soap-boiling began. To be perfect soft-soap, it must be 'white as snow and thick as liver.'

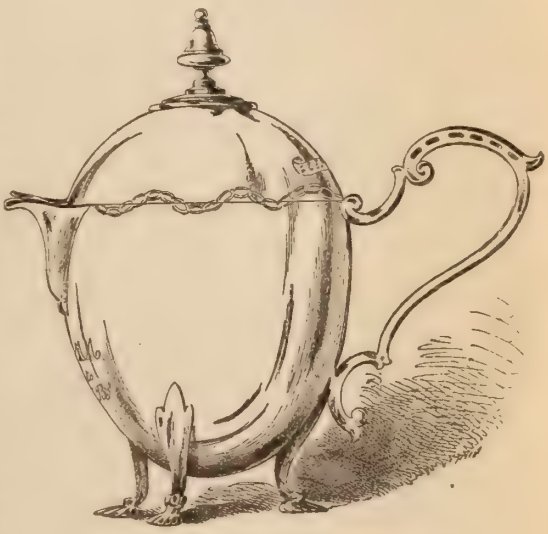
"Matches were not known; so the tinder-box, with its flint and charred linen rag, did duty. When illness was in the household, or the nursery needed a light, a minute wax taper floating in a wine-glass filled with sperm oil provided a faint illumination. Sperm oil lamps came into use very much later."



Washington Irving brought out with fine detail many features of the old Dutch social life. In his facetious notices of New York in the early colonial days he merely made fictitious personages to move amid actual scenes. His "Knickerbocker" is made to say of the "grand parlour:" "In this sacred apartment no one was permitted to enter, excepting the mistress and her confidential maid, who visited it once a week for the purpose of giving it a thorough cleaning and putting things to rights, always taking the precaution of leaving their shoes at the door, and entering lightly on their stocking feet. After scrubbing the floor and sprinkling it with fine white sand, which was curiously stroked into angles and curves with a broom; after washing the windows, rubbing and polishing the furniture, and putting a new bunch of evergreens in the fire-place, the window-shutters were again closed to keep out the flies, and the room carefully locked up, until the revolution of time brought round the weekly cleaning day.

"As to the family, they always entered in at the gate, and most generally lived in the kitchen . . . The fire-places were of a truly patriarchal magnitude, where the whole family, old and young, master and servant, black and white, nay, even the cat and dog enjoyed a community of privilege, and each a right to a corner.

"In these primitive days, a well-regulated family always rose with the dawn, dined at eleven and went to bed at sundown." Our frugal ancestors were averse, it seems, to giving dinners, but the wealthier classes "that is to say, such as kept their own cows, and drove their own wagons," gave tea-parties. On these occasions the company assembled about three o'clock, and went away at six—even earlier in winter-time. "Knickerbocker" describes these parties,—

"The tea was served out of a majestic delft tea-pot, ornamented with paintings of fat little Dutch shepherds and shepherdesses tending pigs, with boats sailing in the air, and houses built in the clouds, and sundry other ingenious Dutch fantasies. The beaux distinguished themselves by their adroitness in replenishing this pot, from a huge copper tea-kettle, which might make the beaux of the present day sweat merely to look at it! To sweeten the beverage, a lump of sugar was laid beside each cup, and the company alternately nibbled and sipped with great decorum." In such parties propriety and dignity of deportment prevailed; "the young ladies seated themselves demurely in their rush-bottomed chairs, and knit their own woolen stockings, speaking but little, and chiefly in brief answers to questions put to them, few and far between. As to the gentlemen, each of them tranquilly smoked his pipe, and seemed lost in contemplation of the blue and white tiles with which the fire-places were decorated, wherein sundry passages of Scripture were piously portrayed."

The dress of the people varied with their fortunes and the change from the log cabin epoch to that of the wealthy and courtly inhabitants of the broad manors. The men who first adventured into the woods learned from the Indians to wear dressed skins and moccasins, but with those of the towns and farmsteads their ambition, as well as that of their womenfolk, was to dress in the manner of "the best fashion at home." Long hair was universal in the days before periwigs. Cutting the hair short was the brand of disgrace and the mark of identification affixed to a servant who ran away before his term of indenture had expired. Puritanism was somewhat successful in its fight against long hair, but when the periwig re-appeared, in the reign of Charles II., it proved too enticing for human vanity to resist. It probably succumbed at length to the very completeness of its victory. Not only men of dignity wore it, but many humbler men followed their example. "One finds," says Mr. Eggleston, "half-fed country schoolmasters in wigs; tradesmen also proceeded to shave off their natural hair and don the mass of thread, silk, horsehair or women's hair, with which wigs of various kinds were compounded. Apprentice lads under twenty are described in advertisements of runaways as wearing wigs; hired servants aped the quality, and transported rogues were tricked out in wigs to make them marketable." After 1750 the decline of the wig began, but the natural hair was curled, frizzled, powdered, queued and clubbed.[1] The rage for growing the longest possible switch of hair infected all classes; sailors and boatmen wrapped in eelskin their cherished locks, and the back countryman was accustomed to preserve his by enveloping it in a piece of bear's gut dyed red, or clubbing it in a buckskin bag. Women wore the lofty "tower" or "commode" head-dress, which, in the exaggeration that preceded its abolition, usually exceeded in its height the length of the face below it. The Dutch dames did not fall victims to any of the eccentricities of fashion; but with their close-fitting caps, velvet bodices, short and voluminous skirts—the muslin petticoats crisp and stiff with starch—the household keys hanging from their girdles and their capacious pockets filled with scissors, pin-cushion and other domestic tools, made a stubborn fight against the encroachments of the female dandyisms imported from across the Atlantic.

In course of time the homespun linsey became the ordinary wear in the farmers' homes, but up to the opening of the Revolutionary epoch "My Lady of the Manor" luxuriated in costumes that rivaled the extreme modes of European aristocratic circles. She might be a year late in adopting them, but she was not responsible for their delay in reaching her, and there are certain cotemporary records which leave no doubt in the mind that she and her daughters were not backward even in adopting and continuing the ultra decollete gowns which the Stuart Restoration made indispensable to an English fashionable woman. They embraced themselves in the cruel stays that compressed their figures into the wasp-like waist then the object of foolish admiration, and tilted themselves forward on the pinching and high-heeled shoes, which had passed from Louis Quatorze to Charles II., and thence to the colonies. The stalwart and heroic impulses which united the colonies in their revolt against the British monarchy penetrated all classes of society, and as the crisis approached dress became simpler and the great ladies co-operated with their lords to represent in their own persons the economy and plainness which typified the coming era of war and republicanism.

As to the women in their homes, Mrs. Van Cortlandt has to say,—

"Knitting was an art much cultivated, the Dutch women excelling in the variety and intricacy of the stitches. A knitting sheath, which might be of silver or of a homely goose quill, was an indispensable utensil to the dame, and beside it hung a ball pin-cushion. Crewel work and silk embroidery were fashionable, and surprisingly pretty effects were produced. Every little maiden had her sampler, which she began with the alphabet and numerals, following them with a Scriptural text or verse of a metrical psalm. Then the fancy was let loose on birds, beasts and trees. Most of the old families possessed framed pieces of embroidery, the handiwork of female ancestors, some of which can stand comparison with the Kensington productions of this day. Flounces and trimmings for aprons, worked with delicately tinted silks on muslins, were common. The hand painting of strips of trimming for dresses is not a modern art. I have several yards of fine muslin painted in the early days with full-blown thistles in the appropriate colors. Fringe looms were in use and cotton and silk fringe was woven. The former was used for the fine dimity wrappers worn in the morning. These garments were trimmed with cotton inserting and a cotton cord and tassels confined them at the waist. Chintz, usually of East India manufacture, with vivid colors on a white ground, was in vogue, and made up into a sack and petticoat. Large and showy patterns of flowers and buds prevailed.

"For full dress, brocades and moire antique were worn. The robe of a bride in 1748 was of moire antique with a long train, the sleeves coming to the elbow. The bosom and sleeves were trimmed with lace, headed by a narrow pinked ruffle of the silk. The exquisitely quilted petticoat came from Holland, as did the clocked silk stockings, a present to the bride. Canton crape, levantine, lutestring silk and other silks were worn by the ladies. Leno, a muslin with a very open mesh, was used for trimming. Dainty half handkerchiefs, with narrow embroidered borders of gold or silver thread, were worn as fichus. Powder was in general use and the hair was dressed on high rolls in front and tied behind in a sort of bag-shaped queue. Aprons much trimmed and embroidered were a part of full dress, and hoops were also in vogue. Slippers of silk and kid had immensely high heels, sloping to the instep, and it is a marvel how the wearers balanced themselves. Fortunately, the dance they favored was the slow and stately Minuet. Necklaces were mostly made of heavy gold beads, plain or carved. Fans were very large and handsome. Here and there in old families still are seen very beautiful chatelaines, from which hung the watch and seals.

"When calves were killed for family use, the skins were tanned and kept until the peripatetic shoemaker, who traveled through the country, made his annual visit, when he halted long enough to make shoes for the elders, the children and the servants. The tailoress, too, made yearly or semi-yearly visits and undertook to turn the homespun cloth into garments. The coming of the mantua-maker, with her European patterns, created a lively stir among the matrons and maidens. Sewing in those days was done with fine linen thread, that even yet defies time and wear to destroy it."

Among the Dutch, the opulent burghers compared

[1] The Assembly of New York resolved September 9, 1730, that a tax of three shillings be laid "on every inhabitant, resident or sojourner, young or old, within the colony, that wears a wig or peruke made of human or horse hair mixed, by whatever denomination the same may be distinguished."—"*Histor. to their wives and daughters as the peacock does to the hen. The women's dress was sober, but the men's many coats, their silk and velvet small-clothes, their silver buttons[1] and fine linen stood for a good deal of money in each individual instance. The English colonial gentlemen did not stint themselves, but kept as close to the models of the London tailors as time and distance would permit. Lacking any other exemplar for such display, they could find one in the equipments of the British officers stationed in New York. Captain Cæsar Carter, who was stationed there in 1692, was the envied possessor of a wardrobe which cost nearly a thousand dollars outside of his military accoutrements. Jacques Cosseau, a merchant who was a bankrupt before his death, in 1682, possessed but three old coats, the same number of old shirts, two pair of worn-out breeches and one neck-cloth; but Dr. Jacob De Lange, a prosperous professional gentleman, rejoiced in this sort of wardrobe,—

[1] Silver buttons and buckles marked every gentleman's costume. The plate silver buttons, made of Spanish dollars and smaller coins, which flourished in England in the days of Queen Anne, were worn in America. All full dress for gentlemen required knee and shoe-buckles, which were of silver or, for great occasions, of paste, artistically set in blue enamel and gold, and costing one hundred dollars the pair. The business of the dealer in buckles was as important as that of the hair-dresser or the maker of stays.

It is not the easiest of tasks to follow up the evolutions of dress as styles grew into extravagance up to the last quarter of the eighteenth century. When peacock gorgeousness prevailed, men and women vied with each other in the costliness of their costumes, and sartorial sobriety was left to some families of unmixed Dutch blood. The price of good cloth, prior to the Revolution, being a guinea a yard, gentlemen of a frugal disposition would have a coat turned when it had lost its original freshness, so as to make it do duty twice as long. After that it went to the servant. Mechanics, workingmen and country people wore leather breeches, leather aprons and baize vests of red or green. The dress of a runaway apprentice is described in an advertisement of 1753: "A blue coat with black mohair buttons, blue lapelled waist-coat, the lapells lined with black velvet, a pair of black leather breeches with solid silver buttons and a brown wig."

To the cumbrous hoops, which came into fashion after the "wide skirts" of the ladies, succeeded the "bishop," a half-circular pillow stuffed with horse-hair and supposed to give more natural elegance to the figure. This, in turn, was superseded by the "queue de Paris," an abridged edition of the "bishop," and not unlike the "bustle" of our day. The press, during all this time, tried in vain to exercise its nascent power by denouncing folly. An editor gives vent to his indignation in the following outburst (1754): "These foreign invaders first made their attack upon the stays, so as to diminish them half down the waist, exposing the breast and shoulders. Next to the caps; cut off the flappets and tabs, bored and padlocked the ears. Next came the wide hoops and French pocket-holes; and, last of all, have lately shortened the rear, so that the heels and ancles are exposed, even to the very gusset and clock! O, shame! shame!" The indignant editor should have reflected that when stockings are made of a "lively green" color, with "great red clocks," like the pair worn by a very worthy lady of that period on her wedding-day, it was intended, probably, that they should be seen, as high, at least, as the gusset and clock. Ladies' shoes were of calf-skin, with a white band of sheep-skin attached to the top. This was a neat dress shoe.

In the matter of bonnets and hats, the shapes, for a long time, were far from graceful. The prettiest was the "skimmer" hat, made of some shining material like silver tinsel, with a flat crown and large brim; the "horse-hair" bonnet was very light, but stiff; the bath-bonnet, made upon the principle of the modern gentleman's crush-hat,—one could sit on it,—was more becoming than the mush-melon bonnet, ribbed and stiff-looking, which was in use just before the Revolution; the whalebone bonnet was an improvement upon the last-named; it was stiffened only in front. The calash bonnet was made of green silk and so constructed that it could be folded back like the top of a calash or gig when the wearer went indoors. The "wagon" was a black silk affair with the shape of a wagon-top, and, at first, used exclusively by the Quaker ladies. However, as it was, from its shape, an excellent protection against the sun's rays, many ladies in the country adopted it, making it of some light material trimmed with gay ribbons. The only straw bonnet mentioned during a long period, was the "bee-hive," worn by old ladies. A large, flat, white beaver was once worn, with scarcely any crown, and fastened under the chin by two strings. The only kind of wrap used by the ladies was the loose cloak which, with slight alterations in the cut, went by the names of roquelaure, capuchin and cardinal. After the Revolution the influence of French fashions was felt throughout the republic. American ladies wore the limp-skirted, short-waisted dress of the dames du Directoire about the time that their husbands and beaux, having discarded the long-cherished cue, wore their hair close-cropped, à la Brutus.

Parasols came in fashion very late; so with umbrellas. Men wore "rain coats," and women "camblets," for protection against the weather. Watson says the first umbrellas were carried by British officers, and were deemed effeminate by the people. Yet, in an old advertisement of 1769, a milliner proposes, in addition to her regular modish business, to "cover umbrellas in the neatest manner;" that useful article must have become common already at that time. Ladies careful of their complexion at one period wore a black velvet mask in winter, "with a silver mouth-piece to keep it on by retaining in the mouth." Rather an inconvenient arrangement and one which compelled silence. The earliest kind of watches worn in the colony had cases of shagreen, turtle shell or pinchbeck. After that the finest gentleman was content to carry a silver watch. The first gold watches were an article of jewelry, becoming only to wealthy and fashionable ladies. Old gentlemen, at the close of the last century, carried a tall, gold-headed cane, and, generally, a gold snuff box, from which they were ever ready to offer a sociable pinch to an acquaintance. They held on to the very last against the abolishment of the cue or pig-tail, and clung to the large silver buttons, which were once a mark of wealth and dignity. These buttons were often made of coins—quarter-dollars being used for the coat and "eleven penny bits" for the vest and breeches. Spectacles were rarely used, even by the aged; a young man or woman wearing glasses was something unheard of; our fathers had keener and stronger eyes than we.

The Revolution brought about a greater simplicity of manners; the "coarse" element came in afterwards when the "power of money" began to be felt. The Duke de la Rochefoucauld Liancourt, writing about the social life of the Americans some time after the Revolution, remarks: "Luxury is very high there, especially at New York and Philadelphia, and makes a dangerous progress every year. . . . There are some persons who surpass their neighbors, already too far advanced, in luxury; these injure the manners of the country. . . . " He adds that luxury is much less prevalent in the country towns, but is continually increasing, and often out of proportion with wealth.

The same writer summarizes his views in the following two paragraphs—the first is less a criticism than a correct explanation of the absence of an idle, highly refined society; the second, a just homage paid the American people and a prophetic view of the future greatness of our country:

"An European coming into the new world, and bringing with him the need of the usage of the politer attentions of that which he has quitted; he, above all, who brings with him the need of what we call in France the charms of society, which we know so well how to appreciate, of which we know how to participate, and which affords us so many moments of happiness, such a man will not find himself satisfied in America, and his recollections will be continually sprinkling his life with melancholy. He cannot, if his heart has an occasion for a friend, hope to find there the sweetness of a constant and avowed friendship. The inhabitants of the United States have been hitherto too much engaged in their respective occupations for the enticements of polished society to be able to withdraw their attention from them; they have not leisure to consecrate to friendship.

"Such an European ought to have for a long time forgotten Europe in order to live quite happy in America. But if he can readily lose the remembrance of it, or take with him there the dearest objects of his affection, he will lead in America a happy and tranquil life. He will there enjoy the blessing of liberty in the greatest extent which it is possible to desire in any polished country. He will see himself with an active people, easy in their circumstances, and happy. Every day will bring him to observe a new progress of this new country. He will see it every day take a step toward that strength and greatness to which it is called; towards that real independence which is for a nation the result of having the means of satisfying itself."

The wealthy people of the province were liberal patrons of art. Very many of them had been educated in the European schools, and in the vast collections of the Old World had learned to know a good painting, a meritorious marble, a fine bit of porcelain or glass, or anything commendable in the way of decoration and bric-a-brac. They encouraged native genius and were tolerant of its crudities. In the manor-houses along the Hudson were works of John Trumbull, Charles Wilson Peale, Gilbert Stuart,

Thomas Sully, Washington Allston and other American painters. The social atmosphere of these great houses possessed a warmth and refinement that were favorable to artistic appreciation. Painters were welcome guests within their walls. Peale made excursions into this region, and Sully visited the home of Governor Daniel D. Tompkins to obtain sittings for the admirable portrait which he produced of the statesman.

The wealthy people kept large amounts of money in their houses. In 1774 a lady, who died in New York, owned estates in Westchester County, and the

There was, however, one class of settlers as sharply distinguished in their social life as in their language and nativity from the Dutch and English. These were the worthy and admirable Huguenots, the French Protestant exiles, who came into the county so early in its history and gave to their settlement the name of New Rochelle, in memory of the ancient French city which had been the scene of their most lustrous glory and most poignant suffering.[1] Mainly well-educated men and women, skilled artisans and good citizens, no acquisition to the colony was more valuable. Of the first house which they built, Rev. L. J. Coutant has given a graphic description. It was erected upon the point now known as Hudson's Park. Mr. Coutant writes,—

"During the pleasant weather of the autumnal months (circa 1690), a house was built on Bonnefoy's Point,—not a very commodious one, nor yet very elegant in its architectural design. An excavation was made in the earth to the depth of five or six feet, and faced around with stones, after the manner of building cellar-walls at the present day, preparatory to the erection of the superstructure. On these stone walls were placed logs, in successive tiers, until a desirable height was reached sufficient to make one story above ground and a large garret for a sleeping apartment. The whole was roofed over with long grass, bound firmly on to the rafters with strong cords, interlaced with poles running lengthwise of the roof; so that this primitive dwelling, with the exception of its cellar-walls, or ground-work, was nothing more or less than a thatched log house. The work of building this edifice was accomplished by the voluntary and united labor of the whole colony—men and women both doing what they could to hasten its completion.

"Incidents peculiarly interesting cluster around this primitive cottage. It was a joint-stock possession—a common property, in which all had an interest—a sort of headquarters, a public house indeed, to which the settlers nightly resorted for social intercourse or recreation when the toils and adventures of the day were over. On the Sabbath it was the temple whither the settlers went up to worship and listen to the religious instructions of the pious Bonrepas, their beloved pastor, and to join in the raptures inspired by the singing of Marot's hymns. It is surprising to see what expedients necessity will adopt; into how narrow a compass it will compress the proprieties of life, both civil and religious; how few and simple are the requirements of society and genuine religion, when stripped of the conventional superfluities bestowed by pride and wealth.

"In this same house the first child was born, to one Louis Guion, and there the first Huguenot marriage took place, the groom being Jean Coutant, and the bride the daughter of David Bonnefoy. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. David de Bonrepas, who united, in his ministerial functions, the several offices of bishop, priest and presbyter to the French Protestant Church at New Rochelle.[2]

In addition to much other useful information, Mr. Coutant has communicated the following observations upon the social characteristics and domestic economy of the early Huguenots.

"Not in former times, as now, were the families in country villages or districts dependent on the butcher's stalls for the daily supply of their table, nor yet upon the baker's shops and the flour merchants for bread and pastry. These staples of life, as well as their wearing apparel, were furnished upon their own premises. Their cereals were gathered from their fields, threshed and winnowed upon their own barn-floors, and carried to the mill in bags to be converted in flour, which was kneaded and baked by the good matrons, in the old fashioned brick ovens, constructed in the immense kitchen chimney-backs. And as to pastry, all of it, not even excepting wedding-cake, was prepared in the same way. Their herds of kine and flocks of sheep, grazing upon their pasture fields, and the poultry in their barn-yards supplied them with fresh meat, butter and eggs the whole year round. The writer himself, although not as old as some men whom he knows, can well remember the time when a single small cow or a young steer, slaughtered once a week, sufficed to supply the families of New Rochelle and East Chester with all the fresh meat that was needed, over and above that raised on their own premises. Thus a thrifty farmer, in the early summer or spring, would slaughter a calf, sheep or lamb and, reserving what was required for his own use, send the rest to his neighbors, until they in turn did the same thing; and thus the supply was mutual and alternate. This policy was frequently adopted also upon the occurrence of a stone, or ploughing 'frolic,' as they were called, or upon the raising of a barn or some other heavy-timbered building, on which occasions a supply of good old Jamaica rum acted as a sort of steam power, and at night the affair was often concluded by a liberal supply of lamb or veal pot-pie and generous potations of old cider.

"The cellar of the well-to-do farmer was his larder, being fully stocked with barrels of salted meat and hogsheads of cider, as also with potatoes, turnips, butter, lard and such other provisions as were needful for family use. Even mechanics, carpenters, shoemakers, weavers, tailors, coopers, and blacksmiths had each his acre of land, cow and fatted pig, and whatever they lacked of other provisions they had no difficulty in obtaining by an exchange of labor for farmers' products, at the rate of four dollars per hundred weight of beef, eighteen cents per bushel for potatoes, fifty cents a barrel for apples, seventy-five cents a bushel for wheat, fifty cents for rye and not more than thirty-six cents a bushel for Indian corn, and other produce in proportion; while the wages of the laboring man ranged from fifty to eighty dollars a year, with board, and from fifty to seventy-five cents a day. The wages of mechanics were from seventy-five cents to one dollar a day, if boarded, and from one dollar to a dollar and twenty-five cents where they boarded themselves. Carpenters, wheelwrights and blacksmiths were employed upon many of the utensils of husbandry in those days to which they are strangers at the present time. The former made the farmer's ox-sleds, plows, harrows, cider-mills, crackles and other implements for working in flax; the latter forged his plow-shares, colters, chains and crowbars. The manufacture of flax and wool spinning-wheels was usually done by cabinet-makers and turners, which class of mechanics was far from numerous.[3] The turning was performed on the old-fashioned pole lathe.

"The dress worn by men consisted of pantaloons, vest and coat; the latter trimmed with large brass buttons, and an overcoat, or, as it was then called, a match-coat, a wool hat made very much in the form of the felt hats worn at the present day; laced or low-quartered shoes, and woolen, home-knit stockings. Those garments as a general thing constituted a gentleman's wardrobe or outfit for the winter. In summer, linen was usually worn. The ordinary dress worn by elderly women was the old style short-gown and petticoats, of homespun or linsey-woolsey. When they went abroad, however, this was generally exchanged for a short-waisted gown of the same material in winter; but in summer of some lighter fabric. Those who could afford it occasionally wore silk. The head-dress consisted of a cap with a wide border and high crown, over which, when abroad, they wore a plain silk bonnet. The young women wore frocks of a similar style and material, but no caps. Their long tresses were parted in front, combed back and braided into a cue; rolled up spirally upon the back of the head, and secured by a huge turtle-shell or horn-comb. Small side combs were also used to keep the hair evenly parted in front. The shape of their hats varied constantly, as now, in accordance with the fickle dictates of fashion. At one time it would be a fur cap, somewhat like that worn by men at the present time, but trimmed with ribbons and ornamented with feathers, white or black according to the fancy of the wearer. At another, the hat would flatten down and spread out into an immense disk of braided leghorn or straw, held in place by a broad ribbon tied under the chin. Presently, almost while we were yet gazing in admiration, they assumed the form of a huge tin scoop in front, projecting beyond the face some ten or twelve inches, with high crowns to make room for the large comb.

[3] Archer Craft was among the first whom the writer recollects that wrought at cabinet-making and turning in New Rochelle, and also made and repaired spinning-wheels. His shop was at Upper New Rochelle. He was succeeded by Peter Bonnett, Jr., who continued the business until spinning wheels fell into disuse.

"Strange as it may seem, all of these, to us, outlandish costumes and fashions looked well in their time! Boys, until grown-up, mostly went barefooted; nor was it at all uncommon to see grown-up men pursuing their occupations without shoes upon their feet. All, of course, wore shoes and yarn stockings in winter. Moreover, the young man who could afford a pair of calf-skin boots with white or red sheep-skin tops was regarded with admiration by the belles of the town. He was a rare bird, indeed, and likely to become the target for the arrows of the mischievous blind deity. All the more so, if these ornamental appendages supported a trim, symmetrical form, attired in buff colored corduroy pantaloons, white vest, a blue broadcloth swallow-tailed coat, trimmed with glistening brass buttons, the collar extending high in back of the neck, and the tail reaching to within a foot of the floor; the whole surmounted with a high, bell-crowned beaver hat!

"'Attired in this most marvellous array,
Thus walked and talked the dandy of his day.'

"In these early times, the children in farming districts were early taught habits of industry, the boys going to school in winter, and assisting in the work of the farm in summer and autumn. At the age of sixteen one or more of them would be put out to learn a trade, and bound by indentures to serve five years as apprentices. The girls meantime, while attending the district school, assisted their mother in household duties, and indeed some of them did not hesitate to help at an emergency in the out-door work upon the farm—in such light occupations as stirring and raking hay and pulling flax. Nor by so doing did they at at all lose caste or compromise their claims to gentility. Almost every young man at the age of twenty-one was familiar with the processes of farming, supplemented frequently by the knowledge of some mechanical employment. At the age of sixteen the girls had a practical acquaintance with the business of housekeeping in all its branches. Although not put to a trade, yet, before they arrived at eighteen years of age, they may be said to have learned at least one trade, at home. They were thoroughly proficient in the art of spinning and making up homespun fabrics. But although thus early trained to habits of industry, and to contribute their share of labor towards the support of the family, the young people of both sexes were by no means deprived of amusements. They had their holiday seasons and afternoon and evening sports. They enjoyed, in winter, skating and riding down hill, and spinning tops, flying kites and playing ball in the spring; and a great many other athletic games and innocent amusements which are now obsolete and forgotten.

"There is yet one more phase of domestic and social life among the early settlers of this part of the country and their immediate descendants which ought not to be passed over entirely without notice, as it is one most intimately connected with human welfare and happiness in this our earthly lot. I refer to the subject of courtship and marriage. In those times the marriage of young people was the rule and not the exception. At all events the practice was, as it seems to me, much more general than at the present time; and there was a good reason for it. Marriage did not then demand, on the part of one or both of the parties to it, the possession of an independent fortune! Love and marriage, on the contrary, came first, and a reasonable amount of worldly success afterwards. To this mutual industry and economy contributed. The endless ceremony, parade and lavish expenditure of time and money upon bridal costumes, trousseaus and wedding tours were unknown to the simplicity of those times. If it had not been so, the costly paraphernalia of a wedding would have driven the young lovers of that day into the despair of a hopeless celibacy! Mutual happiness and success in life, and not idle vanity or foolish display, were then supposed to be the true and proper inducements to matrimony. Such alliances were more easily and naturally formed, too, from the fact that population was less transient than now. That is to say, families more frequently lived during their entire lives upon estates which had descended from father to son through several generations. Weddings, too, even among families of some wealth, were very simple affairs. They took place at the residence of the bride's parents—usually in the evening. The ceremony was invariably performed by a minister, in the presence of a few of the relatives and friends, and was followed by a season of festivity and merriment. For the newly-married couple to set up housekeeping cost but a trifle. For twenty-five dollars a year two rooms could be procured sufficiently ample for a modest beginning. For as much more, they could be furnished with all that was needful for housekeeping in the way of furniture, etc.; the wife, as a general thing, providing beds, bedding and such carpets as she had been able to manufacture as the fruit of her own handiwork and industry; so that the entire outlay, in cash, for the first year, over and above what was provided by the parents, would not, perhaps, exceed one hundred dollars, rent included. These facts refer, of course, to successful marriages—that is, to the great majority. For the few failures, want of sufficient previous acquaintance of the parties (a thing by no means so common then as now) or improvident habits were chiefly accountable. The state of society I have been attempting to describe was that which existed in New Rochelle and Pelham from seventy-five to one hundred years ago; and, indeed, much earlier, for the habits and customs of the generation which preceded the War of the Revolution were substantially the same with those of their immediate descendants."

Settling in a country where water-courses were so numerous, the early Dutch did most of their traveling on the North River or the Sound and its tributary streams. The periauger was in constant use for water transportation. Charlevoix calls it pirogue, a canoe formed of the trunk of a tree, while Cooper, in the "Water Witch," says: "It partook of a European and an American character; it possessed the length, narrowness and clean bow of the canoe, from which its name was derived, and the flat bottom and lee boards of a boat constructed for the shallow waters of the low countries." Mrs. Van Cortlandt says: "Sloops did a great business in carrying passengers, their leisurely movements quite suiting the quiet tourists of those days." "The very rich had for state occasions their coach drawn by four stout horses of Flemish blood, with coachman and outriders in appropriate liveries. Such equipages, however, were few in number and attracted great attention when upon the road. Box wagons, guiltless of springs, were owned by some farmers, but for easy travel a good horse was preferred, the man riding in front and the wife or daughter behind upon a pillion. Physicians needed and bestrode stout nags, always carrying saddle-bags and the few simple surgical instruments then known. The infallible lancet was stored in the big pocket-book, as at least once a year, usually in the spring, 'a good bleeding' was deemed a necessity. Blooded horses were not scarce, for many of the gentry kept racing stables.

A DOCTOR OF THE OLDEN TIME.

"In winter the people rode about in huge sleighs, some of which were of great length and had covers, half extending over them. The horses were decked with a profusion of brass bells strung upon leather straps. When the youths and maidens went for long drives they carried foot-stoves—a tin box pierced with holes and set in a wooden frame, and enclosing an iron cup filled with hot embers."

The quarter of a century following the achievement of national independence was a period fraught with mechanical inventions that imparted a powerful stimulus to the material progress of the country. The steam-engine was being vastly improved, the application of the newly-discovered power to milling and manufacturing was making rapid progress, and the locomotive and steamboat were taking shape in the minds of Oliver Evans, Stephenson, Rumsey, Fitch and Fulton. In 1803 Oliver Evans had begun to build steam-engines in Philadelphia, and in 1813 published an article in which he claimed that in 1773 he had suggested steam as a motor on land, and in 1778 had proposed its application to boats. In 1804 he built a machine for cleaning docks, and propelled it by its own engine overland to the Schuylkill River, where he launched it into the stream, fixed a paddle-wheel to it and navigated it around to the Delaware. He proposed to construct a steam road carriage for freight, at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars, that would transport one hundred barrels of flour, at the speed of two miles an hour, and successfully endeavored to enlist the Philadelphia and Columbia Turnpike Company in his project. He unquestionably had worked out the idea of the steamboat and locomotive in his mind, but the world laughed at him when he predicted that "The time will come when people will travel in stages moved by steam-engines from one city to another almost as fast as the birds can fly—fifteen or twenty miles an hour."

Soon after the close of the Revolution James Rumsey propelled a boat by steam on the Potomac River in the presence of a party of observers, one of whom was Washington, who certified to what Rumsey had accomplished. The Rumsey Society, of which Benjamin Franklin was president, was formed to aid him, and there ensued a sharp controversy for priority of invention between Rumsey and John Fitch. The latter had, in July, 1786, experimented on the Delaware with a steamer moved by upright paddles, fitted at the gunwales, but his first successful boat was operated in July, 1788. He changed the paddles to the stem of the craft, where they worked nearly as well as a wheel. Fitch is believed to have invented the first double-acting condensing engine, transmitting power by means of cranks, produced in any country. He took his boat to New York and exhibited it on the Collect, where it was finally beached and abandoned to decay.

In 1804, John C. Stevens, of Hoboken, N. J., constructed a steamboat on the Hudson that was driven by a Watts engine, with a tubular boiler of his own invention and a screw propeller. Chancellor Livingston and Nicholas Roosevelt were interested in this undertaking, which was a failure, as the machinery shook the boat to pieces.

It was reserved for Robert Fulton to make of the steamboat a practical and commercial success. Backed by Chancellor Livingston's money he built in New York, in 1806, a steamer which he named the "Clermont," the title of the Livingston country-seat. She was one hundred and thirty feet in length, eighteen in width, seven in depth, and of one hundred and sixty tons burthen. Her engine was bought from Watt & Boulton. On Friday, August 7, 1807, she started on her first voyage to Albany, and reached there in thirty hours, an average for the one hundred and fifty miles of five miles an hour. In September she began running regularly for the accommodation of the public, making the round trip in seventy-two hours, for which each passenger was charged fourteen dollars. Livingston had already received from the Legislature the grant of the exclusive privilege of navigating the waters of New York by steam, and Fulton was admitted as sharer in this franchise. Before the War of 1812 they had built six steamboats for traffic on the Hudson and ferriage in New York Harbor.

In 1796 there were in the whole State thirty-eight coaches, seventy-three chariots, five post-chaises, ninety-one phaetons, seventy-two coaches, one hundred and three "other four-wheeled carriages" and one thousand five hundred and twenty-six curricles, chaises, top-chairs, steel-spring-chairs, sulkies and wooden-spring chairs. "The light open chair, or the covered chaise," says Mr. Eggleston, "was generally preferred. These were better suited to the roughness and sinuosity of the roads than the coach. The chaise was a kind of two-wheeled gig, having a top, and sometimes drawn by one and sometimes by two horses; the chair had two wheels, but no top; the sulky, which was much used, differed from the chair chiefly in having room for but one person. Ladies took delight in driving about alone in open chairs, to the amazement of European travelers, who deemed that a paradise in which women could travel without protection."

These luxuries of travel were of later date than the time when the Indian trail known as "The Old Westchester Path" was the principal thoroughfare between New York and New England. In 1683 the ferryman to Long Island kept "two boats for cattle and horses and also two boats for passengers." The ferriage for the former was 6d. a head, and for the latter 1d. The Dutch yachts (so called) were from one to two weeks in a voyage to Hudson and Albany, or Albania, as it was then called. They came-to every night, preferring ease to speed, and traveled only by daylight. All on board spoke Dutch. In 1673 the post or messenger was instructed to apply to the Governors for "the best direction how to form the best Post-Road;"

to establish places on the road where to leave the way-letters, and "to mark some Trees that shall direct Passengers the best way, and to fix certain Houses for your several stages both to bait and lodge at." The messenger was to provide himself with "a spare horse, a Horn, and good Portmantles." Travelers who wished to avail themselves of the messenger's company were permitted to do so, and he was instructed to afford them the best help in his power.

Miss Sarah Knight, of Boston, came to New York, in 1704, on a visit to some friends. She availed herself of the guidance and protection of the post-rider, and made the journey, on horseback, in two weeks. Her journal, printed for private circulation, contains graphic and quaint descriptions, and reveals a shrewd observer of men and things. It has proved of inestimable value to all writers about the olden time. She gives the reader an idea of the hardships of travel in those days,—hardships bravely borne, in 1702, by another lady, Mrs. Shippen, who travelled from Boston to Philadelphia on horseback, carrying a baby on her lap.[1] We get here, also, an insight into the primitive postal system: "Tuesday, October y^e^ third, about 8 in the morning, I with the Post proceeded forward . . and about 2, afternoon, arrived at the Post's second stage, where the western Post met him and exchanged letters. . . Having here discharged the Ordinary for self and guide, as I understood was the custom, about 3, afternoon, went on with my third guide, who rode very hard: and having crossed Providence ferry, we come to a River which they generally ride through. But I dare not venture, so the Post got a lad and canoe to carry me to the other side, and he rid through and led my horse. . . Rewarding my sculler, again mounted and made the best of my way forward. The road here was very even and y^e^ day pleasant, it being now near sunset. But the Post told me we had near 14 miles to ride to the next Stage, where we were to lodge. I asked him of the rest of the road, foreseeing we must travel in the night. He told me there was a bad river to ride through, which was so very fierce a horse could sometimes hardly stem it: but it was narrow, and we should soon be over."

The post-office scheme for British America was first devised in the year 1700, by Colonel J. Hamilton, of New Jersey, and son of Governor Andrew Hamilton. He obtained a patent and the profits accruing. He afterwards sold it to the crown. The first regular post-office established in the colonies by Parliament was in 1710.[1] The chief office for North America was established in New York. The necessity for increased postal facilities had been represented to the home government in 1704, by the Governor of the province of New York, who wrote that [2] "The post that goes through this place goes eastward as far as Boston; but westward, he goes no further than Philadelphia: and there is no other post upon all this continent." As late as the year 1810 the mail between Canandaigua and Genesee River was carried on horseback—part of the time by a woman. In 1730 the postmaster of New York published a notice inviting application for the office of foot-post to Albany this winter. Letters to distant places, however, were generally carried by messengers on horseback. At first a satchel or a pair of saddle-bags sufficed; then a light vehicle was required; finally the stage coaches, which were first started for the benefit of travelers, became the proper means of transportation for the ever-increasing mail matter. Until 1755 there had been but one a week, eastward and westward from New York,—Boston and Philadelphia being still the extreme points,—and this only in the summer; once a fortnight was the winter arrangement. In 1755 it was arranged that the New England post should start weekly all the year round. When this post was first established, in 1672, by Governor Lovelace, it was to "sett forth from this citty of New Yorke monthly, and thence to travail to Boston, from whence within that Month hee shall return againe to this citty."

An independent post-office was established in New York in 1775, at the suggestion of William Goddard, the publisher of the Maryland Journal, and John Holt, the New York printer, was appointed postmaster. There is no doubt that the "Sons of Liberty," a popular association of Americans, were connected with this movement; for one of the first acts of its members was to send, through this office, threatening letters to the leading members of the Tory party.

Mr. James Rees, from whose "Foot-prints of a Letter-Carrier" we have quoted the above paragraph, says: "Nor was it until 1732 that the first stage-route to Philadelphia was established; stages also departed for Boston monthly, taking a fortnight on the route." Advertisements of that year mentioned the departure of the post "in order to perform his stage," but we find no reference to "stage-wagons" or "stage-coaches" before 1756, when the "first stage-coach" is announced to run between Philadelphia and New York, "three days through." In 1753, William Vandrills informed "gentlemen and others who have a mind to transport themselves, wares or merchandise from New York to Philadelphia," that he has "fitted a stage boat," which will "sail from New York to Amboy and thence by wagons to Burlington, and thence take passage to Philadelphia." In 1765 a rival of the "First Stage-Coach" put on the line a "covered Jersey wagon,"—an improvement, it seems, on the other "coach." Competition was roused, and in the following year (1766) a third stage, yclept "The Flying-Machine," proposed to make the trip in two days, and allured travelers with the promise of "good wagons and seats on springs." Through fare, twenty shillings. When the capital of the province had accomplished no more during a century as regards traveling facilities, it could hardly be expected that Westchester County was able to boast of superior accommodations. Public travel was in its infancy: the hardy colonist bestrode his own good horse and started on a distant journey with no more concern than we board a railroad train nowadays. After the Revolution, however, there was a marked and general improvement. A stage line was begun, in 1785, between New York and Albany. In 1787 stage communication with Boston was had three times a week in summer and twice a week in winter, and the towns in Westchester County had a stage from New York City every other day.

It will be readily imagined that the mails did not carry tons of printed matter, as in our time. The first newspaper printed in New York was the New York Gazette, a weekly, established by William Bradford, in 1725. It was printed on a half-sheet of foolscap. The type was large and much worn. The first daily paper, The New York Daily Advertiser, published by F. Child & Co., only made its appearance in 1785. Westchester had no newspaper until after the Revolution, but its people not only read the New York journals, but also advertised in them. Here are some advertisements inserted by the people of Rye, and preserved in Mr. Baird's history of that town:

"Oct. 23, 1749. Wm. Burtus, Hat-Maker, Now living at Harrison's Purchase, in Rye, carries on the Hatter's Trade there, and makes and sells as good Hats as any in the Province, for ready Money, or short Credit. Wm. Burtus."

As may be supposed, educational facilities were not very great while the county was thinly settled. The mother was often the only teacher, and the Bible the first text-book. In the city, the school-master was always, ex officio, clerk, chorister and visitor of the sick. The catechism was taught, in Dutch, by these hard-worked pedagogues. As the population increased, very good schools were established. Westchester County had several, principally under the direction of some of the Huguenot immigrants, who were gentlemen of culture and not accustomed to agricultural pursuits. Books were few in the early days, and there was little to develop literary taste, but the Dutch were not illiterate. There must have been a peculiar meaning in the singular custom existing among the Dutch families of that period, of the father giving a bundle of goose quills to his son and telling him to give one to each of his male posterity. Watson saw one which had a scroll appended saying, "This quill, given by Petrus Byvanck to James Bogert, in 1789, was a present in 1689 from his grandfather from Holland." As early as 1690 the people of Rye made an effort to procure a schoolmaster, and in many of the towns the proprietors offered the privileges of a school to all who would contribute toward the erection of a school-house. The English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts included the tuition of youth in its programme of proselytism, and established teachers at various points in the county. The best educational advantages were enjoyed by that section of the county formerly a part of Connecticut, as that colony rivaled Massachusetts in its care for the instruction of the young. In New York no provision was made for a general system of education before the Revolution. Whatever was done for this interest, was done by individuals or religious bodies.

The good people of Westchester were not more free from superstition than their neighbors. In 1672 a number of inhabitants of that locality complained to the Governor and Council that "a witch had come among them from Hartford, where she had been before imprisoned and condemned." The woman was removed. A similar complaint was also made in 1673; "but the Military Governor, Captain Colve, a son of the ocean, not under this land influence perhaps, treated it as idle or superstitious, and so dismissed the suit." A man and his wife, similarly accused, in 1665, had not got off so easily; they were tried and found guilty. Belief in witchcraft was nothing uncommon, in those days, in Europe as well as in the colonies.

The husbandry of the pioneers brought forth abundant yields. The soil was adapted to the culture of wheat, corn, rye and other cereals; to peaches, apples, cherries and the various berries; and to a most prolific pasturage. Every farmer kept sheep, and had his wool spun in his own home. The weaving was done by men, who kept and worked small hand-looms in their houses. Blankets, sheetings and coarse cloths were produced in very considerable quantities. Much flax was raised, and was also spun at the firesides of the people, where the hum of the large and small wheels sounded through the day and evening. The linen was of remarkable excellence. Tablecloths and napkins, woven in diamonds and squares, were as smooth and glossy as satin, while the sheeting was fine, even-threaded and most durable. Every farm had a wood-lot, in which the men-servants exercised their thews in preparing the immense logs for the gaping fire-places that daily swallowed fuel by the cord. They also cut chestnut rails for the zigzag fences that took the place of stone walls in regions where trees were more numerous than boulders.

Most of the farm labor was performed by negro and Indian slaves, between whom and their masters the kindliest relations existed, as a rule. These bondsmen identified themselves with the families in which they were raised, and exhibited a pride and importance scarcely excelled by their masters.[1] "It is not easy," Cooper makes Miles Wallingford say, "to describe the affection of an attached slave, which has blended with it the pride of a partisan, the solicitude of a parent and the blindness of a lover." A common custom among the Dutch was to assign to each child in the household, when it had reached six or eight years, a slave of the same age and sex, who clung to the little master or mistress with an affection that was fully returned and, in many instances, lasted through life.

[1] The Dutch settlers in Westchester County obtained their first African slaves under the "Freedoms and Exemptions" granted by the West India Company in 1629, which promised that to all planters of colonies in the New Netherlands "the Company will use their endeavors to supply the Colonists with as many Blacks as they Conveniently Can; in such manner, however, that they shall not be bound to do it for a longer time than they shall think proper." In 1644 Nicholas Toorn, of Rensselaerwyck, acknowledged the receipt of a young black girl—to be returned at the end of four years, "if yet alive," to the director-general or his successor. The average price of slaves was one hundred dollars in our money each for men and two hundred dollars for women. The treatment of them was, on the whole, humane. In 1644 an ordinance was passed which emancipated those who had served the company eighteen or nineteen years on condition of a yearly small payment in wheat, peas, beans and hogs, but a failure to comply with the conditions

There is a fact connected with the institution of slavery in the colony of New York which is too honorable for our forefathers to be omitted here, for in no section was it more true than in Westchester. The slaves lived under the same roof and partook of the same food as their masters; they were allowed much familiarity and indulged in great freedom of speech. Captain Graydon, who was quartered at Flatbush while a prisoner in the war of independence, testifies to this: "Their blacks, when they had them," says he, "were very free and familiar; sometimes sauntering among the whites at meal-time, with hat on head, and freely joining occasionally in conversation, as if they were one and all of the same household."[1] "Yet," says Watson, "no case had ever occurred of 'amalgamation,' and no instance of mixed colour had been seen until produced by some in the British army coming among them. The first instance of the kind produced emotions of surprise and dislike."

One of the Old World customs brought over by the early settlers was the investiture "by turff and twigg," a relic of feudal times. It consisted in the delivery of a turf, a stone, a branch or some other object as a symbol of the transfer of the soil. Anciently this had been practiced by the feudal lord in conferring a fief upon his vassal. It was observed on Manursing Island in 1693, and at Budd's Neck, with all due formality, as late as 1768. In a dispute between Samuel Odell and the heirs of Jonathan Vowles about the southernmost part of that island, John Frost testified that in 1693 he went, by request of Vowles, to the said island, "where he did see Jonathan Vowles . . . cut a turff upon the same, as also cut a stick or twigg thereon; and the said Jonathan Vowles did then and there deliver the said turfe and twigg to the said Samuel Odel, who desired this deponent to take notice that Jonathan Vowles did putt him in full and peaceable possession."

The life of the early settlers was marked by sim-involved a return of the laggard to slavery. In 1683 the General Assembly provided penalties for selling any commodity to any slave and for any person buying from them or giving them credit. The same enactment included a rigid fugitive slave law and commanded all constables and inferior officers "to press men, horses, boats or pinnaces to pursue" runaway slaves "by sea or land, and to make diligent hue and cry, as by the law required." Later statutes permitted masters to punish slaves with any chastisement not extending to life or member; forbade the assemblage of more than three slaves; ordered that the children of slave women shall be slaves; that each town or manor may have a whipper of slaves; that any slave presuming to strike any Christian or Jew shall be committed to prison and suffer corporal punishment; forbade the harboring of slaves; provided that every master or the executor of a will freeing a slave must give two hundred pounds security that such slave shall not become a public charge, and that the owners of slaves executed for murder, arson or other terrible crimes shall be paid for them. The traffic in slaves began to decline in 1718, and in 1723 there were but six thousand one hundred and seventy-one in the province. In 1755 there were but seventy-three held in Westchester County. Slavery ceased forever in the State of New York under the law of 1817, which enacted that every "negro, mulatto or mustee within this State, born before the 4th day of July, 1799, shall, from and after the 4th day of July, 1827, be free."

plicity and naturalness in their social relations. Their out-door amusements were of the kind that promoted vigorous bodies. The Dutch skated on the frozen streams in winter, as they had done in Holland, while the English were mightily given to riding and hunting. As in all new countries, women were in the minority; the demand exceeded the supply, and she was usually an incorrigible old maid who passed her twentieth year without finding a husband. The marriage festival was an event to which friends and neighbors from all the country round were bidden; much ale and liquor was drunk, and the dancing was kept up the night through. There does not, however, seem to have been the strictest morality observed concerning the relation of men and women, for on January 5, 1658, the Council of the New Netherlands issued a very stringent order against those who had had their banns published and then had not had the ceremony performed. It was ordained that "all persons whose banns have been published, after the third proclamation shall have been made and no lawful impediment occurring, shall cause their marriage to be solemnized at the longest within one month after the last proclamation, or, within the said term, to appear and render in his reasons for his refusal, as it behooves him; and this under the penalty of ten guilders for the first week after the expiration of said month, and for the succeeding weeks twenty guilders for each week, until the time he shall have made known the reason of his refusal.

"Furthermore, no male and female shall be permitted to cohabit before they shall have been lawfully married, in the penalty of one hundred guilders, or as much less or more as their circumstances shall be found to warrant.' [1]

The English colonists took a patriotic pride in celebrating what was called "A Merry English Wedding." No matter how poor the new-made husband, he must find money for the Gargantuan spreads which the guests expected. The minister finished the ceremony by kissing the bride; then all the gentlemen followed his example, while it was the bridegroom's privilege to kiss each of the ladies. A bride might receive the salutations of a hundred men in the course of the day; and as if this were not enough, the men called on the bride afterward, and this call was colloquially known as "going to kiss the bride." A practice among the ruder frontier people was to carry off the bride and hold her prisoner until she was ransomed by the groom providing entertainment for the captors.

The ancient custom of erecting May-poles and dancing around them prevailed until a late day. Sometimes, when a bridegroom had given offense by evincing stinginess, not inviting his friends to his wedding-feast, or in the case of an ill-matched couple, a May-pole adorned with ragged stockings in lieu of flowers was placed before his door. New Year's day was celebrated among the New York Dutch by the calls of gentlemen upon their female friends, who set out tables with great stock of eatables and potables. This day and the church festivals, kept alike by the Dutch and English, brought an intermission of labor to the New York slaves, who gathered in throngs to devote themselves to wild frolics. Debauchery presently usurped the place of innocent enjoyment and these assemblages were converted into orgies. Consequently, on December 1, 1655, the Council proclaimed "that from this time forth, on the New Year and May-days, there shall be no firing or May-poles planted; nor shall there be any beating of the drum; nor shall there be on the occasion any wines, brandywines or beer dealt out" under a fine of twelve guilders for the first offense, twenty-four for the second and corporal correction for the third.

The colonial funeral deserved to rank as a festive occasion—a time of much eating and drinking. Whole pipes of Madeira, with several hogsheads of beer, were drunk at single funerals in New York, to say nothing of the food eaten and the tobacco smoked by friends who made a day—and sometimes a night—of it in honor of the departed. Legislative interference was more than once invoked to prevent the friends of the deceased from eating and drinking his widow and children out of house and home, and sensitive men were known on their death-beds to forbid the distribution of liquors at their obsequies. The precaution was well-timed, for funerals sometimes became the occasions of drunkenness and riot. There was an early custom of firing volleys over the graves of persons of rank and distinction, even though the one interred might be a woman.

There were many other sources of expense. The "underbearers" who carried the coffin, walking with their heads and shoulders covered with the pall-cloth, wore plain gloves; but the pall-bearers, the minister and many of the friends were presented with costly gloves of silk or leather. So many gloves were received by persons of wide social connections that a considerable revenue was derived from the sale of them. If the means of the family permitted, fine linen scarfs, caught on one shoulder, with a bow of white or black ribbon and fastened under the opposite arm with ribbon, were furnished to the clergy, physicians and pall-bearers. Mourning rings were large and elaborate. "The most common figure upon them," says Mrs. Van Cortlandt, "was a willow tree and urn done in hair. I have seen long pins of the same kind worn like the present scarf-pins, and heavy rings of white enamel, with the name of the person in whose memory they were given inserted in gold letters." The expense of making such presents can readily be imagined.

[1] This and succeeding extracts from the colonial laws of New Amsterdam and New York are from the "Historical Magazine," published by Henry B. Dawson, at Morrisania. Mr. Dawson enjoyed full authority from the New York City authorities to examine the records. Translations of the Dutch documents were carefully made under his supervision from the originals and compared with the Westbrook translations.

If the distance to the burying-ground was short, the deceased was carried on a bier. The slaves followed, with spotless napkins pinned over the left arm a little above the elbow.

This ostentation prevailed until the Revolutionary War compelled economy to be observed. A specimen account is that rendered, in 1760, by William Cook to the estate of Mrs. James Alexander, widow of the prominent lawyer and mother of Lord Stirling. It read thus:

"To ye rectors	0	13	0
To opening ye (Trinity) vault	0	9	0
To 5 bells tooling, 18s. each	4	10	0

To making up a state room, finding stuff & tacks	0	14	0

And this does not include the funeral baked meats, the gloves, mourning rings and other items of expense.

The Dutch were thorough church-goers, and on Sundays never failed to attend "Kerck," to listen to the much-respected dominie. The duration of the sermon was limited to one hour, and, in order that the preacher should not exceed it, an hour-glass was placed upon the clerk's desk, and he was thus made the time-keeper. Another church custom was that the collection was taken in a bag, which the deacon carried fixed to a long black pole, at the end of which was fastened a bell to arouse the sleepers. It was also the custom for the sexton to notify the people of the hour of service by rapping at their doors with his ivory-headed cane and calling out: "Church-time!" for which he was paid by each family two shillings per annum. He also carried to the clerk all written requests for the prayers of the congregation. "The clerk had a long rod, slit at the end, into which he inserted the note, and handed it up to the minister, who occupied a very high pulpit in the shape of a half globe, raised on the top of a demi-column and canopied with a sounding-board. The minister wore a black silk mantle, a cocked hat and a neck-band, with linen cambric 'beffy' on his breast, for cravats were then uncanonical."[1]

The Sabbath, therefore, was generally respected; but that there were many unruly spirits who profaned it is evident from the ordinance of October 26, 1656, which forbade all the usual pursuits of trade and labor,—"much less any idle or unallowed sports, such as drinking to excess, frequenting inns or taphouses, dancing, card-playing, tick-tacking, playing at ball, playing at bowls, playing at nine-pins, taking jaunts in boats, wagons or carriages, before, between or during divine service; and, particularly, no innkeeper nor tapster shall be allowed, before, between nor during divine service, to follow his customary business nor undertake to tap, hand out, give or sell any brandywines, beers or ardent spirits, directly or indirectly." Very heavy fines were provided for infringement of this enactment, and when the British came into possession, they legislated in the same direction.

The connection between the state and the church was very close in the New Netherlands, and the Council was intolerant toward dissenters. The ordinance of February 1, 1656, is an example. It absolutely prohibited "all public or private conventicles or assemblies as are without the wonted (and only allowed by God's word) Reformed and appointed assembly of the Reformed Religion, in conformity with the synod of Dort, here, in this land, in our Fatherland and in other Reformed Churches observed and followed, under the penalty of one hundred pounds Flemish, to be incurred by all those persons who in such public or private assemblies, without the wonted and authorized assembly, whether on the Sunday or any other day, being unauthorized, shall presume to exercise the profession of Preaching, Prelection or singing; and twenty-five pounds, alike Flemish, to be incurred over and above by every male and female, married and single, who may be found in such assembly." It is curious that while the Dutch authorities thus interdicted all religions but their own, they protested in this ordinance that they intended no "prejudice to any patent heretofore given by them, or any lording over the conscience, or prohibiting the reading of God's holy word, or the domestic praying and reading of each one in his family; but all public and private conventicles and assemblies, whether in public or private houses, without the aforesaid wonted and established Reformed Divine worship."

When the English régime began, it evinced more liberality to every sect except the Roman Catholics. The articles of capitulation expressly provided that "the Dutch here shall enjoy the liberty of their consciences in divine worship and church discipline." None but Protestant ministers were allowed to officiate within the government, but difference of judgment was allowed to all who professed Christianity. The English made the maintenance of the ministry and poor a chief care of their admininistration, and their laws and edicts relating thereto are multifarious. They appointed overseers for each parish to levy assessments for the building of churches, the payment of the clergy and the maintenance of paupers, and while they tolerated other forms of faith, they compelled every person to pay the rates of the church "whereof he doth or may receive benefit." Governor Nicolls expressed the exact obligation in the order that "every township is obliged to pay their minister according to such agreement as they shall make with him, and no man to refuse his proportion, the minister being elected by the major part of the householders inhabitants of the town." It was the original scheme of the English that in each parish a church "should be built in the most convenient part thereof, capable to receive and accommodate two hundred persons," but this was found impracticable, for in 1655 it was provided that such churches should be built within three years afterward, and to that end a town rate or tax was authorized to begin that year. In default of payment of the church rates by towns or individuals, a summary process was authorized for the collection of the assessments and subscriptions.

It must not, however, be taken for granted that the Church of England immediately became the Established Church in New York. The controversy between Governor Sloughter and the Assembly, in 1693, points the religious history of the time. All the members of the Assembly but one were Dissenters, and in considering a bill for settling a ministry they obstinately refused to incorporate an amendment submitted by the Governor, providing that the bill should be presented to him, "to be approved and collated." His object was to construct it to the advantage of the Church of England, and as the Assemblymen could not be coerced or persuaded, he prorogued the session and scolded them vigorously in an address wherein he notified them that he "would take care that neither heresy, schism nor rebellion be preached amongst you."

This enactment of September 22, 1693, required the establishment of a "a good, sufficient Protestant minister, to officiate and have the care of souls within one year next" in specified districts. Two were ordered for Westchester County—"one to have the care of Westchester, East Chester, Yonkers and the Manor of Pelham; the other to have the care of Rye, Mamaroneck and Bedford." Each was to be paid fifty pounds per annum by a levy laid upon the people, which they might pay "in country produce at money price." Iron-clad enactments protected the pastor against the possibility of non-payment of salary. The justices of the county were required to issue warrants to the constables to summon the freeholders on the second Tuesday of January, to choose ten vestrymen and two church wardens; the justices and the vestrymen laid the tax, and if it was not paid, the constables had the power to distrain for it. At each stage of the proceedings fines were provided for persons or officials who failed to discharge their duties.[1]

The Puritans were keenly affected by this issue. Francis Doughty, who had been expelled by the Congregationalists from Taunton, Mass., is said to have been the first Puritan or Presbyterian minister in New York. He officiated from 1643 to 1648, and was supported by voluntary contributions from the Puritans and Dutch of the city. Puritans were certainly among the early settlers of Westchester. In volume iii. page 557, of the Documentary History of New York, there is an interesting description of a Puritan service at Westchester in 1656, conducted by two laymen, Robert Bassett and a Mr. Bayley, who were probably ruling elders, one reading a sermon and the other leading in prayer. When the colony was surrendered to the Duke of York, in September, 1644, there were within its bounds six Puritan ministers settled with their flocks. There were Puritan bands at Rye and Westchester without pastors.[2]

Governor Andros did not trouble the Puritan churches, which lost some of their veteran pastors, but continued to increase in numbers. Nathaniel Brewster settled at Brookhaven and supplied East Chester in 1665. In 1674 Eliphalet Jones supplied Rye and Ezekiel Fogg supplied East Chester. In 1675 Peter Prudden preached at Rye, and Thomas Denham settled there in 1677. Thus within twelve years there were five Presbyterian clergymen exercising their functions in Westchester County. They and their flocks shared in the struggle which all Dissenters had to make with Governor Sloughter's efforts to establish the Church of England as the State Church, but still Presbyterianism flourished. In Westchester County Rev. John Woodbridge located at Rye and Rev. Warham Mather at Westchester in 1684.

These two clergymen were among the most important personages in the lively episode which followed the conversion of Rev. William Vesey, a Puritan pastor in New York, to the Church of England His change of faith is said to have been procured by Colonel Heathcote, who, upon his settlement at Scarsdale, Westchester County, in 1692, showed himself a still zealous proselyter for the Church of England. In a letter to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, dated April 10, 1704, he relates a contention that was of great moment at the time:

"The people of Westchester, East Chester and a place called Lower Yonkers agreed with one Warren Mather, and the people of Rye with one Mr. Woodbridge, both of New England, there being at that time scarce six in the whole county who so much as inclined to the church. After Mather had been with them some time, Westchester parish made choice of me for one of their church wardens in hopes of using my influence with Colonel (Governor) Fletcher to have Mather inducted to the living. I told them it was altogether impossible for me to comply with their desires, it being wholly repugnant to the laws of England to compel the subject to pay for the maintenance of any minister who was not of the National Church, and that it lay not in any Governor's power to help them, but since they were so zealous for having religion and good order settled amongst 'em, I would propose a medium in that matter, which was that there being at Boston a French Protestant Minister, Mr. Bondett, a very good man, who was in orders from my Lord (Archbishop) of London, and the people of New Rochelle being destitute of a minister, we would call Mr. Bondett to the living, and the parish being large enough to maintain two, we would likewise continue Mr. Mather and support him by subscription. The vestry seemed to be extreamly well pleased with this proposal and desired me to send for Mr. Bondett, which I immediately did, hoping by that means to bring them over to the church; but Mather, apprehending what I aimed at, persuaded the vestry to alter their resolutions, and when he came they refused to call him, so that projection failing me, and finding that it was impossible to make any progress toward settling the church so long as Mather continued among us, I made it my business in the next place to devise ways to gett him out of the country, which I was not long in contriving, which being effected and having gained some few proselytes in every town, and those who were of the best esteem amongst 'em, who having none to oppose them, and being assisted by Mr. Vesey and Mr. Bondett, who very often preached in several parts of the country, baptizing the children, by easy methods the people were soon wrought into a good opinion of the church and indeed beyond my expectations."

[1] The language of the act refers only to a "Protestant Minister." "There can be no doubt," says Mr. Dawson, in the "Historical Magazine," "that it was the intention of the Assembly to provide for the maintenance of the Dissenting clergy. The act was very loosely worded, which, as things stood when it was made, could not be avoided. The Dissenters could claim the benefit of it as well as Churchmen, and unless wrested from its true bearing, it admitted a construction in their favor. In fact, it was arbitrarily and illegally wrested from its true bearing and made to answer the purpose of the English Church party, which was a very small minority of the people affected by the operation of the law. The act itself is a conclusive argument against the alleged establishment of the Church of England in the province of New York. It was not established of any law of the province, nor by the ecclesiastical law of England extending over the province, which was thus excluded or modified by express law made by competent authority.

[2] "Puritanism in New York," by Rev. Charles A. Briggs, D.D. Magazine of American History, January, 1885.

It is not explained by what means Heathcote drove the Puritan clergymen out of the country, but it is not doubtful that he turned many of the Presbyterians over to the Anglican faith and prepared the way for the work of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge, an organization of the Church of England, which sent John Bartow out as a missionary. He was placed in charge of the Puritan Churches of East Chester, Westchester and Jamaica by Governor Cornbury, and the Puritan ministers, Joseph Morgan, of Westchester, and John Hubbard, of Jamaica, were forced to retire from their church buildings and parsonages.[1] The latter made a fight, but Cornbury ousted him in favor of Bartow, who then attacked Morgan, with the result narrated in his own letter of December 1, 1707, to the secretary of the Society:

"Not long after this my Lord (Cornbury) requested me to go and preach at East Chester; accordingly I went (tho' some there had given out threatening words should I dare to come), but tho' I was there very early and the people had notice of my coming, their Presbyterian minister, Mr. Morgan, had begun service in the meeting-house, to which I went straitway and continued the whole time of service without interruption, and in the afternoon I was permitted to perform the Church of England services, Mr. Morgan being present, and neither he or the people seemed to be dissatisfied, and after some time of preaching there afterwards they desired me to come oftener, and I concluded to minister there once a month, which now I have done for about three years, and Mr. Morgan is retired into New England."[2]

Puritanism lost somewhat of its hold upon the people in consequence of the opposition of Cornbury; but with the accession of the house of Hanover to the English throne, in 1714, persecution of the Puritans in America ceased. On November 22, 1718, Rev. Wm. Tennent settled at East Chester and began to rebuild Puritanism in the county. He removed to Bedford May 1, 1720, and remained until August, 1726, preaching in all the townships. When Methodism divided the churches of the colony into antagonistic forces he became one of its leaders. An impetuous revival of faith occurred, which was guided by Thomas Smith at Rye and Samuel Sackett at Bedford. Tennent and his adherents were excluded from the Synod of Philadelphia in 1741, in the absence of the entire Presbytery of New York. The excluded Methodists rallied around the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and in 1745 it combined with the Presbytery of New York in erecting the Synod of New York, all of whose churches were in sympathy with the Methodists. In 1752 the Rye Church united with the Synod and thus all the original Puritan Churches of New York, organized in the seventeenth century, were combined in one compact Synodical organization. On

This was done, or attempted, at Westchester and East Chester, Rye and Bedford. In Rye only, of all these towns, no church had been built; but a tax was levied upon the inhabitants for its erection, and meanwhile the house and lands which had been provided for a minister and held by a succession of pastors, were taken for the missionary." He resisted all the influence brought to bear upon him and remained faithful. He labored for many years as a Presbyterian minister and died in New Jersey in connection with the Synod of Philadelphia. the order that "every township is obliged to pay their minister according to such agreement as they shall make with him, and no man to refuse his proportion, the minister being elected by the major part of the householders inhabitants of the town." It was the original scheme of the English that in each parish a church "should be built in the most convenient part thereof, capable to receive and accommodate two hundred persons," but this was found impracticable, for in 1655 it was provided that such churches should be built within three years afterward, and to that end a town rate or tax was authorized to begin that year. In default of payment of the church rates by towns or individuals, a summary process was authorized for the collection of the assessments and subscriptions.

It must not, however, be taken for granted that the Church of England immediately became the Established Church in New York. The controversy between Governor Sloughter and the Assembly, in 1693, points the religious history of the time. All the members of the Assembly but one were Dissenters, and in considering a bill for settling a ministry they obstinately refused to incorporate an amendment submitted by the Governor, providing that the bill should be presented to him, "to be approved and collated." His object was to construct it to the advantage of the Church of England, and as the Assemblymen could not be coerced or persuaded, he prorogued the session and scolded them vigorously in an address wherein he notified them that he "would take care that neither heresy, schism nor rebellion be preached amongst you."

This enactment of September 22, 1693, required the establishment of a "a good, sufficient Protestant minister, to officiate and have the care of souls within one year next" in specified districts. Two were ordered for Westchester County—"one to have the care of Westchester, East Chester, Yonkers and the Manor of Pelham; the other to have the care of Rye, Mamaroneck and Bedford." Each was to be paid fifty pounds per annum by a levy laid upon the people, which they might pay "in country produce at money price." Iron-clad enactments protected the pastor against the possibility of non-payment of salary. The justices of the county were required to issue warrants to the constables to summon the freeholders on the second Tuesday of January, to choose ten vestrymen and two church wardens; the justices and the vestrymen laid the tax, and if it was not paid, the constables had the power to distrain for it. At each stage of the proceedings fines were provided for persons or officials who failed to discharge their duties.[1]

The Puritans were keenly affected by this issue. Francis Doughty, who had been expelled by the Congregationalists from Taunton, Mass., is said to have been the first Puritan or Presbyterian minister in New York. He officiated from 1643 to 1648, and was supported by voluntary contributions from the Puritans and Dutch of the city. Puritans were certainly among the early settlers of Westchester. In volume iii. page 557, of the Documentary History of New York, there is an interesting description of a Puritan service at Westchester in 1656, conducted by two laymen, Robert Bassett and a Mr. Bayley, who were probably ruling elders, one reading a sermon and the other leading in prayer. When the colony was surrendered to the Duke of York, in September, 1644, there were within its bounds six Puritan ministers settled with their flocks. There were Puritan bands at Rye and Westchester without pastors.[2]

Governor Andros did not trouble the Puritan churches, which lost some of their veteran pastors, but continued to increase in numbers. Nathaniel Brewster settled at Brookhaven and supplied East Chester in 1665. In 1674 Eliphalet Jones supplied Rye and Ezekiel Fogg supplied East Chester. In 1675 Peter Prudden preached at Rye, and Thomas Denham settled there in 1677. Thus within twelve years there were five Presbyterian clergymen exercising their functions in Westchester County. They and their flocks shared in the struggle which all Dissenters had to make with Governor Sloughter's efforts to establish the Church of England as the State Church, but still Presbyterianism flourished. In Westchester County Rev. John Woodbridge located at Rye and Rev. Warham Mather at Westchester in 1684.

These two clergymen were among the most important personages in the lively episode which followed the conversion of Rev. William Vesey, a Puritan pastor in New York, to the Church of England His change of faith is said to have been procured by Colonel Heathcote, who, upon his settlement at Scarsdale, Westchester County, in 1692, showed himself a still zealous proselyter for the Church of England. In a letter to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, dated April 10, 1704, he relates a contention that was of great moment at the time:

"The people of Westchester, East Chester and a place called Lower Yonkers agreed with one Warren Mather, and the people of Rye with one Mr. Woodbridge, both of New England, there being at that time scarce six in the whole county who so much as inclined to the church. After Mather had been with them some time, Westchester parish made choice of me for one of their church wardens in hopes of using my influence with Colonel (Governor) Fletcher to have Mather inducted to the living. I told them it was altogether impossible for me to comply with their desires, it being wholly repugnant to the laws of England to compel the subject to pay for the maintenance of any minister who was not of the National Church, and that it lay not in any Governor's power to help them, but since they were so zealous for having religion and good order settled amongst 'em, I would propose a medium in that matter, which was that there being at Boston a French Protestant Minister, Mr. Bondett, a very good man, who was in orders from my Lord (Archbishop) of London, and the people of New Rochelle being destitute of a minister, we would call Mr. Bondett to the living, and the parish being large enough to maintain two, we would likewise continue Mr. Mather and support him by subscription. The vestry seemed to be extreamly well pleased with this proposal and desired me to send for Mr. Bondett, which I immediately did, hoping by that means to bring them over to the church; but Mather, apprehending what I aimed at, persuaded the vestry to alter their resolutions, and when he came they refused to call him, so that projection failing me, and finding that it was impossible to make any progress toward settling the church so long as Mather continued among us, I made it my business in the next place to devise ways to gett him out of the country, which I was not long in contriving, which being effected and having gained some few proselytes in every town, and those who were of the best esteem amongst 'em, who having none to oppose them, and being assisted by Mr. Vesey and Mr. Bondett, who very often preached in several parts of the country, baptizing the children, by easy methods the people were soon wrought into a good opinion of the church and indeed beyond my expectations."

[1] The language of the act refers only to a "Protestant Minister." "There can be no doubt," says Mr. Dawson, in the "Historical Magazine," "that it was the intention of the Assembly to provide for the maintenance of the Dissenting clergy. The act was very loosely worded, which, as things stood when it was made, could not be avoided. The Dissenters could claim the benefit of it as well as Churchmen, and unless wrested from its true bearing, it admitted a construction in their favor. In fact, it was arbitrarily and illegally wrested from its true bearing and made to answer the purpose of the English Church party, which was a very small minority of the people affected by the operation of the law. The act itself is a conclusive argument against the alleged establishment of the Church of England in the province of New York. It was not established of any law of the province, nor by the ecclesiastical law of England extending over the province, which was thus excluded or modified by express law made by competent authority.

November 29, 1769, Mr. De Witt offered in the Assembly a bill "to exempt the inhabitants of the Counties of Westchester, New York, Queens and Richmond from any taxation for support of the Ministers of churches to which they do not belong." And this was finally passed with amendments applying it especially to persons not in communion with the Church of England.

The Dutch pioneers on Manhattan found it convenient to adopt the currency of the Indians, who took the common periwinkle, called by them "Meteanhock," found in great quantities along the shores, and having broken it so as to secure the thick portion at the stem, they made of this beads about the size of a straw and a third of an inch in length.[1] This was the white sewan of least value. A black bead of the same description was made from the large round clam called the "quahaug." These beads were woven into belts, and divided into pieces of different values.

CONTINENTAL CURRENCY.

Four beads counted for a stuyver or two for a cent, and a braided string a fathom long was valued at four guilders, equivalent to $1.66. Sewant was commonly measured by spans, and the Indians, in their traffic with the Dutch, always chose as traders their men who could cover the greatest length between finger and thumb.

But counterfeits sprung up, and the currency in course of time became debased. The Indian money was even imported from Europe, where imitations were made of porcelain, but this base article could not impose on the natives, and the counterfeit failed as a speculation. The "good splendid sewant of Manhattans" was the genuine article and passed in all the Indian country roundabout, for this island and the neighboring sections were the great mint of the Indians. Up the North River, in Westchester and elsewhere, sewant had its legal tender value well defined until so many broken, unstrung and badly made pieces came into circulation that the Dutch government—coin still being scarce—was obliged to find a new currency. Beaver-skins supplied the deficiency and became the next fiat money of the day. This was an article less subject to fluctuations and was divided into "whole beavers" and "half beavers," the former being rated at about three dollars. What little of the Dutch currency was in circulation was known as "Hollands." In contracts for sale and purchase of real estate and personal property, the distinctive sorts of payment were usually expressed; and if not stated, it was understood that sewant was the consideration. There were certain sorts of contracts, however, such as ocean freights, in which, by the customs of merchants, it was implied that payment was to be made in beavers. On account of the debasement of the sewant currency, the Council ordered in May, 1650, that six white or three black sewants should pass for one stuyver (half a cent), and the base strung sewant, eight white or four black for one stuyver.

Legal tender legislation was not then so well understood. Many people refused to accept the base sewant until, in the following September, the Council enacted "that the base strung sewant should be received by every one without distinction, in payment for small daily and necessary commodities in housekeeping, and that it should be current as follows: For twelve guilders or under, all may be paid in base strung sewant; from twelve to twenty-four guilders, half base and half good strung sewant; and in larger sums agreeably to the agreement between buyer and seller." In 1658 the rate was again altered to eight white and four black of the good sewant for one stuyver. The colony was suffering from a superabundant and depreciated currency, which was intrinsically worthless. Beavers, which had an actual value apart from that which legislation could place upon them, appreciated until they were rated at sixteen guilders each; and, as a matter of course, provisions and household necessaries followed the upward movement of the currency which kept anything like an even ratio with real money. Shop-keepers, tapsters, brewers, bakers, grocers and workingmen charged a difference of eighty, ninety or a hundred per cent. between sewant and beaver in taking pay for their goods or their labor. The Council struggled bravely to enhance the value of the sewant by resorting to the fiction that values can be controlled by arbitrary enactment. Its next law (November 11, 1658) was "that the brewers, tapsters, bakers, and other shopkeepers and common grocers, should sell the daily necessary family commodities to the buyers at their different prices, to wit, silver money, beavers and sewant: as for instance, the brewers should deliver one barrel of good beer for ten guilders (about $3.80) in silver money, according to the Holland value of fifteen guilders in beavers, the beaver at eight guilders to twenty-two guilders; in sewant eight white or four black for a stuyver."

It is testimony to the drinking customs of the Dutch families[1] that beer and wine were estimated by the law as necessaries of which no household should be deprived by exorbitant or fluctuating prices.

The cost of the malt liquor was made little enough in this ordinance of 1658, and it was equally accommodating in providing that French wine should cost no more than eighteen stuyvers (nine cents) the pint in silver money; Spanish wine no more than twenty-four stuyvers, and brandywine only five stuyvers for a gill. Yet these prices, which were official, so to speak, were subject to the competition set up by the smugglers, whose illicit trade in the harbor and for a long distance up the Hudson had much to do with stocking the bars of the tapsters and the cellars of the manorial lords, besides furnishing the Indians and slaves with the cheap liquors that incited them to riot, "whereby," says the ordinance of October 26, 1656, "almost all the calamities occur." This omnibus enactment proceeded after the smugglers with a stinging thong. Five hundred guilders was the fine fixed for the first offense, and the forfeiture of the "barque, yacht, boat or canoe" the owner whereof attempted to evade the custom officers, for the second. Still the rewards of the prohibited trade were so tempting, that the many seamen engaged in it continued to run the gauntlet. They brought their cargoes to the numerous secure nooks on the river-shore in Westchester County, and when the contraband goods were once unloaded and run into the back-country, they might defy detection.

In pursuing the smugglers the Council did not omit to pay attention to various frauds perpetrated by lawful traders. The comprehensive enactment aimed at the smugglers also embraced a fulmination against the bakers. It obliged them "at least once or twice a week, to bake both coarse and white loaves of bread, both for Christians and Indians, at the established price and weight of one double coarse loaf, eight pounds, for fourteen stuyvers," and smaller loaves in proportion. The double white loaf was required to weigh two pounds, and to be sold for eight stuyvers. In case of light-weight bread, or overcharges, the bread was forfeited and the baker fined twenty-five guilders for the first offense, fifty for the second, and for the third six hundred guilders and absolutely prohibited from conducting the business. No bakers were permitted "to sell any bread made of sifted bran, whether at wholesale or retail, to Christians or Indians; but the bakers of coarse bread may make their coarse bread of the ground grain as it comes from the mill." It was further enacted that in consequence of "the many frauds in baking and tapping," "no person shall follow the business of baking and tapping without first having made application to those of the magistrates in their respective districts, and having procured from the same or their authorized agents a license for that business," which was to be renewed quarterly.

The criminal law was rigorously administered in the primitive days, and its penalties were almost ferociously harsh. About the time of the settlement of New York hanging was succeeding beheading in the northern European countries as the means of executing those convicted of capital crime, and it was not long before the hangman became one of the officials of the colonies. His methods were far more brutal and painful than those which a more humane civilization has since devised. Instead of the modern trap, or other appliances designed to dislocate the vertebræ of the convict, the old-time gibbet was merely two uprights with a cross beam, from which depended the rope and noose. He was driven under it in a cart, the noose fastened about his neck and the cart driven off, leaving him to perish slowly of strangulation. Such malefactors were always hanged in chains and their bodies left swinging in the irons for months, a supposed ghastly and terrible warning to evil-doers. Sometimes the hangman would jump upon the shoulders or swing from the feet of the criminal in order to expedite the strangling process.

The stocks, the pillory and the whipping-post were instruments of punishment for lesser offenses. They were part of the judicial equipment of every county town or seat of government, and stood conveniently near to the court-house or jail, for in the early days both were usually situated in one building. Punishment by the pillory was much the more severe, the victim being in a standing position; but even that by the stocks was exceedingly painful, and it was not uncommon for men to swoon under the agony of either the pillory or the stocks. But while the colonists followed European precedent in the infliction of rigorous penalties, and their laws embraced many statutory crimes now abolished, yet they made no use of such instruments of torture as the rack, wheel, thumb-screw or pincers, found in all European prisons and even the ducking-stool seems not to have been employed outside of New England.

It will be gathered from the foregoing that the government of New Amsterdam, which exercised jurisdiction over Westchester County, went a long distance into the details of every-day life, and was almost microscopic in its purview of the incidents of trade and personal relations. While this is true, it was yet liberal and generous. Modern criticism may take exception to its religious intolerance, but that was more apparent than real. The Dutch settlers at Manhattan and above on the Hudson were soon joined by English Puritans, Huguenots from Rochelle, Waldenses from the Piedmont country of France, German Lutherans and Anabaptists, Swedes and Catholic Walloons. They lived together amicably, because the Dutch trend in the new country was toward tolerance, whatever it might have been in the old.

Incidents that took place within and around the historic houses of Westchester County during the Revolution reveal much of the methods and surroundings of the people in those days.[1] The phlegmatic Dutchman who then occupied the Livingston house at Dobbs Ferry, was for a time frightened away by the hum of cannon-balls about his premises. When, in 1777 General Lincoln made the place his headquarters, he piled four barrels of gunpowder in a little shed in the rear of the house, answering the proprietor's remonstrances with the remark that "it was a good dry place for it." After the army marched away the Dutchman found that the barrels contained nothing but sand, and had been placed there as a ruse to deceive the enemy if any of their spies should come prowling about.

Here Washington entertained the Duc de Lauzun, Count de Rochambeau, Steuben and others of the distinguished foreign officers, on July 6, 1781. Alexander Hamilton presided, and his graceful manners and witty speeches provoked universal admiration. Here also Washington and Sir Guy Carleton, and their respective suites met to arrange for the evacuation of New York by the British. On the sequestration of the Philipsburgh Manor the property was purchased by Peter Van Brugh Livingston, and it thence took his family name.

The Roger Morris house, at the most elevated point of Harlem Heights, where the steep, rocky right bank of the Harlem River slopes gently to the southwest, was built, in 1758, for the man whose name it bears. He was a captain in the British army, and in that year married the lovely Mary Philipse, for whose hand Washington is said to have been an unsuccessful suitor. A lively fancy may be permitted to call up his emotions when, in September, 1776, as commander-in-chief of the American army, he made the residence of the woman who had rejected him his headquarters, or when, in July, 1790, as President of the United States, he revisited it, she and her husband being attainted fugitives from the home which the new government had confiscated. The wealthy Frenchman, Stephen Jumel, bought it, and his wife adorned it with an exquisite taste and lavish hand. There she lived until her death, in 1865; there, in the days of her widowhood, she married Aaron Burr, and it was over this very valuable estate that her heirs wrangled until the courts disposed of it.[2]

During and after the fight at Chatterton's Hill Washington had his headquarters in the Miller house

[1] Soldiers and marauders plundered indiscriminately in Westchester County, until Washington sent Aaron Burr to take command. A letter from Judge Samuel Youngs, of Mount Pleasant, printed in the "Historical Magazine" for June, 1871, says: "No man went to bed but under the apprehension of having his house plundered or burnt, or himself or family massacred before morning. Some, under the character of Whigs, plundered the Tories; while others of the latter description, plundered the Whigs. Parties of marauders assuming either character or none, as suited their convenience, indiscriminately assailed both Whigs and Tories." Burr came to the county in the fall of 1778 and stopped all this by military rule and strict enforcement of order.

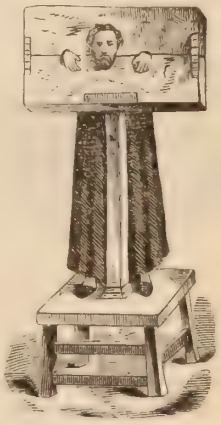
at White Plains, which until recently was in the possession of that family, by whose name it is still known. He was frequently at the Birdsall house, in Peekskill, which was one of the first buildings erected in the village. It was a favorite tavern and was repeatedly visited by the officers when the allied armies, under Washington and Rochambeau, menaced the English positions in and about New York. It stands on the old post road and is still kept as a tavern. Near by are yet seen the remains of the old fort which crowned this elevated position at the mouth of the Highland Gorge.[1]

It appears from some Revolutionary papers that there were localities in Westchester County which are now unknown. Washington, in his order-book, under date of October 24, 1782, directs:

"The tents being too cold for the accommodation of the sick, the regimental surgeons will send no more to the flying hospital, but have such as are hospital patients sent to the huts at New Boston." Where was "New Boston?"



On the night of the 13th of May, 1781, Lieutenant Colonel Greene, the hero of Red Bank, was killed at his quarters on the Croton River, near the site of the present dam, by a party of De Lancey's corps. Paymaster Thomas Hughes, of the American army, who was in the house at the time, contrived to escape. A letter describing the action, written a few hours afterward, he dates at Rhode Island Village. Where was "Rhode Island Village?"[2]

The old-time taverns of the county had their records worthy of preservation. One of the most celebrated of these was the "Blue Bell," concerning the location of which there has been much controversy. In vol. iv., No. 6, of the Historical Magazine, June, 1880, Charles A. Campbell thus indicates it in a quotation from an old chronicle:

"The holy sacrament was administered to the Huguenots of New Rochelle four times a year, viz., Christmas, Easter, Whitsunday and the middle of September. During the intermissions that occurred the communicants walked to New York for that purpose. Prior to their departure, on a Sunday, they always collected the young children and left them in the care of their friends, while they set off early in the morning and walked to the city barefooted, carrying their shoes and stockings in their hands. About twelve miles from New York, at a place since called the Blue Bell, there was a large rock by the roadside covered with cedar; here they stopped for a short time to rest and take some refreshments, and then proceeded on their journey till they came to Fresh Water Pond, within the bounds of the city. Here they washed their feet, put on their shoes and stockings, and walked to the French Church (the old church Du St. Esprit in Pine Street), where they generally arrived by the time service begun."

A writer in the same magazine (vol. viii., No. 4, October, 1881) located the tavern on the east side of the old King's Bridge road, "opposite the old yellow house now standing south of One Hundred and Eighty-first Street," and added that it was directly east of Fort Washington, and was demolished about 1820. To support his statement against those writers who urged that it was on the west side of that highway, he quotes at length (vol. iv. p. 460; v. p. 142; vi. pp. 64, 22, 300), from the reminiscences and papers of Isaac M. Dyckman and Blazius Ryer. He contends that the mistake arose from the location of another old house about half a mile south of the "Blue Bell," and which was on the west side of the road and was destroyed by fire about 1846. The Magazine of American History for November, 1881, reviews all this testimony and draws the deduction that the colonial tavern was on the west side, but that some time after 1802, the first hostelry of the name having been abandoned in 1787, Blaze Moore revived the old sign of the "Blue Bell" at a tavern which he kept on the east side.[3]

Lossing's gossip of this venerable house of refreshment[4] accepts the west side theory and makes it a structure that, when he wrote, was still standing and occupied as a dwelling. He quotes Cadwallader Colden, who, in October, 1753, wrote to his wife of having rested at it on a journey to New York, when it was "very well kept by a Dutchman named Vanderventer, and our food and lodgings were very comfortable." Tradition says that General Heath occupied it for his headquarters in October, 1776, and that Washington and Lee met there on the morning when they followed the American army and journeyed together to the Bronx. It was the headquarters of the Hessian Colonel Ralle after the assault on Fort Washington. One of his aides fell in love with the pretty sister of young Vanderventer, and promised to remain in America if she would marry him. Her mother and Ralle favored the union, and despite the opposition of her brother, they were married in Ralle's own

[2] Histo. Mag., vol. vi. No. 1, January, 1881.

[3] The abundant references for this theory include the records of the Van Ohlem's tract. Gauthier's survey of the northern part of New York Island, made by order of Lord Percy, in November, 1776, locates the "Blue Bell" on the west of the road on the lane leading to Fort Washington. In 1848 John Macdonald made the note that "the old stone house in the field west of the road at Fort Washington was the 'Blue Bell' tavern of the Revolutionary war, kept by Jacob Moore."

room by his chaplain the night before his departure from the "Blue Bell." The young husband was made prisoner by Washington at the battle of Trenton, and refusing to be exchanged took the oath of allegiance to the United States, and settled in East Jersey.

On October 24, 1783, Washington stood in front of this tavern to review the troops as they were marching into New York. There he confided to the care of Major Robert Burnet, commanding the rear-guard, a young deserter from the British army, who had secretly married an American girl at the "Blue Bell" on the preceding day. Thus twice the venerable inn had been the scene of a clandestine wedding.[1]

The October, 1881, issue of the Historical Magazine has these additional notices of old houses on the King's Bridge road,—

THE BLUE BELL TAVERN.

The Cross Keys, the very old stone house on this road, at about One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Street, is probably the only survivor of the outward Revolutionary inns. It was, traditionally, one of Washington's stopping-places, and was known as the Cross Keys, by reason of two keys being crossed on the sign-board. It is said to have been kept by David Wares.

The Dyckman House, the only real Dutch farm-house extant on this road, standing not far from the twelve-mile stone, was built by Jacob Dyckman, as we are told by Isaac M. Dyckman, the present representative of the name at King's Bridge, just after the close of the war, the original family mansion being burned by the enemy. The said Dyckman, a very enterprising and wealthy man, was the projector of the bridge across Harlem River, sometimes called by his name, and owned the land on which the large hotel at King's Bridge now stands. The old one stood on about the same foundation, and was burnt down some forty years ago. Fifty-five years ago it is remembered as kept by James Devoe. General Heath, in his "Memoirs," speaks of it as Hyatt's tavern. This was in 1777. Devoe subsequently hired it to one Jacob Hyatt. Doubtless it was sometimes called Dyckman's tavern, from the Dyckman ownership.

The McComb House, at King's Bridge, long the property of Joseph Godwin, Esq., is said to have been used as a tavern during the Revolution, and Mrs. Robert McComb was accustomed to point out to her guests one of the upper rooms as once the lodging-room of General Washington. The venerable Dr. Bibby, of Cortlandt House, states that this property was purchased, shortly after the War of Independence, of the heirs of Eden Metcalf by Alexander McComb, of New York, the father of General Alexander McComb, of the United States army.

The Century House.—The oldest farm-house now standing on or near the King's Bridge road is that known as "the Century House." It is on the Harlem River bank, and belongs to the ancient Nagle family, original landholders of that part of the island with the Dyckmans. Its date, marked on a stone inserted in the front wall, is, if we remember right, 1734. It is described by W. C. Smith in his article on the Roger Morris house.—Mag. of Am. Hist., vi. 103.

There were two "Black Horse" inns of fame. That of the colonial and Revolutionary period was situated near McGown's Pass, and was still standing in 1812. The second was built in 1805 near the Tabby Hook Landing, or what is now called Inwood Street, and was the half-way house for the Albany coaches between their starting-point in New York City and the first change at Yonkers.[2] Henry Norman was its builder and original proprietor, and when the Widow Crawford kept it, a sign, bearing the figure of a black horse, swung from a pole in front of the door. Neither the inn nor the land on which it stands has had many owners. In 1740 John Schuyler, Jr., Philip Schuyler, Stephen Bayard, Jr., and James Stephenson had it by letters patent from the King; from them it passed to John Livingston, who sold it, with all its rights and titles, "except to gold and silver mines," to Johannis Seckeles; he to Henry Norman; he to a Dyckman, and the latter to the Flint family.

These are pictures of days that have long faded into the azure of history, but it seems as if the writer can almost touch the men and women who figured in them as he scans the records they have left of their work and their play, their strong attachments and their fierce resentments, their deeds in peace and war. They are very real when one accompanies them in their homes and follows them through the routine of the day. They were brave, sturdy, passionate, faithful and aggressive people, fitted to conquer virgin soil and found the nation that stands the peer of the ancient commonwealths from which they were derived. Straight down in an unbroken line from them we trace the march of progress that leads to the imperial New York of the present day and the noble environment of Westchester County. Their sons and daughters have been worthy of them, and in the people of the county to-day we see preserved those traits of moral worth, of maternal enterprise, and of lofty patriotism which are the safeguard of the most highly developed American communities.

J. Thomas Scharf

[1] The New York Packet of June 10, 1748, contains the following advertisement:

"The Blue Bell Revived.—Stephen Dolbeer begs leave to acquaint his friends and the public in general that he has opened the Blue Bell Tavern, at Fort Washington, where he hopes for the continuance of his former customers and all those gentlemen who please to favour him with their custom shall be waited on in the genteelest manner. Also good stabling and pasture for horses."

In the Daily Advertiser of February 17, 1787, John Battin advertises that his porter house, at the sign of the Blue Bell, Sloat Lane, will remove on the first of May to the house opposite to the one he then occupied. The carrying of the sign to the city probably disposes of the Revolutionary Blue Bell, as Colles, in his road map of 1789, marks the old house as Waldron's Tavern.

CHAPTER VIII.

GENERAL HISTORY FROM 1783 TO 1860.

BY REV. WILLIAM S. COFFEY, M.A. of East Chester.

Post-Revolutionary Narrative—Public Works—Political History.

It will be readily conceived that years must have elapsed before the memory of the wrongs and of the emotions which they aroused should have disappeared to any extent among the inhabitants of Westchester County, who had suffered so much in the Revolutionary conflict. The bitter animosities in families and between neighbors which had been engendered, it were hard for the most considerate to lay aside, and it were scarce possible that the most trifling disagreement should not reproduce.[1] The high-handed measures of confiscation, which followed the proclamation of peace, served to inflame anew the old sores; and the accusations, indictments, prosecutions and inflictions for offenses of the war-time, which filled up, for several years after it, the proceedings of the County Court of Sessions, are but indications not more of the outrages reprehended, than of the subsequent unwillingness to condone and forget them. The many missed faces, the traces of care and anxiety on those one did meet, the decayed and vacant houses and dilapidated barns, the marked change in the circumstances of the well-to-do families, the alteration in the moral tone, not only of the young, but of many past the years of early life who in them had been most exemplary, the number of diseased and wounded men, many of whom were hastening to their graves, the often felt presence still of the lawless marauder daring enough to follow his once riskless trade—all this kept up long the general sadness and fearfulness.

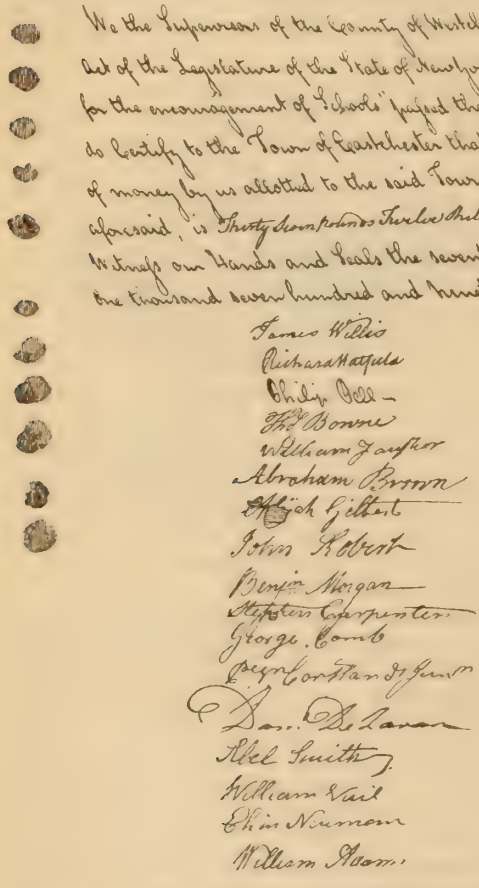
This story, indeed, would be incomplete, if mention were not made of the hundreds of excellent people who reluctantly left the county for foreign homes.

But to those who did remain is the credit due that they settled themselves to their old employments, much impoverished, but with strong wills, and not a few with great hopes. Patriotic expressions, declarations of the difficulties of the situation, wise counselings as to the public policy, and as to the courses of action in the several industries and interests, mingle in the letters of the day, with the usual detail of incident, and ever and anon with passionate denunciation of the past follies of neighbors bringing so much trouble.

The farms of the County, with soil none the best to be sure, were in a while restored to their former yielding power, and signs of the old comfort and thrift began to appear. It was not long before it was realized that the former strength and prosperity were fast returning. The population, which had decreased some one thousand or twelve hundred, began to show marks of increase.

Perhaps nothing gave a stronger impulse to the improvement in the condition of the county than the demand, at the beginning of this century, for the products of the American soil in foreign markets, during the distracting and devastating war on the European Continent. The prices which the farmer obtained were almost fabulous, and all the other industries, of course, flourished under the good fortune. In connection with this, it must also be stated that the freedom of the seas was now open, unrivaled, to the new nation, whose fine harbors so distinctively seemed to point out the commercial consequence to which, under a wise policy, she might attain. The Port of New York was especially marked for its activity, and the number of vessels which weekly started, freighted for foreign markets, seem, under all the circumstances, almost incredible. Of course, from this prosperity of the city, Westchester County, in its turn, derived much advantage.

In noting the progress of the several towns, we are struck with the steadily increasing traffic by land and water, and with the multiplication of the facilities for intercommunication. Smaller roads are being constructed and ready access afforded to the mills, to the villages and to the River and the Sound. The old thoroughfares are being improved and new lengths of road take the place of impracticable old ones. On the east side of the county, by act of the Legislature of 1800, under a company of which Philip Pell, John P. Delancy, Cornelius Rosevelt, Peter J. Munroe and Gabriel Furman are the members mentioned in the bill, a turnpike road was constructed from East Chester to Byram River, over which soon passed the eastward stage to Greenwich, Stamford, Danbury, New Haven and on to Boston, of course covering the various villages of the county which were on the route.



But still other matters attract our attention. The religious services have been resumed at all the old points and the church edifices have been repaired or rebuilt. Where titles were defective and action of the town was required, the steps thought proper were taken at town-meeting, or where an act of the Legislature was needed to protect a neighbor or his family from wrong, it was applied for and obtained. Take, as an instance, the Act passed June 19, 1812, for the heirs of a valued citizen and patriot, John G. Wright, in which it was provided that "letters patent issue for Charity Wright, his widow, and for his heirs for five hundred acres in the tract set apart for the use of the line of this State in the Army of the United States, which said John Wright was a Surgeon's mate in the General Hospital in the Northern Department."

[1] Major Samuel Pell, who before the war had become engaged to his cousin, Mary Pell, seems, from letters of expostulation with him of his brother, Philip Pell, to have been very anxious, as the contest was closing, to abruptly leave the service. He had so distinguished himself, especially at the Battle of Saratoga, as to have received the highest encomiums, and his family was anxious lest he should be a loser by his impatience. But at the dawn of peace he returned home and claimed his affianced, who indignantly spurned him with the declaration that she would not have one come near her, who had the scent of a rebel. Neither of them ever married.

Will one wonder at the bitter feelings of an old inhabitant of East Chester, when he remembered that his mother, with himself an infant in her arms, was compelled to escape in the dead of the night from her burning home—set on fire by the enemy, in pursuit of her husband? The very man who had informed them of Captain L.'s arrival home, how must he have been maddened in his turn when he remembered that he had been lashed, again and again, to force from him his money, and had spent night after night away from his home and family to avoid the violence and robbery of hostile neighbors?

The machinery of the higher courts was set in motion and crimes were promptly punished and wrongs more thoughtfully and certainly redressed. The education of the children became more an object of attention under new incentives and necessities. The provisions of the act of the 9th of April, 1795, by which the sum of one thousand one hundred and ninety-two pounds was given annually for five years for school purposes to the County of Westchester, grew out of this feeling, and were responded to according to the conditions of the gift by the voters of each town, in the appropriation of a sum equal to one-half of what was received, school commissioners being chosen for the distribution of the moneys. The above is a fac-simile of a paper on file in the office of the Town Clerk of East Chester, in which is certified the amount of school money allotted to that town. This was the first apportionment under the act.

We the Supervisors of the County of Westchester pursuant to an Act of the Legislature of the State of New York, intitled "An Act for the encouragement of Schools" passed the ninth of April 1795 do Certify to the Town of Eastchester that the apportionment of money by us allotted to the said Town by virtue of the Act aforesaid, is Thirty three pounds Twelve Shillings and seven pence

Just as readily, in 1812, when an equal sum to that appropriated by the State was in a new Act asked of each town, the vote was readily given, and the proper officers named. During this period, throughout the county, school-houses were being restored or re-erected. Provision for the poor was also freely made yearly by the several towns and by the Board of Supervisors.

In 1786 eighteen hundred pounds were appropriated for the erection of court-houses and jails at White Plains and Bedford. After the burning of the public buildings at White Plains in the war, prisoners had been confined in the jails at New York, Westchester and Kingston, and in other places, temporarily, for safety, and the courts were held in the Presbyterian Church at Bedford and the church building at East Chester (not yet used for religious purposes).

This steady and quite regular increase is the more wonderful as remembered in connection with the known fact of heavy losses by the removal of some of the best people of the County to large farms and more productive localities in the northern and central regions of the State. To the adjoining city there was, and ever since has been, a large annual contribution of those preferring the haunts of trade. The names of Westchester County settlers appear in large numbers in the City Directory of the early years of this century, and in the Record Books of Deeds, Mortgages and Wills, at the county seats of Northern, Central and Western New York. In many cases the farmer soldiers of the Revolution, or those to whom they had sold out their "rights," were eventually settling on the lands which had been laid out for and divided among the troops of the State of New York. Charles Ward, on the 16th of June, 1795, from Palatine Bridge, on the Mohawk, writes: "Business goes on briskly this summer, and my crops like to be good, and I have the prospect of getting in a large crop of wheat."[1]

At the height of this prosperity the course which England and France thought fit to take to weaken each other in 1806 had the most serious effect upon the United States, whose interest and desire was to avoid all complications and preserve peace. In this "afflicting crisis," the consequences of which were felt throughout the land in the depreciation of values, particularly of the agricultural products, the Embargo Act, which prohibited any exportation of goods whatever, brought the people into the still more subdued position, strongly stated at the time as "one in which they shall sell nothing but what they sell to each other" and "all our surplus produce shall rot on our hands."[1] The reduction in the prices went on until it amounted to sixty per cent. Wheat, which had been selling per bushel at two dollars, scarce brought seventy-five cents. And not only were the citizens of the county affected by the diminished value of their goods, but also many of them by the stoppage of the returns from their ventures, in the ships and their cargoes, in which they had joined interest with the traders of the city.

The citizens of Westchester County were prepared without distinction of party to enter with their fellow-citizens of the State into the defense of their common country in the War of 1812. There is abundant evidence that the factious spirit which appeared in New England made but little show in these parts. The questions discussed were rather as to the wisdom and the vigor which characterized the movements in asserting the national dignity than as to the necessity of them. Time had been allowed, since the aggressive act of 1806, to the most partial to realize the narrow and contemptuous feeling of the enemy, and new evidence was continually turning up, in the acts of impressment and uncalled-for interference with our marine, that self-preservation was the necessity of the hour. The numbers of foremost citizens of our towns, who are remembered as in later years referring with pride to their military services in the last war with Great Britain, show that by the best members of the community there was evinced at the time all that zeal, which anxiety for the reputation of the county could desire. In the positions of home defense, as well as of active duty at distant points, and in the invoked labors of placing "the city" in a condition for resistance, the sons of Westchester were behind none of their countrymen.

A careful examination of the condition of the county during the war shows indications rather of prosperity than of embarrassment. The prices were encouraging to labor, and a number of the citizens of those times laid then the foundations of their future wealth. The crops seem to have been abundant. So, when peace was restored, there was a broad basis laid upon which a substantial prosperity might steadily be realized. As in the colonial period, so for many years after it, the population was made up of thrifty farmers, the colored race (not very valuable as help, certainly not as property), of a few tradespeople and mechanics, and of a sprinkling of men of wealth, the influence of whose hereditary or acquired fortunes was distinctly felt in all the neighborhoods in which they had settled. From the following paper may be obtained an impression of the financial strength of the county, and, what will be to many of interest, the names of leading persons in it in the various walks of life:

The emancipation of the slave in Westchester County was undoubtedly less a blessing to him than to his owner. Whatever may be the experience now in the more genial climate of the South, as to the elevation, happiness and increase of the colored race, after the recovery of its freedom, the result here was most disastrous. It was not, however, to the disadvantage of the master, for certain is it that the Westchester agriculturalist found himself called to more intelligent and remunerative tillage when relieved of the scarcely profitable help of his bondman. Such is the universal testimony.

What a sight must have presented itself as over our three great thoroughfares, not only the farmers of the county, but often, as when the river and sound were ice-bound, those of the regions beyond passed into the city with their heavy loads of produce. There were hours of the day when the roads, it is said, were fairly blocked by the heavy traffic upon them, and eye witnesses declare that at night even the floors of the bar and sitting-rooms of the taverns were spread over with the sleepers tarrying to rest themselves and their teams for a few hours on the way.

The activity thus apparent was accompanied with such improvements in the several neighborhoods as readily to attract the attention of travelers. The care taken of the highways and of the various public buildings may be seen in the town and church records. A reference to some of the private accounts shows in the repair of houses and estates a careful and yet liberal expenditure.

It is proper here to say that about this time the Poor House of the County was built. The date of its construction is 1827. It is situated in the town of Mt. Pleasant, about five miles north of White Plains, and two miles east of Tarrytown, in a beautiful portion of the county. The farm contains one hundred and seventy-three acres, and the institution several buildings of stone.

At about the same period the State Prison at Sing Sing, in this county, was erected. It was built from 1825 to 1829, by the convicts themselves. The prison was built here because of the marble quarries upon which the labor of the convicts might be employed. It covers one hundred and thirty acres of land lying on the Hudson River, and a more healthful or beautiful location could not have been selected.

If the eye be allowed to pass over the Table of Population which will be found inserted at the end of this chapter, he will remark how rapid after 1835 the increase. We turn readily to the cause, and delay for moment to detail the steps taken in the construction of the railroads which afford such facilities for traversing the county.

Public Works. — The New York and Harlem Railroad Company was incorporated by the Legislature of the State of New York on the 25th of April, 1831. And its franchises which were increased by several subsequent acts during the next eight years, covered only the City and County of New York and extended only as far as the Harlem River. The difficulties which the company had here to master, were he cause of much of its embarrassment in after years. The route on Manhattan Island presented the most formidable natural obstacles, and entailed consequently the heaviest expenditures. On the 17th of April, 1832, the Legislature by act incorporated the New York and Albany Railroad, with a charter authorizing the construction of a road, commencing on the island of New York, where the Fourth Avenue terminates and extending to the city of Albany. This Company not being able to avail itself of its privileges, "after six years of vicissitude and vain effort" surrendered its rights in Westchester County to the New York and Harlem Railroad. The compact made between the two companies, the Legislature in May 1840 affirmed, empowering the Harlem Company to construct a bridge over the Harlem River and a railroad through Westchester County to an intersection with the New York and Albany's line of road which would be at the southern boundary of Putnam County. The first portion of the road which it was determined to build, was as far up as White Plains, and amusing enough are the limited calculations made by the engineers of the day, to meet the question as to the ability of Westchester County to support a railroad. The passengers and freight from five supposed points at which they would come on the road, are figured out by one of the engineers on the basis of stage fares and tonnage prices, and the result is that $47,788 would be received from passengers and $60.980 from freight or a total of $108,768, which it was said would fully meet all expenditures and yield a profit of at least 25 per cent. on the capital invested. Another engineer calculates upon an immediate income of $60.000, $950 of which is to come from the Catholic School at Fordham and Powell's School at Westchester. The following is another statement ventured by the President of the New York and Albany Railroad in 1838. "The town of East Chester will contribute along with Kain's Marble Quarry $15,000, and six other towns of Westchester County $16,000 to support a railroad." It is safe to affirm that no one took as much interest in the construction of this road as Mr. Gouverneur Morris. The route found to be the most advantageous after leaving the Harlem, was to aim directly for Mill Brook, and thence along it to the valley of the Bronx near William's Bridge, and thence along that valley to White Plains, the whole distance being 20 miles. Here were found broad level flats above the bed of the streams averaging 500 feet in width, skirted by table lands of gravel 30 feet above the flat and averaging 200 feet in width, affording great facilities for grading. Rock occurs at a few points, chiefly granite and gneiss, offering stone for culverts at reasonable distances and inconsiderable expense. The road was constructed and in use to Fordham by October 1841[1] to William's Bridge by 1842, to Tuckchoe by July, 1844 and to White Plains later in the same year, passing through the towns of Morrisania, West Farms, Yonkers, East Chester, Scarsdale, Greenburg and White Plains. Says one long an employee of the road, "the first running of the trains through the county was a matter of great curiosity, and crowds of people surveyed it from the adjoining hills." From the report of the company in 1846, we learn that the cost of construction of six miles of road from the south side of Harlem River Bridge to William's Bridge was $38,475 per mile, while the thirteen miles of road from William's Bridge to White Plains cost $11,277 per mile. Stages from the important villages, were immediately put on for the nearest stations as the work advanced. It is stated as a fact that the company suffered severely at first from the dishonesty of the conductors who collected their fares on board of the trains. The building of the road above White Plains seems to have been proceeded with, after very little, if any, delay. In the report above cited the completion of the whole distance is promised by May, 1847. Mr. Allan Campbell, the engineer, thus details the route chosen: "It pursues the valley of the Bronx for three miles, when it passes to the valley of the Saw Mill by Davis's Brook and Fly Brook . . . The Saw Mill is then followed to its head-waters, where the ridge (of high broken ground running from east to west about eight or ten miles above White Plains, the principal obstacle) is passed with a cutting of only nine feet. The line now descends by the Kisco, a branch of the Croton and Muddy Brook, to Cross River; thence over broken ground between this stream and the Croton to the valley which is occupied through the remainder of Westchester,—a very direct line has been obtained at an expense which must be regarded as moderate, only four structures of any considerable magnitude being required, one of sixty feet over the Bronx, one of eighty feet over the Titicus, one of one hundred and twenty feet over the Cross River and one of one hundred and sixty feet over the Croton at the county line—a single track with twenty-five feet width in excavations and sixteen feet at top of embankments—a substantial and permanent track over which passenger trains may be transported at great speed." The road was opened to Croton Falls in June, 1847, and passed through the towns, above White Plains, of Mt. Pleasant, New Castle, Bedford, Lewisboro and North Castle, and through, it is said, ninety-seven farms. The following familiar names of Westchester County have been connected with the direction of the Harlem: Gouverneur Morris, Thomas W. Ludlow, J. Warren Tompkins, Thomas H. and Edward G. Faile, John Alstyne, Samuel E. Lyon, Philip Dater, Francis W. Edmonds, Francis Kain, Lancaster Underhill, Albert Smith, William C. Wetmore, Edward Haight, Peter Lorillard, William H. Leonard, John E. Burrill, Nathaniel P. Bailey, Augustus A. Cammann and others, of whom Gouverneur Morris was for a while Vice-President, and Mr. Wetmore and Mr. Edmonds for short periods Presidents of the road. The following engineers are remembered in connection with its construction and improvement: James J. Shipman, Mr. Shotwell, Mr. Morgan, Allan Campbell, James B. Sargent and J. C. Buckhout. The present incumbent is F. S. Curtis.[1]

The original capital of the company was but $350,000, which, in 1832, was increased to $500,000, with a stipulation that the road should be completed to the Harlem River in 1835. Although this was not done, the Legislature, in the latter year, authorized the company to increase the capital to $750,000, to borrow $400,000, and in 1839 to convert the bonds into stock. When the extension through Westchester County was begun, the capital had been swollen to $1,950,000, and still another increase of $1,000,000 was needed to carry the road through the county. When the line was completed to Chatham Four Corners, in 1852, it had cost $7,948,118, and its liabilities were over $11,000,000. In 1872 the company leased the New York and Mahopac Railroad from Golden's Bridge to Lake Mahopac, and on April 1st of that year was itself leased for four hundred and one years by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, at eight per cent. in stock and interest on the bonded debt. The amount of stock is $9,450,000; funded debt, $10,618,069; floating debt, $700,000—total, $20,768,069. The road now extends to Chatham, from whence it reaches Albany over the tracks of the Boston and Albany road.

The New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, which, before 1870, was the New York and Hudson River Railroad, passes along the western shore of the county through the towns of King's Bridge (now in the city of New York), Yonkers, Greenburgh, Mt. Pleasant, Ossining and Cortlandt—a distance of about thirty miles. The charter was obtained from the Legislature in May, 1846, but although the importance of the construction of the road was urged in the newspapers of the day,[2] the work was not actually commenced until the middle of the succeeding year. Meanwhile the company had appointed as chief engineer, Mr. John B. Jervis, a gentleman of large experience, and who proved throughout admirably fitted for the arduous duties that fell on him. The company at this time, it seems, complained that they were not met in a fair and equitable spirit by the owners of the land through which the road would pass, "who would derive," it was said, "far greater benefit than the company itself could expect." In the summer of 1847 the route which Mr. Jervis deemed it highly important should follow closely the river, and which had been divided into sections, was placed under contract, and by November all the contractors on the line of the road had commenced work and the desire was to push it forward with all speed Mr. Jervis, by the following remark in his report of January, 1848, indicates his own anxiety: "The contractors cannot induce men to work at night." But the men were found as untractable, when national feuds sprang up among them, and efforts were made to drive each other from the line. This rioting between the "Corkonians and the Far Downs" delayed, of course, the work. But obstacles unavoidable occurred, which, in a large measure were owing to the proximity of the road to the river, adverse winds and tides often hindering the workmen. From the same cause in the cuttings which were found at points very hard, much trouble was occasioned by the flow of the water into the crevices in the rock. The board, however, at the instigation of the engineers did everything it could to encourage the contractors, adopting the principle of making allowances when unforeseen difficulties were presented in the execution of the work.

"The plan of grading," says Mr. William C. Young, who became, in 1849, chief engineer, "for the roadbed south of Poughkeepsie was for a double track, having a width of twenty-six feet in rock-cuttings, twenty-two feet in tunnel cuttings and twenty-four feet between bridge abutments. The embankments have been designed thirty feet wide, having a wide margin of ten feet between the face of the river-wall and the west rail of the track. These dimensions have been carried out in the construction of the road-bed as nearly as could be done consistently with an early opening of the road for public use."

On the 29th of September, 1849, passenger travel over the road as far as Peekskill was commenced. At this time Mr. Jervis became Consulting Engineer of the company. The average number of passengers per day for the first month (October) was eight hundred and thirty, and the total number twenty-one thousand five hundred and ninety-three; and for the next month (November) the average number was ten hundred and fifty-five, and the total number twenty-seven thousand four hundred and forty-one. At this time it was calculated that the land taken for the roadway in Westchester County had cost the company, exclusive of agencies and other charges, $185,905.02, and also that the grading had involved an expenditure of not far from a million of dollars, which was about three hundred thousand dollars above the cost as estimated by the original lettings in 1847. The first train conductors on this road were J. D. Elliot and H. E. Newell.

Of the many interesting incidents in the early history of the running over the road in this county, none perhaps created more of a sensation than the double accident just above Croton, on the 4th of December, 1851. It seems that the four o'clock afternoon train from New York was stopped by the conductor (Carey) to put off two men who would not pay their fare, and was run into by an engine without cars, and five or six passengers were severely injured. But the five o'clock express train (Morgan's) which followed, having switched off to the west track, on coming abreast of the wrecked train halted to render assistance, and while so doing was run into by the five and a-half Peekskill train (Nichols), which had also taken the west track, but was driving ahead heedless of danger at the usual speed. Here again others were hurt, some very seriously. The company exhibited on the occasion great concern for the sufferers, and visited with prompt punishment the offending officials.

The Vanderbilt influence came into control of the New York and Hudson River Railroad in 1864, but the road between New York and Albany was operated independently of the Central Railroad until 1870, when, in accordance with the legislative act of November, 1869, authorizing a consolidation of the whole interest between New York, Buffalo and Suspension Bridge, the consolidated organization assumed the title of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company. The Hudson River road cost, to build and equip, $78,014,954, or $76,272 per mile of track.

The New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad extends through the county, making a junction with the Harlem, at Washingtonville in the town of East Chester, and so passes into the city. It runs in its course from the Connecticut line through the towns of Rye, Harrison, Mamaroneck, New Rochelle, Pelham and East Chester, covering a distance of 13.61 miles. The work of constructing this part of the road was carried on during the years 1847 and 1848. On Christmas day, 1848, a party of gentlemen made an excursion over it from New York to New Haven, returning the next day. The road was opened for business on the following day. The character of the ground of the road in this county is described as "heavy with rough heavy cuttings." It was at first a single track road. The line as surveyed was followed. At Pelhamville the original embankment was as it is now. The numerous curves on the road were caused by the restricted financial condition, making it necessary, as far as possible, to avoid cuttings and embankments. The desire had been to build the road in a substantial and permanent manner, but it was found difficult to complete it in any shape. Mr. Sidney S. Miller, one of the original contractors and most active of the projectors of the road, is still living at Madison, N. J. It is a curious fact that when the trains first commenced to run, the passengers were booked as in the old stage-coach times, their names being duly reported by the conductors to the company. This company was originally "The New York and New Haven," but in 1872 was consolidated with the Hartford and New Haven Company, and the new system took the name by which it is now known. In 1873 the company leased the Harlem River and the Port Chester Railroad, between the Harlem and New Rochelle, and opened it for use. It runs from its depot at the Harlem River through the towns of Morrisania, Westchester, Pelham and New Rochelle, where it joins the New Haven road. It is sometimes denominated, the Harlem River Branch of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, and has opened out one of the most beautiful portions of the county. In the spring of 1872, the work of construction began by filling in the bulkhead at the Harlem River, and a fine dock and slip of land was formed. Blasting had to be done on the Morris estate where rock of a lava-like appearance was found, and seams and colors of the same in fine curves, angles, etc. The pile building came in for a share of careful attention, as after passing Port Morris piles of sixty and eighty feet in length were used, which made a substantial job throughout. The rock cut at Hunt's Point bridge caused a great deal of trouble on account of the wet, spongy nature of the soil,—one would have expected the softest nearest the water. The Bronx River was bridged by a strong Jackknife Draw. Filling for embankment across Pelham Salt Marsh was a tedious job, as firm bottom was hard to find. East Chester Bay reached a fine piece of work was done in building the pile-bridging across it. Too much praise cannot be given to E. W. Reid, General Superintendent of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, for the substantial and workmanlike manner in which as the whole job, so especially the erection of the piers and approaches of the fine pivot drawbridge was conducted. The stone for the masonry, of the very first quality, was furnished by the veteran Mr. Beattie, of Stony Creek, Conn. Borrow pits were necessary on Bartow embankments and at Timpsons. As material for them was lacking on the whole line, ballast, except the broken stone ballast, was brought from as far as New Canaan. The construction of the fresh water swamp trestle ended the work that was of any size or account before reaching the junction with the main line, near New Rochelle village. The contractors were, Sections one and two, Peter Sanford & Co.; sections two, three and four, Dunn & Lowther; sections six and seven, Beattie & Edwards; sections eight, nine and ten, Richard Dooley. Under Mr. Reid's care the whole line has been since improved in every way and ranks first class. The stations along this road are Port Morris, Casanova, Hunt's Point, West Farms, Van Nest, Westchester, Timpsons, Baychester, Bartow, Pelham Manor and New Rochelle Junction. The road is 12.13 miles in length.

NEW YORK CITY AND NORTHERN RAILROAD.—This road has reached its present condition and assumed its present name after having passed through a very varied experience, and been known under several different titles. The persons with whom the idea originated were John Q. Hoyt and Andrew McKinney, who were instrumental in organizing what was known as the New York and Boston Railroad, in 1871. Of this organization John Q. Hoyt was president, and Andrew McKinney, treasurer. The road was to run from New York to Brewsters, in Putnam County, and was there to connect with roads leading to Boston. The larger part of the right of way was purchased, considerable grading done, and a portion of the track was laid, but much of the right of way was obtained under conditions which were never satisfied, and the land reverted to its original owners. In 1871 a combination was formed between this road, the Dutchess and Columbia Railroad and the Harlem Extension, the consolidation being known as the New York, Boston and Montreal Railroad. Under this new organization, of which George H. Brown was president, large loans were negotiated in Europe, the principal creditor being the Franco-Egyptian Bank of Paris, and Bishop Scheim and T. Gold Schulz of London, who advanced several millions of dollars; but the foreclosure of prior mortgages, and the sale of the road rendered these advances a complete loss, and a suit has long been pending in the United States Courts to determine the personal responsibility of the trustees who had the handling of the funds. At the time of the sale under foreclosure, the road was purchased by the former bond-holders, and was reorganized under its present name, in 1878. The first president was A. B. Stout, who shortly after resigned and was succeeded by Robert M. Galloway, who has retained the position till the present time. The first secretary was Calvin Goddard, who still holds the position. When the road was built, its New York terminus was at High Bridge, but an extension, something over a mile in length, connects with the Eighth Avenue Elevated Road. This extension was made under a separate organization known as "the West Side and Yonkers Railroad," and furnishes the most direct road for rapid transit between New York and the interior of Westchester County.

At the time of the organization of the present company, a contract was made with Louis Roberts, to finish the building, and to equip the road. This task was performed by Mr. Roberts in a most active and energetic manner. The right of way was repurchased, the grading finished, and the track laid and the completed road opened for business in the spring of 1881. The length of this road from High Bridge to Brewsters (Putnam County) is fifty-three miles, and the length of the extension from High Bridge to Eighth Avenue is one and one-sixteenth miles. The benefit of this road to the property holders along its entire length can scarcely be overestimated.

The general superintendent and the heart and soul of the enterprise is Mr. Frank S. Gannon, whose whole life has been identified with railroad management. Mr. Gannon was born in Spring Valley, Rockland County, N. Y., but removed to Orange County when a boy. He became connected with the Erie Railroad in 1867, as telegraph operator and agent at various stations. In 1870 he became connected with the Midland Railroad where he remained till 1875, when he went to the Long Island Railroad as telegraphic train dispatcher and master of transportation, and the value of his services were fully recognized by all who had any connection with that road. Mr. Gannon became connected with the Northern Railroad in April, 1881, construction trains being the only ones then running. The bridge over Harlem River was finished May 1, and passenger trains began running to Brewsters on that day, and in the Fall of that year the road was finished and in good condition. The road was laid through a sparsely settled district and during the first year trains were run at a loss, but from that time to the present the business has been constantly increasing and has now reached large proportions. As an illustration, we may mention that in the Summer of 1881, five hundred cans of milk were brought daily to the city, and at the present time the number is one thousand and five hundred. The New York Central & Harlem Railroads did not at first consider the new road as a competitor, but soon had reason to change their views, and after a war of rates they were glad to make arrangements with the new company. The road has a lease of pier 44, New York City, and cars can now be run from this road to all portions of the country without breaking bulk. When they first began transporting cars upon floats, three or four cars a day was considered a good business, while thirty or forty are now carried in the same length of time. As one item we may mention that three hundred tons of ore are daily brought from the Tilly Foster mine and other mines along the road, and coal is brought direct from the mines of Pennsylvania to the central portions of Westchester County without change of cars. Under Mr. Gannon's careful management the direction of trains has been so perfect that no accident from collision has occurred since the road commenced running, while the rapid increase of business both in freight and passenger traffic must continue to increase to an indefinite extent.

The value of these facilities for communication with the city, and of the towns and villages with each other, which these one hundred miles at least of rail coaching in the county affords can scarcely be estimated whether we look to the addition of inhabitants or the increase in the value of real estate. This has indeed been attended by a great reduction in the amount of its agricultural productions. Taking the average of crops of the whole county the yield is found to be about two-fifths less than that of forty years ago—before this immigration. The following table will present to the eye the steady decrease which has taken place in this direction since the opening out of this region as a place of residence for business men:

Wheat	35,267	35,248	24,426	22,698
Rye	99,574	51,404	57,029	55,130
Oats	449,090	204,759	173,894	238,509
Corn	318,028	402,238½	323,076	377,357
Potatoes	620,920	286,249	334,966	326,092
Hay	77,873	90,496⅞	73,113	69,221
Buckwheat	57,226	20,890¾		13,364
Wool	52,085			6,069

From this exhibit of decline we turn to mark the increase in the value of the real and personal estate of the county. In the year 1840 the aggregate value was $10,650.064; in the year 1860, $41,527,907, and in 1884 $73,860,487.

These values, if viewed by their proportions to the entire estate values of the State of New York in the three years named, show how much the County has kept up its relative financial consequence, notwithstanding the immense growths of the great cities and the subtractions from 1874 of the values of the three towns of Kingsbridge, Morrisania and West Farms. The total equalized estate value of the State in 1840 was $639,171,000, in 1860 $1419,-297,520 and in 1884 $3,014,591,372, the proportion being to that of the county in 1840 as 60 to 1, in 1860 as 34 to 1 and in 1884 as 41 to 1. This it is believed could be even more strongly presented. But while thus noticing the great increase in wealth, it is more of a satisfaction to observe the accompanying advantages moral and intellectual. The schools of the county have been brought up to a standard which will compare favorably with the most approved. Institutions of an eleemosynary character have been organized and opportunities for mental culture, additional to those which proximity to the city affords, are devised and well supported. By the increase of churches and of religious ministrations the spiritual necessities of the people are subserved. Reference also should be made to the newspaper of the county, which has had a usefulness which cannot but with injustice be undervalued. It is a pleasure to speak, with the confidence of due consideration, of the skill and ability which has been displayed in its management, to which is added regret that the files of the more than fifty journals published in the county in the last seventy-five years have not been more carefully preserved. Not only, in consequence, have interesting facts been lost, but the subjects from time to time moving the public mind are not so easily recalled or understood. The first known newspapers of this County were started in the same year, 1810,—the Somers Museum, published by Milton F. Cushing, and the Westchester Gazette, by Robert Crombie. It would appear that the Sing Sing Republican is the legitimate successor of this Westchester Gazette. The Eastern State Journal and the Highland Democrat, (formerly Westchester and Putnam Democrat,) both started in 1845, claim rank next for age, succeeded by the two Yonkers papers, the Gazette (at first Herald) of 1852 and the Statesman (formerly Westchester News) of 1853. With reference to these newspapers, as also to the many others, which will be named in the history of the several towns it is but right to declare how well, for purposes of information, intellectual advantage, and amusement, the wants of these localities and of adjoining ones have been met by these benefactors.

Political History.—The period between the declaration of peace and the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789 was marked in Westchester County by little of concerted and united action in reference to the politics of the State or National governments. In 1784 Gen. Pierre Van Cortlandt, of the town of Cortlandt, was Lieutenant-Governor of the State, and Generals Lewis Morris, of Morrisania, and Stephen Ward, of East Chester, were in the State Senate. Gen. Thomas Thomas, of Rye, was in the Lower House, having as his colleagues Philip Pell, Jr., of Pelham, Abijah Gilbert, of Salem, Ebenezer Purdy, of North Salem, Zebediah Mills, and Samuel Haight, sterling men in the trying times just past. The next year's election substituted Ebenezer Burling, of East Chester, and Ebenezer Lockwood, of Poundridge, in place of Messrs. Mills and Haight. In 1786 Jonathan G. Tompkins of Scarsdale, and Samuel Drake were chosen instead of Burling and Purdy, and in 1787 Jonathan Rockwell, Joseph Strang, and Ebenezer Purdy, (who was again returned,) took the seats of Drake, Gilbert and of Pell, (who had become Surrogate.) The Hon. Richard Morris, of Scarsdale, had been Chief Justice of the State since 1779, and John Thomas, of Rye, or Jesse Hunt, of Westchester, sheriffs since 1777. Richard Hatfield, of White Plains, was Surrogate from 1778 till 1787. In the list of supervisors of the county from 1783 to 1789 occur at least half a dozen of the names of the county officials just given, and to these may be added the following conspicuous members of the Board: Benjamin Stevenson, of New Rochelle, also one of the Judges of the County; Gilbert Budd, of Rye; Abel Smith, of North Castle; Hachaliah Browne and Thaddeus Crane, both of Upper Salem; Daniel Horton, of White Plains; James Hunt, of East Chester; William Miller, of Harrison; James Kronkhite, of Ryker's Patent, or Cortlandt; and Philip Pell, of Pelham, who was, in 1787, also sheriff of the county. From these details may be gathered a conception of the leadership in the political affairs of the County during the period immediately succeeding the Revolution.

The first political differences of a serious nature which arose in the State sprang up as the generally realized insufficiency of the government by a Confederacy brought forth various plans for the increase of its powers and efficiency. It was felt that the union of the States was merely in name, when the credit which that union established was at the mercy of the States in their capricious dealings with it.

To the disappointment keenly enough felt by the enthusiastic friends of the Revolution was added a mortifying sense of the apparent fulfillment of the predictions of the enemies of the Republic, that the whole movement would prove a failure, not more from its own folly than from the incompetency of the untaught and inexperienced movers in it. In speaking of John Hancock and Samuel Adams, one of the Loyalist newspapers says: "When the lunacies of the former are separated from the villanies of the latter, the deluge of destruction that is certainly, though slowly, rolling after them will rapidly come on and overwhelm them and their infatuated votaries in prodigious ruin." Here in this County, where the "Westchester County Farmer" had poured forth his entreaties and forebodings in view of the uprising against the British authority, the anxiety for the success of the new government could not but be intensified by these recollections, and by the daily contact with the many who had anticipated disaster. But notwithstanding all this desire to avoid a failure, there was a deep feeling that the safety of the people's rights was and would be much better secured under the more readily invoked protection of the State than under the distant care, with distracting—oftentimes contradicting—interests, of a General Government. The head of the State of New York at this time was George Clinton, its great war Governor, who, by his popularity, as much as by his office, was possessed of great influence with the people. While professing a sincere desire for the continuance of the then Federal compact, and for its usefulness, and that the General Government should inspire respect at home and abroad, Governor Clinton resisted with ardor and firmness the making of any concessions which should weaken the State authority or further abridge its powers. The influence of his position and arguments on the public mind can readily be seen. But still abler and more practiced pens and voices were showing into what a pitiable condition public affairs were running. General Schuyler, Chief Justice Livingston, John Jay and Alexander Hamilton were setting forth and urging the necessity for a change. Another call, more commanding the country over, was heard from Virginia, suggesting that the powers of the central government be increased.

In the convention which met at Philadelphia this county shares indeed with the State at large in the honor of being represented by General Hamilton, but it is a pleasure to remember that in the person of Gouverneur Morris (a distinguished and influential delegate from Pennsylvania), who was born on Westchester soil and who returned again to represent her in the United States Senate, and whose remains are sacredly enshrined in her bosom, she was present to form that wise and beneficent instrument. The Constitution thus offered to the States for adoption met with the fiercest opposition. Not only were its features faulted, but the conduct of the Convention in transcending, as asserted, its powers, was fiercely assailed. "Instead of amending the Constitution," said Mr. Jones, "it had framed one." In Albany the new Constitution was publicly burned. In the choice of delegates to a convention which was now ordered to meet at Poughkeepsie, to pass upon its adoption by the State, the greatest excitement prevailed, and the terms Federalist and Anti-Federalist, as applied to separate parties, began to be used. The result in Westchester County proved that a deep interest was felt in the maintenance of a union between the States. Thaddeus Crane, of North Salem, Richard Hatfield, of White Plains, Philip Livingston and Lewis Morris, of Westchester, Lott W. Sarles, of New Castle, and Philip Van Cortlandt were chosen over their Anti-Federalist opponents by very large majorities. The Convention met, and on the 26th of July, by a vote of thirty to twenty-seven, ratified the proposed Constitution. In the affirmative vote are found the names of all the Westchester delegates. At the election for members of Assembly the strong party feeling is manifested by a complete change in the representation, the following persons, strong Federalists, being returned: Thaddeus Crane, of North Salem; Jonathan Horton and Philip Livingston, of Westchester; Judge Nathan Rockwell, of Lewisboro; Walter Seaman and General Philip Van Cortlandt. At the assembling of the Legislature in December, however, such was the political complexion of the two Houses that the five delegates to represent the State in the Continental Congress were chosen from the Anti-Federal party, one of the five being Philip Pell, of this county. The satisfactory working of the new Constitution, the popularity of Washington's administration and the great advantages which the proximity of the seat of government to this county was offering, were all favorable to the Federal party. Majorities in its favor continued through the succeeding ten years, in which two of the elections held—those of 1792 and 1796—had a direct bearing on national politics. Washington entered without dissent upon a second term of office, General Stephen Ward, of East Chester, being one of the electors of this State and in 1797, John Adams, with the twelve votes of the State of New York, was chosen in opposition to Mr. Jefferson. At the election in 1798 there were plain indications of a falling away of the strength of the administration party throughout the State, which, although not borne out by the result the next year, were more than realized at the Presidential contest of 1800. Among the electors chosen by the Legislature was Colonel Pierre Van Cortlandt, Jr., of this county, who had married a daughter of ex-Governor George Clinton, still the leader of the Republican party in the State. General Thomas, of Rye, an active Republican, who had been out of the Assembly for some years, is again restored to it. The hold thus taken upon the popular vote was retained with much tenacity during the whole period of Mr. Jefferson's administration. The country was on the high road of prosperity. All interests shared in the general thrift. The ruling party must naturally benefit from such favoring circumstances. Its leading men in Westchester County in these days of Jefferson rule, besides Judge Thomas and Colonel Van Cortlandt, were Senator Ebenezer Purdy, of North Salem; Abijah Gilbert, of Salem; and Jonathan Ward, of East Chester. The position of Senator Purdy was also a commanding one in the Republican party at large. In 1802 he was a member of the Council of Appointment, in whose hands was the political patronage of the State. In 1803, as chairman of the caucuses of the Republican members of the State Senate, he exercised a commanding influence in securing the nomination of General Morgan Lewis and preventing that of Aaron Burr as the standard bearer of the Republican party in the State in the election for Governor. There is no doubt that the movement which forced his resignation of his seat in 1806 arose from the knowledge of his devotion to Governor Lewis, whose prestige and strength it was thought desirable to destroy. It would seem that General Thomas, who was transferred from the House to the Senate in 1804, was in perfect accord with Mr. Purdy, and being himself a member of the Council of Appointment in 1806, joined with his associates in removing De Witt Clinton, the pronounced opponent of Governor Lewis, from the mayoralty of the city of New York.

An event of much pride to the county in 1806 was the election of Daniel D. Tompkins to be Governor of the State. Mr. Tompkins, although never representing Westchester County in official position, having in early life made New York City his home, was, nevertheless, a native of it, having been born at Scarsdale, and being a descendant of one of the first settlers of the adjoining town of East Chester. His father, Jonathan G. Tompkins, had represented the county in the legislative body, which adopted the first State Constitution in 1777, and also in the convention which framed the second in 1801. He was a member of the Assembly during the Revolution, and several years after the close of the war. He was also for a long period a Judge of the county, and at the time of his son Daniel's election as Governor he had been for twenty-one years a Regent of the University of the State. The opponent of Daniel D. Tompkins was Governor Lewis, the Federalists in this, as in the previous election, not setting up any candidate from their own ranks. It is a gratification to record the promotion at this same time to the State Senate of Jonathan Ward, of East Chester, a son of General Stephen Ward, of earlier fame and usefulness.

In the year 1807 questions arose which, in their bearings on political parties, involved more than personal considerations. The British government, with its usual total indifference to the rights of other nations when its own interests are involved, adopted an order by which trade between its enemies and neutral powers was forbidden. France, in its turn, issued decrees which had the same result. The United States having expostulated with these governments to no effect, Congress, at the instigation of Mr. Jefferson, passed an Embargo Act upon all vessels within the limits of the United States. No clearances were to be furnished, and vessels sailing from one port of the United States to another therein were required to give bonds that the goods with which they were laden should be landed in some port in the United States. The object of this bill, in the language of Mr. Madison, was to make it "the interest of all nations to change the system which has driven our commerce from the sea." "Great Britain will feel it (this embargo) in her manufactures, in the loss of naval stores, and . . . in the supplies essential to her colonies." "France will feel it in the loss of all which she has hitherto received through our neutral commerce, and her colonies will be cut off from the sale of their productions and the source of their supplies." "They have forced us into the measure by the direct effect on us of measures founded in an alleged regard for their own eventual safety and essential interests." "The ocean presents a field only where no harvest is to be reaped but that of danger, of spoliation, and of disgrace."[1] It will be readily understood that this measure, bearing so hardly upon the interests of all classes of the community must have called forth the most violent objection and put to the severest strain the devotion of the Republican party to their great Head, the President, and to his destined successor, the then Secretary of State. The Representative in Congress from this District, General Philip Van Cortlandt, voted against the Embargo, and was drawn into opposition to Mr. Madison's aspirations. It is certain also that the Vice-President, George Clinton, did not approve of the "Act." But notwithstanding their dissatisfaction, these gentlemen still adhered to their party affinities, and by their course, no doubt, greatly counteracted the tendency of these measures to produce political changes among their followers in New York. So their columns seem not to have seriously wavered in Westchester County at the next Senatorial election, when the Southern District, which lay in New York City, Long Island, Staten Island and Westchester County, elected both the Republican candidates. In the selection of Presidential electors, which soon followed, the fact that the difference on this point in the party was regarded of no moment is apparent in the concession of six votes to George Clinton, one of whom in all likelihood was Mr. White, of Westchester County. The Embargo bill was repealed before the close of Mr. Jefferson's administration, and in place of it was enacted what has been entitled "the Non-intercourse Law," which forbade both importation and exportation. This change, in connection with fresh evidences of English animosity, seems to have had the effect to intensify the national feeling, and the consequence was, in 1810, an overwhelming defeat of the Federalists in all portions of the State. But the divisions in the Republican party that succeeded this victory gave their opponents the opportunity in the Presidential contest two years after to decide to which of the Republican candidates should fall the vote of the State, and the suffrages were given to De Witt Clinton. Mr. Madison was, however, re-elected.

General Van Cortlandt ardently supported Mr. Clinton; but Governor Tompkins, though unwilling to be regarded as inimical to him, yet felt himself bound to support Mr. Madison as the representative not only of the national Democracy, but of the measures which Congress had adopted for the maintenance of the national honor. But Mr. Clinton would allow of no half-way support. The consequence was that the difference soon shaped itself in the State as between these two favorite citizens, and it needed but little time to prove that the largest sympathies were with the farmer's boy, as the Governor was styled. Mr. Tompkins is described as a man of much more than ordinary intellectual strength and culture, but is better remembered for a cordiality and kindliness of manner that gave him great acceptableness and influence in his public and private relations. In the year 1815 Mr. Jonathan Ward, who had represented Westchester County in the State Senate, was sent as member of Congress to Washington, and there is little doubt that this election had much political significance, from Mr. Ward's known opposition to Mr. Clinton. When the Presidential choice was to be made of a successor to Mr. Madison, it was evident that the choice lay between Mr. James Monroe and Governor Tompkins. The preferences of Mr. Madison had much weight with the Republican party, and Mr. Monroe was elected, with Governor Tompkins as Vice-President. With the removal of this gentleman to Washington, the fortunes of De Witt Clinton revived, and the Republicans naming him, he was, almost without opposition, elected Governor of the State. But the truce in party dispute, so welcome, was but the precursor of a contest in the State, and in the County of Westchester, of uncommon bitterness. It might be right here to state that the championship by Mr. Clinton of the measures for the construction of the Erie Canal, the importance of which was the more evident as the work progressed, gave him an increased hold upon the confidence of the people. This however was more immediately felt in the neighborhoods to be benefited than in others, as Westchester County, where the influence could only be indirect.

"It was a deceitful calm," says the historian of "New York Politics," speaking of Mr. Clinton's all but unanimous election. The elevation of one so regardless of party restraints was a bitter realization to the extreme Democracy. The Federalists, in their turn, in expectation of some advantage, were only too glad to revive the old controversies, and Mr. Clinton was inclined, in his party conduct, to draw the line as between his personal friends and opponents. In Westchester County the election for Senators, in the spring of 1819, was carried on with great animation. Mr. John Townsend, of East Chester, who had been, a year or two before, a member of the Lower House, was elected Senator in opposition to Pierre Van Cortlandt, the Clinton candidate. It was at this time that the significant name, "Bucktail," designating the opponents of Mr. Clinton, sprang into use. To the Tammany Society, a secret political organization of New York City, this gentleman was particularly odious, and, as one of the insignia of this "order" was the tail of the deer worn in their hats, the other party soon applied the term to all who sympathized with them in their feelings and action. The bucktail, an emblem of success in the chase, was gladly appropriated by the Anti-Clintonians and became the favorite decoration in each political campaign. It must have been somewhere about this time that the following incidents, related in a Journal of a trip to visit Chief Justice Jay and General Philip Van Cortlandt, occurred: "We now found ourselves in the town of North Castle, the inhabitants of which were assembled at this time to choose their officers. We discovered that they were all Bucktails. My friend, whose enthusiasm counterbalances his prudence, ventured on the hopeless task of converting them to Clintonism. Accordingly, having singled out one who appeared to be the decentest man among them, he led him into a long argument, by which to convince him that Tompkins was a defaulter, and consequently unfit to be entrusted with the highly responsible office of chief magistrate of this great State. That the Bucktail, in his attempt to prove the immaculate purity of the man of his party, was foiled by the superior address and ingenuity of his antagonist, is not saying that he was convinced." We give this other extract from the journal—"'Who is this?' whispered I. 'Dr. C——k, the sheriff of the county,' replied my companion, 'and a warm Clintonian.' 'And you, doctor, I am glad to see you, too; how goes the election?' Here a dialogue commenced on the topic next to the heart of these two men, who, alike forgetful of the rain, which now began to fall, . . . these two mad politicians kept up their jabber a full half-hour, cold, wind and rain notwithstanding." Another extract—"A few minutes sufficed to bring us to the ancient seat of the Van Cortlandts. . . . I had not another opportunity of drawing Hannibal into the recital of his campaigns till the hour of retiring; his attention was wholly occupied by Cooper and his plans for bringing in De Witt Clinton."

Notwithstanding the fact that Governor Clinton was re-elected in 1820, a deadly blow was the actual result, for both to the Senate and Assembly pronounced majorities against him were returned.

Mr. Tompkins, who had been brought out to oppose Mr. Clinton, had a majority of three thousand two hundred and thirty-one in the Southern Senatorial District, which included Westchester County. The address at this election of a body of Federalists, which, it is asserted, had very little influence with the main force, is here recalled, because on the list of signatures to it the first is that of a greatly respected citizen of Mamaroneck, Peter Jay Munro, a lawyer of much eminence in this county, and because the list includes also that of James A. Hamilton, son of General Hamilton, long a resident of Tarrytown, on the Hudson.

The significance of this paper was not only its open assault on the friends of Governor Clinton for their devotion to him, but in this galvanic display of the death scene of the distinguished party to which they had belonged, the signers sought their own future political advancement.

It is proper here to say that for two successive terms the Third Congressional District of the State, which consisted of Rockland and Westchester, was ably and faithfully represented by Mr. Caleb Tompkins, of White Plains, and that for three years, from 1820 to 1823, the position of County Judge was held by William Jay, son of the Chief Justice.

The great political event which now falls under notice is the assembling of the convention ordered for the revision of the State Constitution, and the presence in it of three distinguished citizens of the county, all members of its bar—Peter A. Jay, Peter J. Munro and Jonathan Ward. It would seem that whatever the motive elsewhere, the political did not enter in the selections thus made in Westchester County.

Governor Tompkins was called to preside over the convention, and in the appointment of committees it is a matter of no little honor to Westchester that Mr. Monroe was made chairman of the committee on the judiciary department and Mr. Ward a member of that on the council of revision. One of the marked periods in the debates of this body was that in which the right of the colored population to vote at elections was discussed. The question was handled very dispassionately, but Mr. Jay's speech appears to have been one of the very ablest on the subject. By far the severest work of the convention was the consideration of the report of the Judiciary committee, when strong political feeling was aroused. The question really was the deposition of the old Judges. Mr. Munro, although assisted by Mr. Van Buren, struggled unsuccessfully to prevent the sweeping change.

At the session of the Legislature following the convention, Senator John Townsend, of East Chester, was made a member of the Council of Appointment, the sessions of which were the last held in the State, its powers passing by the new Constitution to the Governor and the Senate. Mr. Townsend, at the next election in the county, was made its Sheriff and Mr. John Hunter, of Pelham, was returned under the new apportionment one of the four Senators of the Second Senatorial District. In 1824, in the list of Presidential electors, the last selected by the Legislature, are the names of the two brothers John and James Drake, both natives of Westchester County, the first residing in New York, but the latter on his estate at East Chester.

As well-known, the election for President was thrown into the House of Representatives, where Mr. John Quincy Adams, after several ballotings, was elected, Mr. Joel Frost, of Putnam County, the member from the Fourth Congressional District, giving his vote to William H. Crawford, of Georgia, then Secretary of the Treasury.

The following detailed statement of the Electoral vote of Westchester County, beginning with the year 1828, will give a fair idea of the political opinions of the citizens of Westchester County from that date to the present time:

In referring to the thirty years before Mr. Lincoln's election, some of the facts and events are important and interesting enough for record and consideration. General Aaron Ward of Sing Sing was, six times elected a member of Congress fulfilling his duties to the eminent satisfaction of his constituents and the pride of his neighbors. General Ward was an officer of the War of 1812, and for some years Brigadier General of the Fifteenth Brigade and Fourth Division of the Militia of the State. In the convention in 1846, for amending the constitution, General Ward represented the county and was made chairman of the committee on the militia and military officers. Mr. John Hunter of Hunter's Island, Pelham, in 1823, for one year, and from 1836, for eight years Senator from Westchester, was a man of large wealth and high social position and an affable and a considerate gentleman. He was a very strong supporter of Mr. Van Buren, during whose administration Mr. Philip Schuyler, a brother-in-law of Mr. Hunter and a resident of this county for many years held the consulship at London. Mr. Hunter was also a member of the constitutional convention of 1846.

Mr. Allen McDonald of White Plains held a seat in the Senate for two terms and is said to have been exceedingly popular. In 1836, he was appointed Adjutant General of the State. Mr. William Nelson, of Peekskill, who commenced his political career by two terms in the Assembly, in 1819 and 1820, had already in 1815 been district attorney of the Eleventh District and was again in 1822 of the county. From 1824 to 1828, Mr. Nelson was State Senator and from 1847 to 1851 the member of Congress from this District. In all these positions Mr. Nelson merits the approbation due for faithful service. He died in 1866 or 1867.

The Anti-Masonic excitements at such a high pitch in the western part of the State much less either politically or socially affected this county The brethren of the order quietly abandoned their local organization and bided the passing away of the storm. The effect, however, of this ephemeral political movement was to make the Democratic party as a party more compact and consequently stronger and better prepared for its mission. This was illustrated no where more thoroughly than among the "once set not easily moved" farmers of Westchester County.

But the business disasters of 1837 made much more of an impression upon them. The impulsive trifling of President Jackson with the finances of the country, which at that time was supposed to throw a halo around his inflexible will and courage, brought upon his successor, through the troubles which in his administration the people were made to suffer, an obloquy and blame which Mr. Van Buren did not individually deserve.

The fact that the Democratic majority in the county was reduced from over one thousand two hundred in 1836 to two hundred and seventy in 1840 shows, making all allowances for the humors of the "log-cabin and hard cider" campaign, that a deliberate, sober, first and second thought of the people was making Mr. Van Buren and his great party eat the bread of affliction. From this time for some years the two parties were more closely matched. In fact the lines of both were much disturbed. The questions of the Tariff and Internal improvement were those which divided the professed politicians, but personal preferences and antipathies in certain divisions and localities were confounding plans and calculations. The advent, too, of a secret political organization, styled Native American, which had in the several towns a large following, was very unsettling as to the county and town nominations and elections. To be added to all this was the dissensions which sprang up as the question of the extension of slavery was discussed. As a consequence, the majority of Mr. Polk in the county over Mr. Clay was still less than that of his party four years before.

The admission of Texas into the Union, which increased the Southern strength and the war with Mexico, which necessarily followed it, added new subjects for difference of opinion and debate. At the Gubernatorial election, in 1846, the defection in the Democratic party, which ensured the defeat of Silas Wright, brought on confusion and revolt. The feeling was intensified when the death of Mr. Wright in the succeeding August was announced. During that summer, at the primary meetings and conventions of the Democracy, bitter struggles were taking place. In September the State convention met at Syracuse, and the Radicals, being deprived, as they alleged, of their proper representation assembled in October, at Herkimer. Mr. Hunter's name appears in the call. In this internal dissension the question involved was the extension of slavery into the territories. The Herkimer convention demanded that the principle of non-extension, called also the Wilmot Proviso, be introduced into the party platform. The Whigs in the canvass of 1847 were signally victorious, but the seat of Mr. James E. Beers in the Assembly was contested by Colonel J. R. Hayward, who had held it the previous year. Mr Hayward was unsuccessful. In 1848 the breach between the two factions was made still wider at the meeting of the two conventions styled the "Old Hunker" and the "Barnburner," in both of which Westchester Democrats were represented. Among the names best remembered in the ranks of these two divisions are in the first, Dr. Benjamin Brandreth, Jesse Lyon, Andrew Findlay, Warren Tompkins, Abraham Strong, and in the second Joseph H. Anderson, Colonel Hayward, Judge Schrugam, Honeywell Watson, Robt. H. Coles, William Fisher, Dr. Finch, and Samuel Ferris.

Upon the nomination of General Lewis Cass for the Presidency a complete division took place, and separate National and State tickets were selected. Mr. VanBuren was named as the Free Soil candidate for the high position which he formerly held. In the election which followed the Whig candidate General Zachary Taylor, who was elected, received in this county a majority over the entire opposing vote. General Cass fell behind Mr. Van Buren six thousand votes in the State but largely exceeded him in Westchester County. Some of the most ardent leaders of the Democracy of earlier days had by this time become the stanchest friends of the policies advocated by the Whigs. The old Senator and Sheriff, John Townsend, is mentioned in this connection.

The history of the next four years is of the weakening of the hold thus obtained by the Whigs. The death of General Taylor, the accession of Mr. Fillmore, whose views were materially different from Gen. Taylor's, and the exactions of the "Southern Oligarchy," as Mr. Sumner used to style the Southern leaders of both sides, brought in serious dissensions among the friends of the party in power. The Compromise measures of Mr. Clay, however, served both the great parties as a cement for the divisions in their ranks and within the old lines was carried on the Presidential contest of 1852. The county of Westchester gave Franklin Pierce, who was elected, twelve hundred clear majority. The number of votes cast had increased, it would seem, over sixteen hundred. Little is remembered of an exciting or important nature during this national administration, so far as this neighborhood is concerned, save the hardly-suppressed indignation (first) at the quite unnecessary strain which the abettors of the Fugitive Slave Law were putting upon the feeling of loyalty and obedience among the people and (second) at the intervention for conscience or for effect, of the small body of Abolitionists, who really had no following in this county.

But the Presidential election of 1856 developed the fact of great impatience, and of great unwillingness to be made uncomfortable, by extremists. Although the free soil vote, less than one-fourth in 1848, was, in 1856, more than one-third, it meant not for a moment interference with slavery in the Southern States. The sentiment of abhorrence for the institution never took form beyond its non-extension, and the rights of the States were as fully cherished, as devotion to the Union was afterward the absorbing principle. State sovereignty had free and open statement, and the charge of intermeddling, whenever alleged, was laughed down as an absurd insinuation.

The course of Mr. Buchanan in his Lecompton policy, which was believed to be in direct contradiction to the principle of popular sovereignty, upon which he was elected, brought out the indignant opposition of a portion of his northern and western supporters, and their representatives in Congress, prominent among whom was Mr. John B. Haskin, the member from the Ninth District of New York, in which was Westchester County. In the Congressional election of 1858, in this District, the course of the administration was made the issue, and Mr. Gouverneur Kemble, having been nominated by the Democratic party, Mr. Haskin was placed by his friends in the political field. He was supported by the Republicans, and elected, by a small majority, over his opponent. To this election, and that in the sixth district of Pennsylvania, where Mr. Hickman, an associate of Mr. Haskin, was in like manner opposed by the whole strength of the administration, the eyes of the whole country were turned. Said a gentleman from Morrisania, "Should Mr. Haskin be defeated, and an administration candidate be elected, every post-office and every office of the Government would be illuminated." An incident in Congress, of a startling nature, in the early part of 1860, brings to notice the continued, determined and ardent part taken, after his re-election, by the representative of Westchester County in the fulfilment of his duties. While addressing the House Mr. Haskin accidentally let fall from the breast pocket of his coat a loaded revolver. On the question of the propriety of carrying this weapon into the House, not only in Congress, but among his constituents and throughout the country, warmest discussions followed. The explanation given was preparation for self-defense in the unprotected neighborhood in Washington, in which Mr. Haskin resided, in which much lawlessness prevailed.

Many years have passed since this incident, but, taken in connection with the Rebellion which soon followed and the tragic and dastardly scenes in it, it illustrates the dangers in public life at the time and the unflinching determination of those called to mingle in the discussions introductory to the strife.

We come now to the stirring canvass and election in which Mr. Lincoln was carried into the Presidential chair, and when the party which had so long, almost continuously, conducted the government, passed into that long exile which has just been terminated. At the State Convention of the Democratic party, in which Thomas Smith, Gilbert S. Lyon and Abraham Hyatt represented this county, the Hon. Edwin Crosswell, of Greenburgh, was named as one of the two delegates from the Ninth District to the National Convention of the Democratic party, to be held at Charleston in the next April, to nominate its candidate for President. At a convention of Democrats of the Ninth District, dissatisfied with the action of the State Convention, William Radford, of Yonkers, afterward member of Congress, was chosen delegate to Charleston.

The State Convention of the Republicans was held in April, 1860, at Syracuse, and E. F. Shonnard, of Yonkers, and Harvey Kidd, of Westchester, from the First Assembly District, Edmund J. Porter, of New Rochelle, and John J. Clapp, from the Second Assembly District, Odle Close, of North Salem, and J. H. Platt, of Ossining, from the Third Assembly District, represented this county. The Hon. Edmund J. Porter, formerly Corporation Counsel of the City of New York, was chosen as the delegate to the National Republican Convention at Chicago, at which Abraham Lincoln was nominated.

On the ticket voted for Presidential Electors, on the Republican side, the Ninth Congressional District candidate was the Hon. William H. Robertson, then County Judge; and on the other ticket, whose motto was said to be "Union for the sake of the Union," was placed the name of the Hon. Abraham B. Conger, of Rockland, formerly State Senator. Amid the heated discussions in the county, at the public gatherings preparatory to the election, peace and order were everywhere preserved; and when the result was reached, although the majority in Westchester County was decidedly against Mr. Lincoln, the verdict was, as readily as after any previous contest, accepted and sustained.

Among those chosen for office at this time was Edward Haight, who, although in the opposition, proved to be a valuable and useful member in the Lower House at Washington, during the first two years of Mr. Lincoln's administration.

With a statement of the patriotic movement, before the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln, to save the Union, in which this county participated, we complete this bird's eye view of its political history. To the convention to be assembled at Albany, delegates from the three Assembly Districts were chosen, and the following well-known citizens attended its sessions: W. W. Woodworth and Thomas Smith, of Yonkers, Darius Lyon, of East Chester, Dr. W. J. McDermott, of Westchester, from the First District; Alexander M. Bruen, the Hon. James E. Beers, of Port Chester, the Hon. John W. Mills and the Hon. E. G. Sutherland, both of White Plains, from the Second District; Judge Robert S. Hart, Uriah Hill, William S. Tompkins and James M. Baird (afterward Register of the county), from the Third District.

The following gentlemen had been selected as alternates: William Radford, James Parker, P. L. McClellan, Abraham Hatfield, William L. Bard, Henry E. Bird, Frost Horton, Columbus W. Seeley, Drs. Benjamin Brandreth and William P. Woodcock, and the Hon. Jacob Odell. The assemblage proved to be one of the most august in the history of the State. The call and the resolutions passed had in view the urging upon the government of a conciliatory course, the non-enforcement of its authority unless attacked, and the adoption of measures of compromise.

Perhaps the effect of this action in New York and of others at the time, was the longer restraining the arm of the government until some overt act against its constituted authority should be committed which would unite the whole people in rebuking secession and disunion. A resolution offered by Judge Hart, of this county, and passed by this convention, looking to the possible necessity for further deliberation and action by this body, makes the more clear how, by the precipitancy of the South, these well-meaning and persistent efforts for conciliation were rendered ineffectual.

We present now, from the several censuses of the State and General Government, a view of the growth of the County in the number of its inhabitants from the beginning of the Colonial period to the year 1880.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CIVIL WAR, 1860–65.[2]

BY FREDERICK WHITTAKER.

Late second lieutenant and brevet captain Sixth New York Veteran Volunteer Cavalry.

From Lincoln's Election to the Taking of Sumter—The Two Years' Volunteers—The Three Years' Volunteers—Home Affairs to the Election of Governor Seymour—The Draft Riots—From the Riots to the Close of the War—The Aid Societies—The Bounty Bonds—The Return of the Volunteers—The Roll of the Dead—The Drafted Men—The Grand Army Posts.

FROM LINCOLN'S ELECTION TO THE TAKING OF SUMTER.—From the day when the votes were counted, after the famous election of 1860, the question of Civil War was reduced to one of time. The party that then came into power affected to believe that it would not come; but its adversaries steadily predicted its occurrence, or confined themselves to the expression of a hope, against probability, that "the evil might be spared the nation." Westchester County, from its position, close to the metropolis of American commerce, might be expected to take a commercial view of the question, and did so. The distribution of parties within its limits was similar to that in the city of New York, and the issue between the supporters of opposite views of the government was strongly marked.

As in New York, the three factions into which the one party was divided, sunk their issue in a common electoral ticket, whose expressed bond of union was hatred to the "Black Republicans" and "Abolitionists" as a class. The leading papers of the county were the Eastern State Journal of White Plains, the Highland Democrat of Peekskill, and the Yonkers Herald. All three were well established, marked by vigorous writing, well able to support their editors, and all exist to-day, under the same names, except the Herald, which was changed to the Gazette in May, 1864.

The attitude of parties in the county is best exhibited by the way in which these papers treated the question on the eve of election and immediately thereafter. The headlines of the Eastern State Journal, which we have taken as a fair specimen of the whole, and wherein the tickets were printed on the 2d of November—the Friday before election-day—read thus:

"Union Electoral Ticket, Anti-Lincoln, Anti-Black Republican."

No President is named. There are thirty-three electors, and W. Kelly is named for Governor. The editorial on the subject says,—

"This is the day on which the fate of battle is suspended. Let every true man do his duty. . . . Be at the polls early. . . . Vote before breakfast if possible. Permit no Black Republican enemy of his country to deprive you of a sacred right, or swerve you from your purpose. Challenge every illegal vote. Permit no insolent, paid and drilled Wide Awakes to dictate the law or your duty. . . . Stand firm and defiant—and get in every vote possible for the Union Ticket.

Further on, and scattered through the paper, are statements that the 'Black Republicans are panic-struck;' adjurations to 'bring every man to the polls;' 'to vote against the Negro and Black Republican ticket, next Tuesday.' 'Cast your vote against Negro Suffrage. Be true,' etc.

The result of these appeals comes out, two weeks after, in the official canvass of the vote: "Union Electoral" ticket, eight thousand one hundred and twenty-six; "Republican" ticket, six thousand six hundred and seventy-one. The majority of one thousand four hundred and fifty-five cast against the latter ticket is not sustained in other cases, the majority for Kelly for Governor being about a thousand, while that for the Congressman is only six hundred and fifty. The neighboring counties of Putnam and Rockland show about the same state of parties.

The editorial comment on the result of the election,

[1] If to these last two enumerations be added the population of West Farms, King's Bridge and Morrisania, which, in 1874, were annexed to the city of New York, the number of the inhabitants within the bounds of the old Westchester County was, in 1875, 139,758, and, in 1860, 150,614.

[2] The information contained in this chapter, as to the towns of Cortlandt and Yorktown, is from material gathered by the editor-in-chief. The records of Cortlandt were carefully kept by Mr. Coffin S. Brown, who was supervisor at the time of the war, and took a pride in the matter. The items concerning the men enlisted come from the reports of the State Adjutant-General, in the form of the original muster-rolls of all the regiments that left the State. Of recruits that joined, after first muster, it was impossible to obtain a full and authentic list; therefore I have not attempted a partial one. The information as to bounty bonds is obtained from the records. The particulars as to relief societies are credited as follows: Port Chester, Mr. John E. Marshall, treasurer, who kindly loaned me his book of accounts; Ossining, Mrs. Catharine E. Van Cortlandt, secretary and treasurer of the society, who sent me the final report of its work, having hunted up the same with much trouble; Cortlandt, Mr. Andrew R. Martin, from Mr. Coffin S. Brown. I have further to acknowledge use of the files of the Eastern State Journal, from Mr. Hendrickson, the present proprietor; of the Yonkers Gazette, in the year 1864, from the gentlemen in charge of the office. The sources of other information are mentioned in the body of the chapter. A history of the county during the war might easily be expanded into a volume of a hundred pages or more.—F. WHITTAKER.

[Much valuable and interesting matter relating to the late Civil War can be found also in the respective town histories published elsewhere in this work.—EDITOR.]

after an admission that the country districts had carried the State for the Republicans by "about sixty thousand majority," is as follows:

"The result is deeply to be regretted, not so much on party grounds, as for the continued peace and prosperity of the country. . . . The election of a sectional President—against which WASHINGTON warned his countrymen in his farewell address—has now been tried, and we are to witness the result. We hope for the best, yet we are not without serious apprehensions. . . . The Union Electoral ticket gets about thirteen hundred majority, but the State is black enough. New York City gives the Union Electoral Ticket 28,000 majority."

From this time forth the tone of the paper is morbidly mournful; but few comments are made till the assembling of Congress, when President Buchanan's message is praised as being "an able, statesmanlike and patriotic production," and the rest of the paper, up to the 4th of March, 1861, is occupied with copies of letters from prominent Southerners, in advocacy of secession, including the "farewell" of Howell Cobb, in which he alludes to Mr. Buchanan as the "last President of the United States." The points of Mr. Buchanan's message, briefly stated, were,—that the Union was in peril; that there was no similarity between the attitude of South Carolina in the nullification of 1832 and her secession of December 20, 1860; because, in 1832 the sympathy of other States was against her; while, in 1860, that of the Gulf States was with her. That the trouble had arisen in consequence of the Northern States interfering with slavery—a thing they had "no more right to meddle with, in other States, than in Russia." That the question had arisen, what was to be done? That he was of opinion that secession was "unconstitutional," but also of opinion, "after much serious reflection" that the United States "had no power to coerce a seceding State," closing this part of the argument with the remark: "The fact is, the Union rests on public opinion, and can never be cemented by the blood of its citizens shed in civil war." A week after the secession of South Carolina the Eastern State Journal published a sermon, by Rev. H. S. Van Dyke, in Brooklyn, on "Abolitionism," in which the Bible defense of slavery was promulgated, and Abolitionists were denounced as "infidels." This sermon occupied ten columns of the paper, in small type, and the editor drew attention to the leading point—the "identity of Abolitionism and infidelity." Extracts from Southern papers form the staple of news for the next few weeks, and on January 11th the editor announced, "The mission of Black Republicanism is the destruction of the Union. The mission is rapidly being accomplished. South Carolina leads off in seceding. . . . Those who organized the Republican party are responsible for the present condition of affairs." January 18th, the statement was made that "Yancey, Toombs and Rhett are no more disunionists than Horace Greeley." In this morbid strain the opinion of the majority of the county appears to have run till February 1st, when a "State Convention of Democrats" was announced, to "insist" that there should be "no coercion, no civil war," with the assertion: "The border States will not permit Lincoln to coerce the Gulf States." [The italics are copied.]

I regret extremely that, from this period to the 10th of May, there is a gap in the files of this paper; so that it is not possible to say how the Westchester County Democrats officially took the news of the firing on Fort Sumter. It can only be judged from the coincidence of the tone of this and the other papers of the county with that of the New York papers of the same opinion. That it could not have changed materially is plain from the first heading that strikes the eye on May 10th, which is "Peace! Peace! Down with the Black Republicans," though, among the news items, appears the drilling of a company in White Plains, raised by Captain (afterwards Colonel) James J. Chambers, in which complimentary notice is given the men.

The news of the attack on Fort Sumter, and especially that of its surrender, as is well known, produced a great change of public opinion in the city of New York, in favor of the administration of Mr. Lincoln, and of an effort to put down the Rebellion.

The bombardment of the fort began on Friday, April 12, 1861; the place was surrendered by Major Anderson on Saturday, 13th, after an attack in which one man was wounded—none killed—on the side of the United States forces. The news was published in the papers of Sunday, the 14th, with the head-line, in the New York Herald, "Dissolution of the Union," and the people had all Sunday to think over the news, and the comments made thereon by the opponents of the administration. The exasperation of feeling produced by the news itself was intensified by the way in which these comments were made, and especially by the call made for a "peace meeting" in New York City. The Herald, in the same issue in which the surrender of the fort and the "dissolution of the Union" was announced, stated that a "preliminary meeting" had been held on Saturday evening, at which steps were taken to call a great mass-meeting, to "force" the administration to surrender, and desist from Mr. Lincoln's expressed intention to "coerce the seceding States." Westchester County was represented at this preliminary meeting by some prominent officials, who held to the extreme Democratic doctrine of "States rights."

On Monday morning, April 15th, appeared Mr. Lincoln's proclamation. It called for seventy-five thousand militia, for three months, to suppress the Rebellion. That proclamation had the effect of a spark to a train of gunpowder in the city of New York, and the effect was felt in the county of Westchester in a proportionate degree. Men who had been waiting, sick at heart, in view of the quiet way in which the government was apparently submitting to destruction, realized that the end of submission had come at last, and that public opinion might be invoked to repel the suicide of a nation. Then came the sudden outburst, in the city, of a popular anger, which filled the streets, in five minutes from the first rush into the open air, with a dense crowd of excited men, whose only purpose seemed to be to make every Democratic newspaper in New York "hang out the flag." They were roused at last.

THE TWO YEARS' VOLUNTEERS.—When such a state of feeling showed itself in a city which had cast a heavy majority against Mr. Lincoln, it may well be supposed that in Albany, where his friends and partisans were in the ascendant in the Legislature, it would rise still higher.

Such was the case; and the singular anomaly was presented, in the history of that stirring time, that the President's demand found itself far behind the popular judgment of the needs of the case. The call was for seventy-five thousand militia for three months' service. It arrived on the 15th of April. On the very next day the New York Legislature passed, with an unexampled celerity, and the Governor signed, a law providing—in addition to the quota assigned to New York State under the call (thirteen thousand two hundred and eighty men)—for thirty thousand volunteers, to serve for two years. The law authorized the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, comptroller, attorney-general, State engineer and surveyor, and State treasurer, or a majority of them," to "accept the services, and to cause to be mustered into the service of the State," the volunteers named, "in addition to the present military organization of the State, and as a part of the militia thereof." It further provided for pay and allowances, the same as then prevailed in the United States service, to the force to be raised, and that the men should be "liable at all times to be turned over to the service of the United States, on the order of the Governor, as a part of the militia of the State, upon the requisition of the President of the United States."

The first formal identification of Westchester County with the two years' volunteers, and the only one in the county in the shape of a body of men accredited thereto, came from the village of Port Chester, in the shape of Company B, Seventeenth Infantry, known as the "Westchester Chasseurs."

The interest that attaches to this company, as being the first to volunteer, in a body, for the credit of the town, makes its personalty worthy of special notice. The following is a copy of the muster-roll, with remarks on the military history of the company and its officers:

Captain, Nelson B. Bartram; First Lieutenant, John Vickers; Second Lieutenant, Charles Hilbert; First Sergeant, James Fox; Sergeants, Thomas Beal, Louis Neething and August Dittman; Corporals, William Crothers, John Beal, Joseph Beal and Robert Magee; Drummers, Stephen Floots and William Fairbanks; Privates, Aug. Adams, Charles H. Burns, John Burns, William Baker, Ardemus Barnes, Edward Bowen, George Buckley, Edward Bradley, Darius Butterfield, Frederick Cross, Amasa Conover, James Cunningham, Richard Conkling, John P. Dempsey, Thomas Donohue, Silas Downes, James Dooley, John G. Dewire, Thomas C. Ely, Edgar Ferris, William Farrington, Charles Frear, John Fay, John Ferguson, John Gibson, Benjamin Glauson, Conrad Graff, George Gurtsey, W. S. Gregory, Charles Gedney, John Hart, Barney Hammil, Joseph Hibbert, William Hennessey, S. J. King, Daniel Keyser, W. H. Lee, T. H. Lockwood, Seaman Morrell, Alexander McCloud, Theodore Miller, Christopher Menken, George and Henry Marshall, John Murphy, John Murty, C. McGrath, T. McKay, William McKeel, John Martin, T. McQuade, W. O'Reilly, Jared Palmer, Henry Siltz, Robert Sergeant, T. Topping, Morris Thomas, James H. Taylor, James Worden, Anthony Warner, W. Whelpley, W. Woods, Max Weber and Louis Zulnaga.

Remarks.—Captain Bartram was promoted to major November 2, 1861, and to lieutenant-colonel June 20, 1862, being mustered out with the regiment June 2, 1863, from the expiration of the term of service, which was two years. Lieutenants Vickers and Hilbert were both promoted to be captains, and mustered out at the expiration of term.

Sergeant James Fox was promoted to second lieutenant, but resigned in a few months; Thomas Beal was promoted to a commission August 3, 1862, and mustered out with the regiment as second lieutenant in the following year.

Captain Bartram, at the time of his enlistment, was vice-principal of one of the New York public schools, earning a good salary; and many people thought him one of the most foolish of men, to throw up a good place, merely for the purpose of "serving his country," so low had then become the popular estimate of the value of patriotism. The effect of such publications as we have briefly noticed in the case of the White Plains paper, echoed, in terms of the same or greater strength, by other papers of the county, had certainly not tended to encourage good feeling; and it reflects on Bartram and the town of Port Chester a credit that no other town in the county can share, that he managed to get his company mustered into the service, in its entirety, as he did. He appears to have begun his work, almost the day the law was promulgated—April 18th—in the form of a general order from the adjutant-general of the State,—and had his men ready to leave Port Chester before the end of the month. Even then, however, they might never have been mustered in as a company, had it not been for the energy and patriotism of a few men in Port Chester, who took hold of the matter and held up his hands. This matter brings us to the history of a movement started at the same time, in which, also, the town of Port Chester set the rest of the county a good example.

Before the Bartram company was fairly organized, it became plain that something was necessary to supply the families of the volunteers of the town, who were, in many instances, married men with children. Therefore, on the 30th of April, Mr. James H. Titus, a well-known citizen of the place, set the ball rolling by subscribing a hundred dollars towards a fund for this purpose, with twenty-nine dollars additional, to pay the fares of the men to the camp of the Seventeenth Regiment in New York. He was closely followed, May 3d, by Mr. W. P. Abendroth, with a hundred dollars, and, by the 9th of May, the subscriptions amounted to four hundred and forty-four dollars. All this money, and much more afterwards, was raised by a "Union Defense Committee," of which Mr. Titus, an ardent Republican, was chairman, and Mr. John E. Marshall, an equally uncompromising Democrat, of the war stamp, was treasurer. This union of both parties, in the same cause, did much to soften the acerbities of political strife in Port Chester all through the war, and makes the personality of this Defense Committee—the first in the county—as interesting as that of the banner company of the county, for whose assistance it was originally organized. The names are as follows:

Chairman, James H. Titus; Secretary, George P. Titus; Treasurer, John E. Marshall.

Military Committee: Messrs. S. K. Satterlee, August Wiggen, August Van Ammeringe, William L. Bush, George P. Titus and Augustus M. Halsted. Relief Committee: Messrs. William P. Abendroth, Noah Tompkins, John W. Lounsberry, George L. Cornell, James H. Titus and E. Sones. Finance Committee: Messrs. E. S. Swords, William B. Halsted and John E. Marshall.

In all the money raised by this committee during the war, to which reference will afterwards be made, the only item which is not that of relief, in weekly payments, to the wives and parents of actual soldiers, is found in the sums first subscribed by Mr. Titus, and applied to the purposes of the company itself. The hundred dollars served to keep the men together, by enabling their board to be paid in the city till accepted; while their fare was provided for to the camp. It is probable that, if this sum had not been raised, the company would have disbanded, and been lost sight of, as were others. The town of Cortlandt, almost at the same time, sent out sixty men, raised by Mr. Benjamin R. Simpkins. For the want of the money that kept the Port Chester company together, this fine body of young men became lost in the great city of New York, and drifted into different regiments, so that not a man of the sixty was ever credited to the county, and not a few of them returned home. Another party of sixteen went off to White Plains, under the command of Mr. William M. Bleakley, of Verplanck's Point. On the roll of Company A, Twenty-seventh Regiment, they appear as credited to Elmira, of all places in the world. Mr. Bleakley afterwards became Captain Bleakley in the Twenty-seventh, and was discharged in February, 1862. The company of Mr. Joseph J. Chambers is another instance of the same state of affairs; for, though the men undoubtedly hailed from White Plains, they are likewise credited to Elmira, their captain being made lieutenant-colonel on the 21st of May.

Yorktown also lost a great number of men in the same way, no mention of them being found in the official records of the two years' volunteers; and of other towns there is still less trace, in any documents by which official proof can be furnished of the facts. The whole history of the two years' volunteers, in Westchester County, is one of men pressing their services on the government, which seemed not to want them; and it cost more trouble in the months of April and May, 1861, to get into the army at all, than it afterwards did to get out of the draft. Captain Bartram, being a man of sense and experience, with a pride in his place of residence, managed to identify Port Chester, officially, with the movement, but no other town in the county could boast an equal record, either in volunteering or in patriotic efforts to help soldiers by private means. But the two years' volunteers were not long in being filled up; and the serious nature of the war, with the equally serious way in which it was regarded by the Legislature of the State, appeared, almost before the last man was mustered into the United States service. The first order of the adjutant-general, April 18th, called for "seventeen regiments of infantry or rifles." A second order appeared, on the 25th of the same month, calling for twenty-one regiments more; so that the complete quota of two years' volunteers, in the State of New York, included all regiments, up to the Thirty-eighth. Within a week from the time the Port Chester company was finally mustered into the United States service—May 22d—the Thirty-ninth Regiment was mustered in as an additional force, and the term of service of the men enlisted was three, instead of two years. From henceforth the history of the county, during the war, was to become one of quotas to be filled and calls to be met, while the ideas with which the two years' men had gone away, that the struggle would soon be over, had settled down into the sober conviction that the three years' term would be the earliest within which the battle would be terminated.

THE THREE YEARS' VOLUNTEERS.—The first regiment taken into the United States service from the State of New York for the term of three years was mustered in on the 28th of May, 1861. The first identification of Westchester County with the three years' volunteers comes on the rolls of the Fourth New York Cavalry, which was mustered by companies, beginning August 10 and ending November 15, 1861. The muster-rolls of the regiment disclose the following names:

The non-commissioned staff has (from Yonkers): Sergeant-Major, Reinhard Kuehl; Hospital Stewards, Max Lechler and Charles Reiss; Color Sergeant, T. R. Dodge; Veterinary Surgeons, F. H. Walter and Rudolph Rodenhausen; Quartermaster-Sergeant, John R. Suiter; Commissary-Sergeant, Charles E. Cormoer.

[N. B.—The muster-roll of the above men in the State adjutant-general's office does not show the certificate of the United States mustering officer, nor is it dated; but the men served, as far as can be ascertained].

The company rolls are more regular in form, and the following is their report as affecting Westchester County:

Company B (from Yonkers).—Captain, Wm. R Parnell: First Lieutenant, Christopher Dolan; Non-Commissioned Officers, C. R. Frampton, James McDowell, T. H. Philipsen, Henry T. Clench, Duncan Murchison, August Ittmann, John Crean, Michael Cogan, William Hillman, James P. Mist, Emil Bossart, Charles Dingler, Francis H. Tarleton, Charles Kirk, Martin Rabin, Merritt Livingston, Dennis Costello, John McAdams.

Private soldiers: Michael Barry, Albert Burbank, William Bren, Peter Burns, Peter Brown, Thomas Brady, Owen Creally, John Cunningham, Patrick Coffey, William Crozier, Thomas Conroy, William Cass, Fred. Delinger, Rudolph Deimar, Jacob Da Costa, Edward Durier, William Davis, John Freeman, Michael Fanning, John Geary, Matthew Guinan, Joseph Garry, Michael Hirlig, Michael Hyland, Patrick Joyce, Charles Jacob, John Johnson, John Kuntze, Jacob Kern, August Koch, Charles

Le Gard, W. Meyer, W. Maeder, William McHale, George Montgomery, Peter Murray, Arthur Murphy, Donald McDonald, Conrad Meyer, Thos. McCarthy, Patrick Maloney, Philip Meyer, Patrick O'Connor, William O'Connor, Henry Peasha, Philip Plessing, Thomas Ronan, Patrick Roach, Jacob Roth, Julius Richter, Michael Smith, James Smith, John Smith, Owen Sweeny, Joseph Shoran, George Swan, Edwin Teal, Edward Turner, Jabez Weeks and Walter Wall.

Company C (from Yonkers).—Captain, Ralph H. Olmstead, the only commissioned officer; Non-Commissioned Officers, Charles H. Hawking, James Olmstead, James Magarity, Charles R. Smith, John Lowry, Malachi Kelly, William H. Keeps, John Mulheren, Henry M. Hyer, George F. Kuhn, John H. Davis, Peter F. Gownas, Thomas Giff and Joseph A. Moore, Alfred Eyre, Lewis H. Denison and William B. Miner.

Privates as follows: William Barton, Daniel Buddy, James L. Coleman, Reuben H. Chase, John Cole, Samuel Conroy, Alanson H. Comstock, Daniel J. Cronin, John R. Dodge, Gilbert B. Edwards, Monroe Estes, William Forrest, George Giles, Michael Gormly, James Gray, Gilbert Hummel, James Hitchcock, Jas. H. Howell, Jeremiah G. Huckey, Daniel Lewis, Peter Mallon, George H. Miner, Charles Miller, John Henry May, Michael McGinniss, Thomas Mullen, Arthur Murdoch, Andrew Overbaugh, Philander Payne, Dennis Ryan, Sam'l Smith, David Shaw, Henry Stone, John R. Suiter, Moses H. Terwilliger, Charles T. Terwilliger, Thomas P. Terwilliger, Richard Vaughan, Eugenius Walker, John Welsch, Alva Wickham, Garry B. Wheeler, Nicholas Wolvan and Joseph T. Ward.

Company F (from Yonkers).—Captain Samuel Genther the only name.

The names of Henry Jones, of Rye, and Jacob Rosenbaum, of Tarrytown, in Company L, with that of James McAvoy, of Rye, in Company M, make up the total in the regiment credited to the county of Westchester.

The next organization in which the county appears to have taken any official part is the Fifth Independent Battery, mustered into the United States service November 8, 1861, in New York City. The roll of this battery contains the names of Privates Charles Cadigan and John Turbitt, from Yonkers; Benjamin Moore and Charles Moore, from Mount Vernon; and Charles Travers, from Peekskill.

The First Regiment Mounted Rifles, which was mustered into the service in squadrons and companies, all the way from August 31, 1861, to September 9, 1862, can be noticed here, although a little out of its order, to make room for the only regiment in which Westchester County could be said to be fully represented during the war. The rolls of the First Mounted Rifles contain, in Company F, the names of John Blatchley, Charles Polhemus and Peter See, of Tarrytown; Thomas Gerhardt, James D. Nation, George D. Newman, James W. Porteous, Albert Sherwood and William Wallace, of Mount Pleasant; and Frederick Gertman, of Harrison.

This concludes the three years' volunteers raised in Westchester County as organizations, of which the records are accessible, in an official form, up to the raising of the regiment whose rolls are next in order.

The Sixth Heavy Artillery was originally raised at Yonkers for the One Hundred and Thirty-fifth New York Infantry, and mustered into the service from the 2d day of September, 1862, for three years. It then consisted of eight companies, but, in December of the same year two more were added, and the whole was mustered in as the Sixth Heavy Artillery at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Md.

Company A contains the following names:

From Peekskill: Privates, Gabriel S. Adams, Charles E. Orne, J. H. Wright, C. P. Crueger, W. N. Lent, D. R. Goethius, W. T. Travis, J. C. Halstead, John Smith, W. H. Dutcher, C. E. Snedicor, T. The last organization with which the county appears to have been identified is the Sixteenth (Sprague Light) Cavalry, which was mustered into the service from June to October, 1863. The companies of this regiment in which the county furnished men, officially accredited thereto, were K, L and M, in which the following names appear:

Company K.—Privates Charles H. Ackerman, Philip Apel, Henry Apelhaus, John Baker, John Baureis, Anthony Chichester, Robert Clark, Gustavus Dahlgren, Ernest Diezelski, Gustavus Francis, Lorenzo Hacket, Frederic Haller, John Hoffman, William Moore, Theodore Pickery, Henry Raymond, James T. Scanlan, William Shields, Walter Smith, Henry R. Thompson, George Thompson, John Walsh and Henry Zollinger, all of Mount Pleasant, chiefly recruited by Captain Ronald McNichol.

John Armstrong, Edwin D. Barlow, Franz Carl Digel, Thomas Dunn, Pat. Haviland, Milton A. Hewen, and George Weaver, of Yonkers.

Theodore Bennett, Patrick Byrne, William H. Collyer, John Harkins, John Kurzook, Dennis Murley, John Murphy, John Quicker, Frank Verder and Joshua R. Williams, of Greenburgh.

Company L.—James Kirwin, William Marshall, Daniel C. Bannatine, James Murray, John Schwartz, Nicholas Seray, Archibald Van Orden, of Greenburgh.

John Breadle, John M. Bloom, Patrick Brennan, Michael Collins, Henry Davenport, Andrew J. Fleming, John Fitzpatrick, John Hunt, Charles Hart, Charles Lewis, of White Plains.

Company M.—William Norris, Richard A. Adams, Richard Bell, of Greenburgh, appear as sergeants, while Corporal Edward H. Lynch hails from the same place, Privates Michael Buckley, Charles B. Brown, Patrick Byrnes, John Barrett, William Biederbeck, William Collyer, James Carroll, John Carey, Henry Connor, Thomas Clark, J. H. Connors, Thomas Cusick, Charles Coyle, James Clark, Martin Dooley, William Davidson, Michael Driscoll, Patrick Donnelly, Henry Davis, Charles Damain, James W. Elliott, John Gilligan, W. H. Gibbs, William Gregory, Richard Hore, Conrad Hauser, Thomas Hill, Isidor Hausle, Armand Jouanne, Thomas Kearns, Charles Keenan, Peter Ledgwidge, Patrick Larkin, Charles P. Lange, Patrick Lyons, Henry Lehmuhle, John McGrath, James Mooney, John Miles, John Miller, Robert Milligan, Charles Mader, John O'Connell, Martin Peterson, Francis Quinn, James Rogers, Hugh M. Robertson, Martin Rauan, Charles Radetzky, David Shannon, George Smith, Francis Smith, W. H. Smith, Charles H. Von Tine, Laurence Williams, Thomas White, Dick Williams, Albert Wilson, Joshua Williams and August Yobiges, of Greenburgh.

This closes the history of the three years' volunteers in Westchester County, as far as the original enlistments are concerned, the names being taken from the original muster-rolls, but not including subsequent enlistments, which do not appear in the publication issued by the State adjutant-general. It is a matter of regret that this has never been done, as in some other States; but, the population of New York being so large and the men sent from the State so numerous, this has been hitherto deemed impracticable.

The doings of the men who went from the county to the field, their sufferings and losses, will be best told under a later head.[1]

Home Affairs, to the Election of Governor Seymour.—A history of the county during the war, which did not take notice of the bitter political divisions within its limits, would be a farce; but it is important, in stating the facts that appear, to bear in mind the pre-existing prejudices which had made them possible.

The prime cause of the divisions was the near neighborhood of the city of New York, on which the county depended for mental and moral aliment, and whose opinions and passions it reflected. As in the Revolution, Westchester County became a sort of debatable ground, where both parties raged. The reproachful terms of "Whig," "Tory," "Cowboy" and "Skinner" were changed to "Abolitionist," "Copperhead," "Nigger-Worshipper" and "Traitor." Families were divided, churches rent into factions, and actual fighting was only saved the county, during the draft riots of 1863, by the fact that the rioters did not get their courage to the fighting point till it was too late to do anything.

The most prominent factor in the feeling, as shown in the comments of the Eastern State Journal, already quoted, was intense dislike of the Republicans, rather than active sympathy with the Secessionists. At the time of Mr. Lincoln's election the majority of the voters of the county honestly believed, with the Eastern State Journal, that all Republicans were designing knaves, who earnestly wished to break up the Union.

Up to the death of the old Whig party, the distinction between that and the Democracy had been broad, simple and easily understood. The one party was centralizing, the other decentralizing. The disturbing element of slavery had altered all this; the old line of demarcation had vanished; but extreme partisans, on both sides, kept on talking and thinking about abstractions that had ceased to have any real existence. Under the operation of the Fugitive Slave Law, the Democrats had become advocates of "Federal Coercion," in favor of slavery, in Kansas; while the Republicans preached the most extreme doctrines of "State-rights," in the "personal liberty laws," by which the Northern States resisted or evaded the [1] To complete the history of the three years' volunteers who actually went from Westchester County would involve the names of all men who enlisted after the formation and mustering of each company. I contemplated gathering these in as far as possible, but soon found that a complete list would be impracticable, while an incomplete one might give just offense to men whose names would be unavoidably left out, from lack of information. I have, therefore, preferred to insert only those names found in the official muster-rolls, published by the State, which contains ninety or ninety-five per cent. of the actual enlistments. After the draft began, in 1863, the records are no guide, as men were credited to any place where bounties could be obtained—the higher the better.

—F. W.]

operation of the United States marshals, whenever it was sought to enforce the act. Individuals of the party, like Wendell Philips, openly denounced the Union as "a covenant with death, and a league with hell." Furthermore, a spirit of sectional pride, roused by the arrogant bearing of Southern members of Congress and by the assault of Brooks of South Carolina, on Charles Sumner, was gradually becoming more and more prominent. The young men of the party, not unjustly denominated "sectional," in the North, were getting ready to fight, just as the Southern youths were preparing, in their own States, for the coming conflict. The Democrats, who, under Thomas Jefferson, had been distrustful of the Constitution, and insisting on amendments in the direction of personal liberty, had, in 1860, become the most ardent of "Constitution-worshippers," insisting on the absolute perfection of the instrument and on the right of Southern States to the fullest protection, under its provisions, for their slaves, in the free States. In the legal aspect of the case, they had the advantage of the Supreme Court on their side. The Republicans, on the other hand, treated the "constitutional" arguments as not practical, and constantly shifted the ground to that of the right or wrong of slavery. They cultivated habits, which did not leave them, during the war, of decrying their opponents as "dough-faces;" "trucklers to the South;" "men devoid of proper spirit," and, after the war had begun, even as "traitors." The Democrats retorted, with equal conviction, charges that the Republicans were not "true Union men;" that they were not "for the Union, under all circumstances, with or without slavery."

It was the grain of truth at the bottom of all these recriminations that rendered them so exasperating, causing party feeling to run higher in the county than in any other part of the Union, save the city of New York, Southern Indiana or New Jersey.

It has been often said that "the war between the North and South would never have taken place had the people of the two sections known each other better." It is equally true that the party divisions that rent Westchester County would never have risen to such proportions and bitterness had the members of both parties tried to see, in the minds of the others, the real convictions which underlay the apparently radical differences in politics. The literature of the time, carefully perused, now that the film of passion has cleared from the mental sight, will show that there was not an actual "Secessionist" to be found in the county. Even the Democrats disapproved of secession, though they held to Buchanan's doctrine that the Union "rested on public opinion," and "could never be cemented by the blood of its citizens." Their real hatred of the Republicans was owing to a fear of centralization and military despotism, which after-facts showed to be unjustified by the designs of Mr. Lincoln's adminstration.

The Eastern State Journal, from which we continue to quote, as being published at White Plains, the county-seat, and as the official county paper, will show the state of feeling of eight thousand voters of the county better than anything else.

The Journal, on the 17th of May, 1861, put at the head of its columns the following card, which it kept up till the November of the following year, as an explicit statement of its position in the contest. It was as follows:

"THE TRUE SENTIMENT.

"Mr. Lincoln is not the United States government. The government is OURS and we owe allegiance to it. Mr. Lincoln is not ours, and we do not owe allegiance to him. Mr. Lincoln's term of office is brief and fleeting: the government, we hope, will last forever."

The leader, in the first paper in which this "true sentiment" is put forth, is an argument to prove that, when the war is over, the Fugitive Slave Law should at once be enforced. On the 21st of May, the editor, in answer to a Republican paper just started—the Morrisania Journal—explains the "true sentiment" at length; accuses the Republicans of carrying on the war for party purposes, simply, and ends with the assertion: "the Republicans stand by their administration; the Democrats by our government." From this time to the battle of Bull Run, the fight is carried on with the Morrisania Journal. The paper is full of sneers at "Abolitionists," and teems with assertions that "the volunteers in the field are in the proportion of three Democrats to one Republican," with the further assertion that "all Abolitionists are cowards." In July the paper drops politics on the first page, and begins to put in serial stories, paying much attention to local items, and ignoring the war as much as possible. It is full of a Fourth of July local celebration; and the only indication of the old feeling crops out in a paragraph, "No abolitionism. The border Slave States might be conciliated, if a promise was given them that their slaves should be retained." The editor hopes that "Horace Greeley will be thrown overboard," and that "Democrats will be called to advise Mr. Lincoln."

The news of Bull Run brings a marked approval of the "peace resolution," introduced by Mr. Benjamin Wood in Congress, and laid on the table by Mr. Washburn, of Illinois. The editor asks, "When will the war end?" and says that "another administration must come in before peace is likely to be restored to the country." In August the editor indignantly repudiates the assertion that "the anti-slavery feeling is spreading at the North," but admits the "apostasy" of several Congressman, who are voting with the administration to prosecute the war. It glories in the fact that Mr. Haight, the member from the home district, is still opposed to the prosecution of the war. It further glories in the fact that the Democratic State Convention has refused to join the Republicans in nominating a "Union State Ticket" of both parties, united only in prosecuting the war.

This refusal is justified by the radical difference on the subject of slavery. August 16th begins the bitter controversy on the suspension of the habeas corpus, when the sheriff of Kings County tried to get out of Fort Lafayette the Baltimore police commissioners, confined there under an order of General Banks, for treasonable action in Maryland. From this time it seems that the Republican papers, recently established in the county, are beginning to "strike back," for the editor is very indignant at being classed with the Yonkers Herald and Highland Democrat as "three penny-whistle, traitor sheets." He indignantly asks, "if all the men opposed to the Mexican War and that of 1812 were traitors?" and answers:

"No, we are not traitors. We admit that the secessionists forced the war on us. . . . But we hate Abraham Lincoln's principles. . . . We have exposed corruption wherever we have found it. . . . If this be treason, make the most of it. . . . If hatred of the Chicago platform be treason, we are traitors. So are three-fourths of our soldiers, and they would refuse to march a step if they thought that their loyalty was to be measured by such a standard. . . ."

Next week the White Plains paper, with the Highland Democrat and Yonkers Herald, were formally presented by the grand jury in the following terms:

THE PRESENTMENT.

"The Grand Jury of the county of Westchester, recognizing the existence of the war in which the country is now engaged, with an armed rebellion in a portion of the confederacy; and the necessity for its vigorous prosecution, until an honorable peace is conquered; and desirous of having public opinion so fixed, and individual action so shaped, in the hitherto loyal county of Westchester, in regard to the war, as to prevent breaches of the peace; feel it a duty to call the attention of all loyal citizens and the magistracy of the county to the importance of every one within its borders contributing every honorable effort to the sustaining of the Federal arm, in maintaining the supremacy of the laws of the land and in crushing out the rebellion of the southern traitors. They therefore admonish all citizens of the fact that in a state of war, international as well as local law declares the giving of aid and comfort to the enemies of a government, either by overt acts, in assisting its enemies, or by WRITINGS or PUBLICATIONS, tending to give such aid and comfort, the crime of misprision of treason, to be punished, on conviction, by imprisonment.

"The Grand Inquest of the county, having had brought to their attention sundry articles, which have appeared in newspapers, published within this county, denying the justice of the war in which we are engaged, treating it as a party war, and not involving in its issues the government itself and our national existence, and therein sympathizing with the traitors to the Republic, deem it proper, in conservation of the peace of the county, that the proprietors and editors of these papers should be by them publicly admonished of the great moral, if not legal, crime, in which, from partizan motives, they have been indulging, to the danger of the peace and quiet of the people, And, lest injustice should be done to loyal newspapers, the following journals are particularly designated as disseminators of doctrines which, in the existing state of things, tend to give aid and comfort to the enemies of the government, and to prevent a vigorous prosecution of the war, by which alone the supremacy of the government is to be maintained, and national peace and prosperity witnessed in the land.

"The Yonkers Herald, Highland Democrat and Eastern State Journal have, from the time of the issue of the President's Proclamation, immediately after the firing on Fort Sumter, steadily treated the war which has followed, in the extracts and articles they have published, as an unholy and partizan war, unjustly commenced and prosecuted by the administration. In so doing, it has evidently been their purpose to consolidate a party, by the aid of whose opposition and influence they might prevent enlistments and retard the successful prosecution of the war.

[Two New York City papers are further mentioned as circulating in the county, with similar doctrines and the presentment proceeds:]

"The Grand Jurors, therefore, invoke the attention of the District Attorney of this county to the prosecution of the editors and proprietors named, if hereafter, after this public notice of their evil course, they should persist in thus continuing to give aid and comfort to the enemies of the government, and they request him to certify and transmit a copy of this presentment to the United States District Attorney of the Southern District of New York, with a view to his commencing such proceedings thereon as the nature of the circumstances requires.

"STEPHEN LYON, Foreman.
"W. SWINBURNE, Clerk."

This document naturally produced quite an excitement in the office of the Eastern State Journal, and the editor, being a White Plains man, living within a stone's throw of the court-house, and personally known to all the members of the grand jury, exerted himself to the utmost to get rid of the stain it produced on his reputation. He managed to get a letter from the foreman of the grand jury, which he published in his next week's paper, stating that he (the foreman) had voted against putting the Eastern State Journal on the list of papers presented, but that he had been outvoted and therefore had signed the presentment. Mr. Lyon, in thus letting out the secrets of the grand jury room, did what he could to save a neighbor by further saying that he was "one of nine" who voted to strike the Journal off the list. Next week the indefatigable editor managed to get two more men who were on the grand jury to say that they voted against the presentment, and as soon as this consummation was reached he burst out into indignant denunciation of the men who voted for it, as a "corrupt and debauched clique;" "curs who have snarled and snapped at our heels for years," who need "a sound kicking" for "besliming and befouling all they touch," while "their putrid breath so corrupts the air" that the editor can hardly draw his breath.

The presentment, however, had a marked effect on the tone of the paper for some weeks, for the next editorial conclusion on "what patriotism demands of party organization" in the crisis is that the Democrats should, in future, "stick together on local issues" and let the administration carry on the war without interference.

Next week the editor speaks of the "determined and loyal course of the President." After that he explains his motto in a different spirit; prints Union letters and speeches, in one of which a War Democrat declares "compromise impracticable;" and so the paper swims quietly along until the State election, at which Democrats are exhorted to "Stick to your party," "Vote the Democratic State Ticket," "Stand by the old party," "Don't be humbugged by the cry of no-partyism," "It is an old dodge," etc., etc. The result of the election—for Secretary of State and other officers, in the off year—giving the Republicans a majority of all they wished, with the first appearance of Judge Robertson in the capacity of State Senator, the editor finds comfort in the removal of Fremont—effected about the same time—which he assumes as a mark of "proper respect to the sentiments of the Democracy of the North."

It would take us far beyond the limits of such a chapter as this to follow the course of political opinion at the county capital with any minuteness; but the tone of the Eastern State Journal grows stronger and stronger in opposition to the prosecution of the war during the year 1862, though the obnoxious "true sentiment" is dropped. There are no more articles openly abusing "Abolitionists;" but the paper sticks to the doctrine, as late as April 20, 1862, that "the general government has, even in war, no more power" to coerce a rebellious State "than the Constitution gives it," and therefore none to confiscate slaves or set them free. The abuse of "Abolitionists" is changed, as the summer goes on, to philippics on "lazy, mindless negroes," and predictions of a "San Domingo massacre" if the slaves of the South are ever freed. As the autumn comes on, however, the nomination of Horatio Seymour puts the editor on his feet again, and he begins to threaten the "Abolitionists" more boldly every day. In December he closes the year 1862 by referring to the coincidence of the Emancipation Proclamation of Mr. Lincoln and the election of Mr. Seymour to be Governor of New York as "The Two Proclamations." The one he concludes to be mere "waste paper, impossible of enforcement," while the other is "A proclamation that the State of New York is free once more." The lines "The Democracy Triumphant," "The Administration is not the Government," came out in every issue, and it is a noticeable fact that in this paper, as in the Yonkers Herald-Gazette, as the virulence of the tone increases, so does the pressure of the county advertising increase also, showing what powerful influences were behind the papers, in the shape of the county officers.

The extracts from the Eastern State Journal have been given in full, because, as appears above, a part of the grand jury thought it not quite disloyal enough to be included in the presentment, and therefore its tone can be taken as that of the more moderate Democrats who stayed at home during the war and voted for Horatio Seymour, as they did. The figures of the election in the county are rather against the assertion of the Journal that "three-fourths of the volunteers from the county were Democrats," for the vote cast for Seymour for Governor is seven thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, a decrease from the Presidential vote—given at the beginning of this section—of only two hundred and sixty votes, while the Republican vote is only five thousand five hundred and fifty-six, which is a decrease of one thousand one hundred and fifteen votes from that cast for the Lincoln electors two years before.

THE DRAFT RIOTS.—The most conspicuous incident in the home history of the county during the Civil War, after the election of Mr. Seymour, was the occurrence of the draft riots, which, beginning in the city of New York, partly spread into the county itself.

The troubles in the city began on Monday, July 13, 1863. The New York papers of that day record that the draft was begun on the previous Saturday, in the Twenty-second Ward, at No. 677 Third Avenue, and that "all was quiet, with plenty of good-natured joking at the names of the citizens as they were drawn." They also announce that the next place to be opened would be at the corner of Broadway and Forty-fifth Street, on Monday morning. Thus it will be seen that, as in the case of the Fort Sumter excitement, a serious action had taken place on Saturday and that the people had all Sunday to think over it. In the first case the result of the thought had been in the direction of patriotism; this time it was to be different, owing to the difference in the character of the individuals composing the two crowds. That of 1861 was raised down-town among men who were, for the most part, well educated and self-supporting, actuated by a sentiment in which nothing personal was contained. No matter what its object or action, the crowd which, in April, 1861, compelled the hanging out of the flag, was "a mob" to all intents and purposes. Its action, however, was marked by no single instance of violence, and it required no act from the persons at whom its anger was leveled beyond the simple "hanging out of the United States flag."

The mob of July, 1863, was of a very different character, and it began its work in districts high up-town, then chiefly occupied by squatters' shanties, pigs and goats. The men composing it were animated by no sentiment beyond escaping the draft in some manner, they knew not how. Their general ignorance made their action, from the first, one of unreasoning violence, quickly degenerating into murder, arson and rapine of all sorts.

Briefly catalogued, the first day's work was the burning of the provost marshal's offices, the destruction of the lists (under the idea that if they were once destroyed the draft could not be enforced), tearing up railroad tracks, cutting of telegraph wires, mobbing of individual soldiers found on the streets, murder of some of them, resistance to the police accompanied by murder, burning of an orphan asylum for colored children, burning and sacking of many private houses, hanging of negroes wherever they were to be found by the mob, attack on the counting-room of the New York Tribune, rescue of the same by a charge of police under Captain Thorne.

Second day: murder of Colonel O'Brien, of the Eleventh Regiment, when he was away from his troops, general control of the city by the mob, troops telegraphed for, fierce fighting by the police to maintain a semblance of order.

On this day Westchester County became involved in the disturbances. Crowds visited the enrolling offices of Morrisania and West Farms, tore up the enrolling lists, destroyed the telegraph offices at Williams' Bridge and Melrose, ripped up some rails on the New Haven and Harlem roads, near the Bronx River, had pickets on both roads as far as Mount Vernon to signal when a general attempt to tear up tracks might be safe, but were quieted in Morrisania and West Farms by appeals made by Supervisor Cauldwell and Mr. Pierre C. Talman. A telegraph operator on this day tried to put an instrument into a store at Hunt's Bridge, near Mount Vernon, but the proprietor was intimidated by a message from sympathizers with the mob, that, if the instrument was not removed, the store would be gutted. On this, the second day, there was a complete reign of terror, though no violence seems to have been committed in the county beyond the acts chronicled above.

On Wednesday evening a meeting was called in the town hall, at Tremont, which was heavily attended by the people of West Farms, Morrisania and the vicinity. This was presided over by Mr. John B. Haskin, and is fully reported in the New York Herald of Friday, till which time the notes of the reporter seem to have been crowded out in the pressure of other news. It may be remarked that the Herald reports of the incidents of the week seem the best to be found, the facts being given fully, without attempt to color them in either direction. The Herald report is here used,—

"Mr. Haskin, in taking the chair, said that:

"They had met in a crisis which required the greatest coolness and judgment on the part of the people. He hoped that the proceedings would be characterized, hereafter, as the conduct of honest and law-abiding citizens. That it was not their interest to uphold the Administration in the odious and unconstitutional Conscription Act (cheers), but there was a way to test it, in the courts. In his opinion, the act of 1792, providing for calling out the militia, was fully equal to the present emergency in the history of the Rebellion. That the men who made the Constitution passed that act, with the express object of giving power to raise the troops necessary in emergencies. When Mr. Lincoln made his first call, it was good enough for the purpose. Then the State had a Republican Governor. Now it had a Democratic governor, and the old law was worthless. The chief executive of the State was to be deprived of his power, that his duties might be transferred to government satraps, to execute the will of the irresponsible authorities at Washington (cheers). This was an insult to Mr. Seymour, and an insult to the loyal people who elected him (great cheers). If the Administration were afraid to trust the governor, afraid to trust the people of the State, it was a fresh proof of the imbecility of the men who now controlled the destiny of the Republic (cheers). He argued that the State courts must declare the act constitutional or unconstitutional, and by their decrees the Government must abide. Therefore, why this excitement? Their rights would be protected, their privileges maintained, no matter at what hazard or what cost (cheers). He referred to the exemption clause ($300.00) as being an invidious distinction between the rich and poor (Yes, yes). It was undemocratic, unwise, and he did not wonder that they objected to it. He preferred the old law, under which all classes bore equal responsibility (cheers). Our recent brilliant victories made it easy for volunteers to be raised, to put down the rebellion. Let the Government abandon the conscription act and throw itself on the patriotism of the people (great cheers). There were men enough to volunteer, good men, of their own free will. Such men would fight better, and be an honor to the service. He went on in this strain, for some time, and then denounced the rioters for robbery, and declared the hanging of inoffensive negroes a disgrace to the age in which we live. They ought rather to be protected, as the weak have a right to the protection of the strong. He was sure that this meeting did not approve of the burning of Orphan Asylums, be they for blacks or whites. There should be no distinction of nationalities, colors or races. Then the speaker denounced the excesses of Know-Nothingism bitterly, the audience applauding heartily. He alluded to General McClellan, who was cheered enthusiastically, and General Grant's name was also greeted with cheers, the news of Vicksburg being fresh at the time.

"Mr. Pierre C. Talman followed in a similar strain, expressing his confidence that the meeting before him would be the last people in the world to violate the laws. He reminded them that the abolitionist fanatics, who were rapidly losing their grip on the people, desired nothing better than to regain it, through the excesses of a mob. (Groans for the Abolitionists). But the workingmen of Westchester County were always ready for peace and the law (cheers). He animadverted on the exemption clause, as an odious distinction, and reminded them that the Governor (great cheers) wanted it tested in the State courts and declared unconstitutional (cheers). Then he denounced the excesses in New York, which, he said, were all committed by thieves, who had taken advantage of the excitement to disgrace the people. Mr. Talman was much applauded.

"During his speech, however, he was interrupted by a man, who asked if it was not true that Mr. Haskin had a negro in his employment and what right he had to keep one? Haskins got up at once and replied that he had such a man, the same who hoisted the first Union flag on Roanoke Island, that it was no one's business whether he kept an Irishman, German, Swede, Negro, or anybody else in his employment; that he intended to keep the man as long as he pleased. The statement was cheered and his questioner was silenced.

"This meeting adopted a set of resolutions, condemning the draft; expressing confidence in Horatio Seymour, in his efforts to get it declared unconstitutional; affirmed the judgment of the people of Morrisania and West Farms, that the act was unconstitutional, and deprecated mob violence. They appointed Messrs. Talman, G. W. Caldwell, Franklin W. Gilley, Thomas E. Sutton, John B. Haskin, John Kirby and Terence Kennedy, a committee, 'to wait on Moses G. Sheard, Esq., Federal Provost Marshal of the district,' to 'insist that the draft be stopped, till the State court could decide whether it was constitutional.'"

The proceedings of this meeting have been given in full because it was the most important occurrence in the county during the draft riots. The speakers managed the mass of ignorant and excited men, whom it was their task to quiet, with singular skill. They flattered them artfully with assurances that their opposition to the draft was all right; appealed to their self-respect in the most ingenious way, and the appointment of the committee ended the whole matter. The county was quiet thereafter, the more so that the same day, the return of the troops from Pennsylvania and the report of fierce fighting in the city, in which the mob was getting the worst of it, had a tendency to kill the idea that attempts at violence were to be made with safety.

In other parts of the county the disturbances went no further than aimless tumults, which resulted in no actual bloodshed as far as the facts can be ascertained. Mr. Thomas J. Byrne, the county enrolling officer at White Plains, was fired at on Monday evening as he was driving home, but returned the fire with a revolver and got away safe. His house was visited by a mob on Wednesday evening, after dark; the enrollment papers burned, the house sacked and his wife and two children forced to take refuge in the house of Mr. Edward Haight, for fear of violence. Mr. Byrne himself was away from home at the time or the consequences might have been more serious.—New York Herald, summary of Friday. On Wednesday the Hudson River train was stopped at Yonkers, the rails having been torn up between that place and the city, so that the Canadian mail had to be taken to New York on the boat. The citizens of Yonkers formed two companies of Home Guards to keep property and life safe, but there was no serious disturbance. The arsenal was guarded day and night.

At Tarrytown a guard was also formed, and procured a cannon to overawe the mob, so that all was peaceful along the Hudson River. On the same day —Wednesday—there was very nearly being a serious disturbance in the town of East Chester, at the village of Mount Vernon, which illustrates the character of the ignorant prejudice, that culminated in such excesses as were committed in New York City.

A mob of men, from the quarries at the village of Tuckahoe, actually set out from that place, gathering recruits from the villages near them, armed with sticks, stones and any rude weapon they could lay their hands on, and took up their march for the village of Mount Vernon, with the avowed object of "burning down the houses of all the Republicans in the place." These ignorant men were probably excited by the accounts given in the city papers, of the way in which the same vengeance had been meted out to well-known Republicans in the city, one house having been actually burned down "because Horace Greeley once boarded there," as reported by Tribune, Herald and World. At all events, they started out, and the news reached Mount Vernon, where a Home Guard had been hastily formed of the citizens, who were much alarmed at the idea of being attacked, both from the city and the river. Volunteers were called for to reconnoitre the enemy; and a drummer-boy, home on sick furlough at the time, was found, who said he would go. A horse was furnished him, and he—boy-like—must needs put on his uniform and ride off. He met, about two miles from the village, coming out of the lane from Bronxville, towards Mount Vernon, a confused crowd of men, who stopped him and asked "where he was going." He replied "To Bronxville;" and asked in turn "Where are you going?" The reply was "We are going to raise hell." With that they began to throw stones at him and yell, so that he was glad to wheel the horse and gallop away. Probably the fact of his youth and apparent innocence saved him from serious harm, for no effort was made to pursue him, and he got off safe. Returning, and trying to take a short cut across the swamp towards Mount Vernon, he got his horse mired just behind the house of Mr. John G. Satterlee, afterwards known as "the Corson Place," and had to leave the animal and run the rest of the way to the village on foot. Preparations were made to receive the expected rioters by the Home Guards, who occupied two buildings, one being a cartridge factory on Fifth Avenue, near First Street. Towards the end of the afternoon the rioters made their appearance, but, in the mean time, they had been met by several prominent Democrats of the place, at a turn in the road, known as "Sageman's Corners," where they were induced to give up their design of actual arson, but were obstinate in their determination to march into Mount Vernon. They came down the White Plains road, where it runs into Fourth Avenue, Mount Vernon; threw stones at windows in First Street, at the corner of Fourth Avenue, and in Fourth Avenue itself; shouted, flourished sticks and yelled; but after marching a little way down First Street, turned back at the bridge over the New Haven track, known as "Scott's Bridge," and went away, dispersing to their homes.

Thus ended the last actual attempt at violence in the county of Westchester, of which any trace exists. The Mount Vernon affair is mentioned in none of the journals accessible at the time of writing, and the facts have been collected with considerable difficulty.

Two of the ringleaders of the mob, who marched at their head in Mount Vernon, were recognized by one of the witnesses, but it is not necessary at this late date to mention their names. One is since dead; the other was, for several years after the war, a town official and one of the best-natured of men at ordinary times. The whole history of the little fracas shows the state of excitement into which the more ignorant people of the county were worked by the inflammatory appeals of the papers opposed to the war, and how nearly the county was disgraced by bloodshed. Men, who at other times would not have harmed a kitten, were frenzied with imaginary wrongs and ready for any violence, short of actual murder. That they were not ready for that, save under strong provocation, is shown by the fact that they spared the rash little drummer-boy, who actually rode into the midst of them in uniform.

His horse was struck by a few stones, but they could not have seriously intended to hurt the boy, or they could have done so when they had him in their power, through his own ignorance of the duty of a scout. His name was Joseph H. Porter, and he afterwards enlisted in the Thirteenth New York Cavalry, from New York City, and served to the close of the war. His statements are corroborated, as to the behavior of the rioters in Mount Vernon itself, by Mr. Donald Ferguson, of Mount Vernon, Mr. A. B. Kitson, one of the Home Guard, now a resident of Boston, Mass., and others.[1]

[1] The above account of the part taken by the draft rioters at Mount Vernon has been obtained with considerable difficulty, on account of the lapse of time since the events occurred, and the indisposition of most citizens of the place to speak of what they considered a disgrace to the village.

The main facts—that a mob was organized near Tuckahoe, with the object of riot and arson at Mount Vernon; that the mob actually marched to the village; passed through First (or Front) St., and retired without doing any damage of consequence; and that their arrival was signaled by a rash little drummer boy—seem to be fully established.

The Home Guards, as I learn from one of the surviving members, first organized on Tuesday afternoon, and elected William H. H. Barker their captain. They expected an attack in the night, and threw out pickets towards Scott's Bridge, at the foot of Eleventh Avenue, in Mount Vernon, the main body remaining at Hoole's shop, in the village. The pickets remained out all night and came in at daylight on Wednesday morning, when the whole force was dismissed, the danger being judged

From the Riots to the Close of the War.—The suppression of the draft riots in New York City, the capture of Chattanooga, and the general advance of the Armies of the Potomac and the West, in the spring of 1864, had their influence in Westchester County to effect a change in the conduct of the leading papers. In Yonkers, in particular, this change was judged so necessary that, on the 7th of May, the editor of the Herald, of that town, formally resigned his place, and the Herald passed into the control of a stock company, known as the "Yonkers Democratic Publishing Association," under which the paper (which seems, from the farewell of the editor, to have been in a far from flourishing condition) was carried on to the close of the war. Its tone, under the new control, is no longer one of open hostility to the prosecution of the war, but deals chiefly in personal attacks on Mr. Lincoln, on account of his "frivolous nature" and "buffoonery." On the 21st of May, 1864, the celebrated forged proclamation of Joe Howard and the suppression of the copies of the World and Journal of Commerce, which contained them, are noticed, with much outcry for the "liberty of the press." The split in the Republican party, threatened by the nomination of Fremont, under the inspiration of Gratz Brown (who afterwards ran with Horace Greeley, in 1872, on the Democratic ticket), is noticed, with unconcealed hopes of a favorable issue for the Democracy.

The cry of "corruption" was thus raised in the same issue of the paper,—

"The stench of official corruption in Washington at this moment is ranker than that even arising from the thousands of unburied bodies of horses and men, that strew the soil of Virginia. There may have been corruption under previous administrations; but under that of 'honest old Abe' it is positively frightful."

On the 28th the Yonkers Herald wants General Dix punished "by damages in a civil action," since he "cannot be reached by the State courts, or court-martial," for having closed the World and Journal of Commerce, because there is "no hope in Congress"—it is "too thoroughly servile." "No Senate, in the corruptest days of Rome, registered every decree of its military tyrant with more slavish alacrity than is displayed by the administration majority in fulfilling the will of Abraham Lincoln."

Noticing the nomination of Lincoln at the regular Republican Convention, the Yonkers Herald remarks:

"Another four years of 'Honest old Abe' would leave nothing but the shadow of a Republic on the American continent." It thanks the Eastern State Journal and Highland Democrat for the welcome extended by them to the paper under its new management. On the 4th of June the name of the paper is changed to the Gazette (under which it still exists) and a great "boom" begins in the advertising columns, from the quantity of county advertising thrown in, as in the case of the Eastern State Journal, by the county officials. On the same day begins a series of controversies with the Yonkers Statesman, formerly the Examiner, the leading Republican newspaper of the county, with regard to accusations against the Gazette of "disloyalty." The extract is,—

"We confess to the smallest possible amount of respect for Republican professions of 'loyalty,' or Republican charges of 'disloyalty.' The word is not American, nor Republican even—here it originally expressed the treasonable attachment of the loyal Tories to George the Third, in his wanton war against American liberty; and, as now used, it generally means partisan devotion to Abraham Lincoln, not in resistance to a Southern Rebellion, but in a would-be second war on the liberties of American citizens."

June 11th comes the notice of the Democratic Convention being called by August Belmont, on which the editor exhorts his readers that "Civil liberty cannot survive another term of Abraham Lincoln." Next week comes an article on "Reconstruction," from which we extract,—

"What is the political relation of the rebellious States to the Union? Have their own acts and ordinances taken them out of it, as they themselves claim? If not, has the President, or Congress even, the right to expel States from the Union? If these States are still members of the Union, can new States be carved out of them without their own consent, against the prohibition of the Constitution on that head? On some of these points we entertain very decided opinions, which we refrain, however, from expressing in this article."

From thence, through July and August, the Gazette is much exercised at the "progress of military despotism" in regard to the suppression of the bogus proclamation, and especially when the New York grand jury, appealed to by Judge Russell to investigate in the matter, considers it "inexpedient to enquire into the action of the general government as to certain newspapers in this city." The Gazette calls on the judge to summon another grand jury, and on Oakey Hall, the district attorney, to do his best to over for the time. When the mob really came, the few men who were at the cartridge factory and elsewhere were not regularly organized.

The route of the mob to the village was down the extension of Fourth Avenue, and when they had made their short march they went to Gould's Hotel, where they consumed a great deal of liquor. They were dissuaded from fighting by prominent citizens of the place, among whom the names of Judge Stevens, Judge Pemberton, George Gould and Darius Lyon are mentioned, as the men who really saved Mount Vernon from a bloody riot.

As the rioters came along, they pressed into the service every man they met on the road.

On their return they passed by the houses of John G. Satterley and John F. Jarvis, who then resided at what was afterwards known as "The Corson Place." Part of them were on foot and part driving in all sorts of vehicles. Part had guns or pistols, a few old swords, but the majority had nothing but clubs made out of fence pickets. In front of Mr. Satterley's house, and in plain sight of Mr. Jarvis's, they had a drunken fight, in which some shots were fired, of which more than one struck the porch pillars of Mr. Satterley's house. A club, in the course of this fight, was thrown over Mr. Satterley's fence into his garden, and was kept, for some years after, by the family, as a relic of the draft riots.

The witnesses examined by me, in investigating the affair, unite in their stories as to the above facts.

They are Mr. A. B. Kitson, of 37 South St., Boston, Mass. (then a member of the Mount Vernon Home Guards); Mrs. Higgins, of Mount Vernon (at the time of riot Miss Eva Satterley); Mrs. John G. Satterley, her mother; Mr. John F. Jarvis, of Mount Vernon; and Mr. Joseph H. Porter, the drummer-boy of the story, who afterwards entered the 13th N. Y. Cavalry and served to the close of the war.

Mr. John G. Satterley died a few years since.

secure a conflict between the State of New York and the United States on the subject, saying,—

"We sincerely trust the authorities of the state will not be intimidated by this declaration of war upon them by Mr. Lincoln. Let it be made known to him that he cannot play the dictator over the people and laws of the State of New York, or let us prepare for worse than Austrian slavery."

From this time to the middle of September the Gazette is occupied with definitions of principles, such as this: "He who avows that he is not for the Union, without conditions, is disunionist, let him be Abraham Lincoln or Jefferson Davis. . . . The only Union man is he who is for the Union, without conditions." There are also a number of stories about the "branding" of United States recruits, which are repeated from week to week, with the obvious intention of discouraging ignorant men from enlisting.

As the election approaches, the Gazette becomes more and more pronounced in its appeals to the people in favor of slavery, such as this:

"The Difference.—The Democratic Platform is, the Union at all hazards; the Republican Platform is, Abolition at all hazards. The difference between the candidates, Lincoln is for the Union, without slavery; McClellan is for the Union, with or without slavery; Lincoln is for the Union on certain conditions; McClellan, at all hazards; Lincoln has been tried and found wanting; McClellan has always shown himself equal to the emergency. With this brief and intelligent view of the merits of the present contest, no thinking man will hesitate regarding how or where his vote shall be cast."

From henceforth (October 1, 1864) to election the paper is full of reports of mass-meetings, political advertising and appeals to voters to "Register, register," till November 13th, when the conclusion is, "The grand old Democratic party of the State of New York yields the battle-field, covered with all the glory a nobly contested struggle can confer upon it." A touch of humor is conferred on this issue of the paper by a glance at the advertising column, exactly opposite to the editorial. The advertisement is as follows:

"The Re-election of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and
The election of ANDREW JOHNSON, and
The UNIVERSAL UNION TRIUMPH will be celebrated in Yonkers, Tuesday evening, November 15th, by a TORCHLIGHT PROCESSION and ILLUMINATION. All UNION men and LOYAL citizens are cordially invited to take a share in the celebration. Yonkers, Nov. 9, 1864.

"N. P. Otis, Sec. John V. Paddon, Chairman."

The Gazette subsides after this till December 3d, when a sermon is preached, from which we cull:

"Charity.

"The meddlesome notions of New England Puritanism . . . found a congenial topic in the slavery question, and decreed, at an early day, that there should no longer be peace on earth or good will among men unless the negroes were emancipated. . . . The full fruits of such teachings are just now visible in the want of charity manifested by the supporters of Mr. Lincoln's administration towards their political opponents. Differences of opinion . . . are made the subject . . . of unjust charges of disloyalty and treason to the country. . . . This bitterness and uncharity are a stain on the national character. They constitute a state of feeling discreditable to charitable people and which deserves the severest condemnation. For the credit of our common humanity, we wish there were less of it prevalent among us."

December 24th the Gazette says:

"Any President, not wedded to a line of policy which he knows the South will never acquiesce in,—the abolition of slavery,—would see that it is just the time to extend the olive-branch of peace"; but announces, with great relief, that the "Yonkers quota is at last filled." Great troubleseems to have existed on this point of quotas during the year, for there are frequent appeals to the "rich men of Yonkers to come forward, especially those that have not been drafted, and help the rest to buy substitutes." This is especially the case in the issue of June 18th, when the drafts were threatened.

February 4, 1865, records the passage of the constitutional amendment against slavery with a great lamentation as being "irritating to the South." February 11th records the fact that "in the Legislature of this State the Democrats all voted against the adoption of the amendment."

February 18th, comes the following:

"If McClellan had been elected, the Albany Argus truthfully says, the people of the South, who long for peace, would have been looking as eagerly for the Fourth of March as the Democrats of the North. General McClellan would have treated with the States of the Confederacy, separately, for a return to the Union; would have appealed to the people; would have concerted with the generals of the Confederacy to detach their armies from the dynasty at Richmond."

March 11th the paper rejoices over the rejection by New Jersey, Delaware and Kentucky of the Constitutional Amendment, and hopes that one more State will follow their example, so as to make the adoption impossible.

The quota continues to be a subject of grave anxiety, and the fact is noticed that Yonkers has spent $195,000 in town bonds, with $144,000 in county bonds, in filling the different quotas.

April 8th, "Richmond is ours at last." The paper wants a "magnanimous peace and amnesty." Notes the fact that "three hundred millions have been paid out in four months to bounty jumpers," and that "only two hundred thousand of the half million called out in July, 1864, have reached the field."

April 15th, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." "Stop the draft." Very bitter flings at Jefferson Davis, in a burlesque proclamation.

April 22d comes a sudden change. "The National Bereavement." The assassination of Mr. Lincoln is referred to thus: "The darkest crime that ever occurred in the history of this nation has been committed, and forever after will leave a foul blot on its pages . . . Party lines are obliterated in the presence of the nation's dead. . . . He has been removed when we least could afford to lose him . . . Our beloved President . . . His well-known kindness of heart. . . ."

The editor, in commenting on the assassination, admits that it "might have been a wise move at the beginning of the war or during the darker days of the struggle;" but regrets it as being so "foolish and useless" at the moment when it occurred. He pleads for mercy to the South, and so closes the connection of the Yonkers Gazette with the history of the war in Westchester County.

There was quite a little excitement after the close of hostilities, when every one was hastening, like the editor of the Gazette, to add his kick to the fallen Davis, as to a plot to blow up the Croton Dam, which was alleged to have been seriously considered in Canada under the orders of the notorious Jake Thompson.

A man who claimed to be a government spy, and who passed by the aliases of James Watson Wallace and Sanford Conover, in his testimony in Washington, swore to having had conversations with the aforesaid Jake in January, 1865, concerning this and other plots.

Later in the year (July, 1865), in the Toronto Globe, appeared a letter from this same Wallace or Conover, in which he, on 20th March of that year, makes to Thompson the proposition to have the dam destroyed, on the ground that "one of my aunts, a Virginia lady, an enemy of everything Yankee, owns the land on which the dam is built, and her residence and out-buildings are only a few rods from the abutments of the work. This will afford you some idea of the facilities we have at command to accomplish our object. The necessary men for the business are engaged."

This letter appears to be genuine and shows on its face that it was a mere decoy to get Thompson to answer explicity that he approved such a scheme. Instead of this, the man who took him the letter swears that he said: "Is the man mad? Is he a fool?" and tabooed the whole proposition.

The scheme, as hatched by the United States detective, was an ingenious one, to make Thompson think the project of blowing up the Croton Dam a feasible one, but, as a serious measure, it never had any existence, outside of the brain of the detective.

THE AID SOCIETIES.—We have noticed, under the head of the "Two Years' Volunteers," the patriotic manner in which all parties joined, in Port Chester, in the effort to avert suffering from the families of the first company that went from the county. Other towns were by no means idle in the good work; but it is much to be regretted that the records of these societies have, for the most part, perished, and that particulars of names and of the work done are not accessible.

The local papers from which they might be gleaned have for the most part perished, the editors keeping no regular files; and the references to Westchester County in the city papers are few and far between. From the New York Herald of August 17, 1861, we learn, by an item, that the town of Bedford held a fair on the 16th, under the auspices of the ladies of Katonah, in which Judge Robertson auctioned off the goods, and read a letter from Mrs. Lincoln, stating that she had presented the "Havelocks" sent from Katonah to the Second, Ninth, Twenty-seventh and Tammany Regiments, and that they had been received "thankfully and with cheers."

The town of Cortlandt, thanks to the care of Mr. Coffin S. Brown, who was supervisor at the time, has preserved the names of the members of the first society raised in that town, April 27, 1861. The officers of this, which was denominated the "Soldiers' Relief Association," were: President, Mrs. Daniel Jones; Secretary, Miss Amelia B. Mills; Treasurer, Miss Sarah Taylor. The committee to raise funds was;—Mrs. John B. Mills, Mrs. Conrad Quin, Mrs. Edward Mills, Mrs. Joseph Mason, Misses Amanda Wright and Augusta Taylor. This association held weekly meetings throughout the war, sent out large supplies of lint, bandages, clothing and supplies for the Sanitary and Christian Commissions, and otherwise did noble work, being one of those bands of noble women in the Northern States who, together, managed to raise the sum of seventeen millions of dollars, by strictly voluntary contributions, for those great charitable societies.

No record is accessible of the work done by this Cortlandt committee; but in this, as in all else, Port Chester sets a good example, by the careful way in which her papers were preserved by Mr. Marshall, the treasurer.

These records, already referred to, under the topic of the two years' volunteers, show that the first fervor of patriotism required much stimulation to keep it at a comfortable point. The first week's work in Port Chester left the treasurer with a balance of over two hundred dollars to distribute; but the next, in spite of new contributions, the fund sunk to eighty dollars, and the Tituses, father and son, seem to have had to stir themselves to get subscriptions. By the 4th of June the balance rose to a hundred and eighty dollars; on the 8th, Mr. S. K. Satterlee appears to have taken up the business of collecting, for he brought in two hundred and six dollars in a lump, all of which was paid out the same day, for the families of soldiers, or to the military committee for expenses of recruiting. The balance sunk, by the 7th of July, to seventeen dollars and ninety cents, the payments made being in small sums to wives or parents of soldiers, on a weekly allowance, scaled according to the number of mouths to feed. The low state of the fund seems to have started the committee to work again raising subscriptions, for, on the 8th, the balance rose to two hundred dollars, brought in by members of the committee. During the rest of the month the debit side of the treasurer's cash account is empty, while the drafts for families are unceasing till the 20th of July, from which time to the 23d there was a stream of subscriptions, attesting the way in which the news of the disaster at Bull Run (July 21st) had waked up Port Chester. The end of the month left the balance, in spite of the same drafts as usual, $333.63, which was increased, on the 11th of August, by fifty dollars from George Cornell and five dollars from William P. Abendroth. John Palmer is credited, August 20th, with fifty dollars; September 12th, John A. Merritt gave a hundred dollars; but these are the only items worthy of particular notice, and the aspect of the account was by no means encouraging—the givers being few, while the wives of soldiers, on the other side of the page, increased in number, as the weeks went on and the war progressed. By the 25th of September the balance sunk to sixty-six dollars. All the efforts of the committee to increase the subscriptions seem to have been useless, for the debit side of "cash" continued to grow smaller and smaller, till, by the 5th of October, 1861, it sunk to its lowest point during the war, seven dollars and eighty-nine cents. This state of things excited the committee to redoubled exertions, and they raised one hundred and fifty dollars next day; but by the end of the month, in spite of this and two hundred more, the balance on hand was only twenty dollars and forty-nine cents.

The committee was reaching the limits when such work was a proper measure for the relief of the families of volunteers. By the end of the year the fact is revealed that the members had raised, by voluntary subscription, in the village of Port Chester, the sum of $3289.25, and had expended, for relief, $3215.57, almost of all which was given in sums of from three to six or seven dollars per week. During the early months of 1862 the amounts contributed for the relief increased notably, and especially do the names of the donors increase in number, every member of the committee seeming to have been hard at work, while other people were inspired by them to "go and do likewise," so that the balance never fell below a hundred dollars, and was generally nearer two hundred, in spite of increasing appeals for help. At the close of the "voluntary period," as it may be called, when the system of helping the families of volunteers gave way to the juster and more practical method of relief by town and county bonds, the record shows that there had been raised, in Port Chester, $4403.75, of which the balance remaining on hand, when the first bonds were received, was $218.53—a result that shows, even at the present day, when the paper is yellow with age, the ink faded and brown, that the hearts of the people of Port Chester, in the persons of their relief committee, were in the right place during the war.

But the time had come when this system of relief was to give way to another. On the 1st of September, 1862, came the first town bonds, into the hands of the committee, and with them, alas! the first token of that "bounty system," which was to do more to degrade the name of the American soldier than anything that occurred in the whole course of the war. The account of this change brings us naturally to the facts on record, in regard to the cost of the war to the county, made necessary by the unconcealed aversion of a part of the people to engage in a struggle from which the romance had departed, and where nothing remained but the grim reality of death, to be faced as best the heart might be found therefor.

The work of the Union Defense Committees, therefore, gave way to that of the "Ladies' Aid Societies" and the "Councils" of the Sanitary and Christian Commissions, whose sphere of action was different. I am glad here to give a specimen of what that sphere was, by the final report of the Sing Sing Council, which has come into my hands since the above was written. This report is dated 27th of July, 1865, after the return of most of the volunteers, and we extract as follows:

"This Association commenced its labors the 27th of April, 1861, just four years and three months ago. Since that period they have received $3766.88 from donations, festivals, church collections, lectures, &c., and the Sanitary Commission Sociables. These sociables sent in $129 by their treasurer, Miss Hubbell. They have expended $3378.09, leaving a surplus of $388.79. It must be remembered that nearly an equal amount has been given in garments, materials and hospital stores, and during the past year, also, the Christian Commission has had in active operation a Society in this village, sending constantly to the front supplies of clothing and hospital stores. Taking all this into consideration, Sing Sing has great reason for congratulation that the cry for help fell not on unheeding ears, and that her children have not been weary of well doing. The number of garments sent away exceed 9000. Several pieces of muslin were sent away by the Woman's Central Association to be made up; and when after battles the calls were urgent, efficient help was rendered by the ladies of New Castle, Pine's Bridge and Pleasantville. It would occupy too much time and space to thank all who have aided in this noble work, but the managers must express their grateful obligations to the clergy of the village for their co-operation and hearty good-will, and also to the editors of the two papers who have constantly published all their reports and notices free of expense. They also desire heartily to thank Messrs. Tallcot and Burrhus for the use of the rooms for several years. Since the commencement of this society three active and useful managers—Mrs. Neff, Mrs. Weston and Mrs. Truesdell—have entered into their rest. Their associates gratefully recall their labors and pleasant companionship. . . While unfeignedly grateful to their Heavenly Father that war has ended and peace dwells again in the land, it is with saddened hearts that the managers recall the thought that they will never again meet as a Soldiers' Aid Society. . . The great motive for labor, which united them and caused so close a bond, has passed away. The many pleasant and painful associations are things of the past. . . United in our common Christian work, we can never in after days forget the bond of union that kept us together during the four years of the war.

"Secretary and Treasurer."

THE BOUNTY BONDS.—The first burden which was officially taken on itself by the county of Westchester during the war came in the shape of bonds issued by the Board of Supervisors under the provisions of an act passed by the Legislature March 1, 1862, "to relieve the families of volunteers in the field." The amount issued was fifty thousand dollars, which was placed in bonds of varying amounts, bearing seven per cent. interest; issued to the supervisors of the different towns for sale, the proceeds to be expended in relief to the families, in much the same manner as that adopted by the Port Chester Volunteer Committee. The amounts issued to the different towns varied from twenty-five hundred dollars, or less, to ten thousand, according to population. The last of these bonds was paid off in the year 1867.

From this time the county took no further action, in regard to the war, till July 27, 1864, when, in consequence of the drafts, the increasing claims of the bounty jumpers and the difficulty the towns found in floating their bounty bonds, the burden was assumed by the county, as it had been in the relief of volunteers, in 1862. The sum of five hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars was raised in county bonds; distributed to the supervisors of the towns, as in the case of the first set of relief bonds, the rate of interest being seven per cent.; the principal payable in periods ranging from twelve to sixteen years. The first hundred of these bonds was cancelled at the end of the year 1876, and the last sixty-two in April, 1881. The amount raised all went to answer a single call for troops; and, when the next one came, the State was obliged to step in to help the towns, which actually made money on the difference between the bounties they paid and the amount awarded them by the State.

In a sketch necessarily so brief and fragmentary as this must be, on account of the small space given and the magnitude and number of the events to be treated, it would be superfluous to give a detailed account of all the sums paid out in the county. The annals of a single town will serve as a specimen of the way in which the money was raised and expended, the table at the end of this section giving the total for the county.

The town of Cortlandt—then one of the largest in the county—raised, in the year 1862, $20,000 for bounties, of which $16,795 was expended, and 324 men sent out—an excess of 13 over the town quota. In October, 1863, the town raised $14,000 more, besides sums paid by substitutes, and sent out its quota of 116 men. In February, 1864, it raised $35,000 to send out 73 men. In March, 1864, $20,000 was used to send out 49 men, with $5000 more, paid by drafted men for substitutes. In July, 1864, the town received, from the county bonds already mentioned, $107,800; raised $15,375 in town bonds; assessed the drafted men in the sum of $10,595, with a further sum of $30,175, which the drafted men themselves paid, making their own bargains, and thus managed to fill the town quota of 219 men. The total cost of this draft is estimated at $164,500, or thereabout. On the last call, made after the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, 100 men were furnished at a cost of $60,000, but the town received from the State an amount sufficient to leave it a gainer of about $7000, that being the excess of the State money furnished for bounties.

The history of all the towns, during the war, shows how, as the needs of the contest slowly but surely increased, what had been left, at first, to individual patriotism, was gradually shifted, first on the towns, then on the county, finally on the State.[1]

The facts shown by the enormous expenditure, in contrast with the number of men actually sent to the front, are also very instructive as to the way in which the political disturbances that marked the county and a part of the Northern States during the war increased the cost and made the victory more difficult of achievement. The price of substitutes steadily rose as the election of 1864 approached, while the last draft, after the contest was settled, was effected without difficulty and left some of the towns actual gainers by the affair.

It is further worthy of remark, though this is outside of a local history, that the substitutes, obtained at a cost of from five to six hundred dollars a man, seldom went to the front at all, but remained at home, breeding that odious class of men denominated "bounty-jumpers," who drifted from regiment to regiment, and from broker to broker, till the figures of men enlisted into the United States service, on paper, must probably be diminished by at least one-third, if not one-half, to allow for the number of re-enlistments and desertions.

This part of the history of the county is one in which few of its citizens can take much pride, and, to explain it, we must go to such records as exist of the state of political feeling in the county, as shown by the columns of its political organs, already referred to.

A summary of the figures in the town of Cortlandt shows that it cost, to send out each man who was enlisted, as follows: In 1861, nothing; in 1862, $51.82 per man; in 1863, $120.70 per man, from the town, with a probable hundred more from each drafted man for a substitute; in 1864, an average of $519.60 per man, before election; and nothing for the last draft, in which the cost fell on the State, and the towns were gainers to the extent of about $70 per man enlisted.

The Return of the Volunteers.—From the moment that General Lee surrendered his army, at Appomattox Court-House, the thoughts of the volunteers in the field were turned, with a unanimity seldom seen in the history of war, towards the homes they had left so readily at the beginning of the contest, at the call of their country.

The impatience became so great, after the final collapse of the Rebellion, when Johnston and Kirby Smith had surrendered, that the men in the field could hardly be kept by the colors, for the necessary purposes of police; breaking out into open mutiny in some instances, when it was proposed to put them into the regular army; indignantly spurning the idea that they were professional soldiers at all; demand-

[1] The following table, taken from the reports of the supervisors of the county, made to the State Bureau of Military Statistics, shows the total amount of money paid out by the towns and the county itself, during the war, for war purposes.

The towns of Bedford, Cortlandt, East Chester, Greenburgh, Harrison, Lewisborough, Mamaroneck, Morrisania, Mount Pleasant, New Castle, New Rochelle, North Castle, North Salem, Ossining, Pelham, Poundridge, Rye, Scarsdale, Somers, Westchester, Yonkers and Yorktown paid out: For town bounties, $2,459,697.79; for fees and expenses, $26,462.94; for interest on loans, $199,658.67; for principal of loans, $764,585.30; for support of families of volunteers, $73,732.35; making total expended for war purposes, $3,524,137.05.

The county paid for the same items the sum of $1,347,235.76. The towns of West Farms and White Plains made no report and are not, therefore, included in the above summary.

The towns and county together thus expended, for war purposes, the total sum of $4,871,372.81, or very nearly five millions of dollars. Of this sum, the county and towns received from the State Paymaster General in cash, $172 450.00; in State bonds, $458,600.00; and for interest on State bonds, $4862.49; a total of $635,912.49; thus leaving the actual expense to the towns and county, $4,235,460.32.

The reports on which the above table is founded were made as follows: Bedford, January, 1868; Cortlandt, December, 1866; East Chester, October, 1866; Greenburgh, February, 1866; Harrison, December, 1865; Lewisborough, January, 1868; Mamaroneck, December, 1865; Morrisania, December, 1866; Mount Pleasant, February, 1868; Newcastle, July, 1865; New Rochelle, March, 1866; North Castle, March, 1866; North Salem, January, 1868; Ossining, December, 1865; Pelham, June, 1868; Poundridge, October, 1866; Rye, December, 1865; Scarsdale, June, 1866; Somers, October, 1866; Westchester, November, 1866; Yonkers, March, 1867; Yorktown, December, 1865; Westchester County, December, 1865.

ing, now that their work had been done, that they should be discharged and sent home as soon as possible.

The different regiments and organizations from Westchester County were in the same category with the rest, and their history, to the time they returned home, is revealed by the official records of the State.

COMPANY B, OF THE SEVENTEENTH REGIMENT, the banner company of the county, from Port Chester, served its term of two years, and was mustered out on the 3d of June, 1863; the recruits, enlisted for three years, after the company was in the field, being transferred to the Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteers. This regiment, being also a two years' organization, had already been mustered out; but the recruits for three years, with a part of the Twelfth New York Militia, with which it had been consolidated February 3, 1862, were formed into a battalion, which, in its turn, was mustered into the Fifth New York Veteran Volunteers on the 2d of June, 1864. The whole force remained in the service till finally mustered out August 21, 1865.

The next organization in rank is that part of the FOURTH NEW YORK CAVALRY recruited at Yonkers by Captain Parnell. On the expiration of the original term of service the regiment was mustered out, and the re-enlisted men, with the later recruits, consolidated with the Ninth New York Cavalry, February 27, 1865, under the name of Companies B, E and L, of that regiment; with which it remained to the close of the war, being mustered out July 17, 1865.

The FIFTH BATTERY LIGHT ARTILLERY, remarkable as being the only place where the name of a Mount Vernon man appears as having been an original member, was retained in the service till July 6, 1865, when it was also mustered out.

The FIRST REGIMENT MOUNTED RIFLES was consolidated with the Third New York Cavalry July 21, 1865, the whole force being known as the Fourth Provisional New York Cavalry. This regiment remained in the service till finally mustered out, on the 29th of November, 1865.

The SIXTH HEAVY ARTILLERY, being a three years' regiment, was mustered out June 25, 1865; but the re-enlisted veterans and the recruits whose terms were not yet out were formed into a battalion of four companies. The remaining members of the Tenth and Thirteenth Regiments of artillery, in the same condition, were added to the Sixth two days after; and the whole force remained in service till August 24, 1865, when they were finally mustered out.

The SIXTEENTH (SPRAGUE LIGHT) CAVALRY closes the history of the connection of the county with the war. This force was consolidated with the Thirteenth New York Cavalry June 23, 1865, the consolidated regiment being known as the Third Provisional New York Cavalry, under which name it was mustered out September 21, 1865.

THE ROLL OF THE DEAD.—I regret much that there is no reliable official record accessible of the names of men, bona fide residents of the different towns in the county, who enlisted therefrom and died in the service. In some towns the patriotism of the people in charge secured such a record; but even then the papers are, in too many cases, cast aside in a mass of rubbish, impossible of extrication.

The following names are given from the town of Cortlandt, on the authority of Post Abraham Vosburgh, of Peekskill, No. 95, Department of New York, G. A. R.

Harris Light Cavalry, Company F.

Sergeant Thomas McCutcheon, killed in action at Culpeper, Va., October, 1863; Private William Haines, killed in action at Brandy Station, on the same day, during the advance from Rappahannock Station; and Privates George Archer and Delancey Cole, died in hospital and in Belle Isle Prison, respectively. [None of these names are in the first muster-rolls of this regiment].

Sixth Heavy Artillery.

Colonel J. Howard Kitching, died of wounds received at Cedar Creek, October 19, 1864. The G. A. R. Post, at Yonkers, is named, after him, "Kitching Post, No. 60, Department of New York, G.A.R." Killed in action: Sergeant William H. Lent, Petersburg; Corporal Henry M. Gillett, Cedar Creek: Privates P. Corne Cruger, David A. Lent, Cedar Creek; William Fitzgerald, James Moriarty, Alexander Soper, James Christian, George Bradley—all at Petersburg; Frederick Young, Abram A. Wood, Washington Van Scoy and John Foley at Spottsylvania, May 19, 1864. Died in hospital: Corporal Theodore Garrison; Privates John Conklin, Frank Bleakley, John Henry Lent and Abraham Lent; Private John Terbush died at home from disease contracted in the army. First Lieutenant Richard Montgomery Gilleo, died at home, on sick leave; Private Charles Conklin was killed at Po River, Va., May 12, 1864.

Hawkins' Zouaves, Ninth New York Volunteers.

Color-Sergeant William Patterson, killed at Antietam with the colors, September 17, 1862. Died in hospital: Privates William Van Houten, Rosier Garrison, John Bennet, G. W. Wilcox, from wounds.

Nineteenth New York Volunteers.

Privates George Dykman, James Free and Jefferson Lent, died in the service.

Twenty-seventh New York Volunteers.

Privates Thomas Hawkins, killed in action; Jeremiah Murden, murdered in Elmira, in trying to arrest a deserter, June, 1861; (he was the first soldier said to be killed from the town of Cortlandt); Private Charles Gardner died in hospital.

Forty-fourth New York Volunteers (Ellsworth Avengers).

Private Thomas Wildey, Company A, killed at Hanover Court-House, Va.

Forty-eighth New York Volunteers.

Captain Lewis Lent, killed in action.

Fifty-first New York Volunteers.

Color-Sergeant George W. Fisher, killed with the colors at Petersburg, Va., July 29, 1864; Private James D. Odell, killed at Roanoke Island.

Fifty-ninth New York Volunteers.

Privates Edgar Sutton and Pierce Miller, killed at Antietam; John Fitch and Benjamin Gaudeer, died at Andersonville; George Fowler, died at Annapolis, after being paroled.

Seventieth New York Volunteers.

Joseph Davenport and James Cummings, died in hospital from wounds.

Ninety-first New York Volunteers.

William Stocker, died in hospital.

Ninety-fifth New York Volunteers.

Lieutenant Edwin B. Lent, died at home from wounds.

Miscellaneous.

C. A. Turner, 38th N. Y., wounded at Fredericksburg, died at home; Calvin Lounsbury, prisoner from 39th N. Y., never came back; Sergeant David Ferris, 144th N. Y., killed at Fair Oaks; Henry Forman, Company

C, 133d N. Y., died at Baton Rouge, in service; George Tice, Jesse Seymour, Isaac Brodie, 168th N.Y. died in service; Henry Halstead (colored), 30th N. Y., killed at Deep Bottom Va.; John W. Knapp (colored), Co. B, 29th Conn., died in service.

From the town of Yorktown there is a partial list, showing that of the Sixth Heavy Artillery, from that town, the following men fell:

George Guinea, Harvey L. Searles, Lewis M. Searles, Obadiah Oakley and T. J. Head, died in service; Peter Ames, 12th N. Y., was killed at Fair Oaks; Cyrus H. Brown (regiment unknown) was killed at Petersburg; George Powers and Eugene M. Wright, 59th N. Y.; John Jones, 4th N. Y. Art.; Joshua B. Young, 95th N. Y.; William and Elias Searles, 57th N. Y.; William Sheppard and William Sherwood, 87th N. Y., all died in service.

This is the most reliable list, that I have been able to obtain, of men who actually died in the service, excluding those who are marked as having "died since the war." Were there any sort of local pride, in the different towns in the county, regarding the action of its citizens during the war, the list could doubtless be extended far beyond the present limits; but the readers of this chapter will see for themselves, in the unfortunate differences that existed in the county, on account of the war, the reason why such records were poorly kept. Save by the families of those who actually went to the front, but little interest seems to have been taken by any one in the deeds of the Union armies, and the records were not kept, principally because the majority of the voters in the county did not elect officials who cared to perpetuate the services of the soldiers.

Since the close of the war there has been a movement, in the establishment of Grand Army Posts at different places, to collect these records in something of a reliable form. The graves of Union volunteers are decorated annually, but these do not represent, to any degree, men who went to the service from Westchester County, but rather those who have come to it since the war. Many of them are those of men who died after the close of the war, and so the records do not properly come in at this place.

It only remains to give a short list of a few of the men who were drafted and furnished substitutes for this chapter to be finished.

THE DRAFTED MEN.—The records of the draft in West Chester County, as far as regards the names of the men drafted, are generally missing, though the bonds necessary to save them from going to the front remained, to be finally extinguished, in 1881. In the town of East Chester, however, I have succeeded in securing a copy of the names of the men drafted, and the prices paid for substitutes, which makes very interesting reading at the present day.

It embraces the calls for July, 1864, and the last call in December of the same year. Mr. Stephen Bogart was supervisor for the year, and his name appears among the list of the drafted men. The numbers drawn by the provost marshal appear to have been taken at random over the county, for they are not continuous. The first man caught in East Chester is No. 964. William M. Harward, while the highest number is 3241. There were two hundred and thirteen men drawn in the town, altogether. Some took the commutation of three hundred dollars, allowed by the State, and furnished their own substitutes, in the best way they knew how. Others furnished the substitutes at a definite cost; but the greater part let the town military committee do all the work, through the bounty brokers, who settled the whole business.

Of the whole two hundred and thirteen, only two entered the service, taking the bounty money themselves.

Their names will be found in the list.

The following men were paid the commutation of three hundred dollars, under the Conscription Act, and made their own bargains with substitutes, at their own risk:

William Holdredge, James Cordial, William Searing, Charles Kane, John L. Brown, Ferdinand Holm, Michel Donohue, Jacob Grubb, Jacob Reinhardt, Christian Geissman, Patrick Scott, John Mullaly, Samuel B. Lyons, John Muller, Otto Weigand, John Hinz, Charles Bock, Stephen Bogart, Thomas McConnel, John Stinard, William Gordon, George Robinson, William Hagemeyer, Theodore Holly, Daniel Kane, Samuel Bertine, Ferdinand Haag, William Doolittle, William Tribent, Cornell Valentine, John Kennedy, Abram M. Bennett, Philip Haag, James Hunt, Christian Rost, William Mulloy, Jacob Hyser, George Horst, Thomas Dooling, Thomas Donaldson, Francis Schleicher, Philip Flood, William Hickey, William B. Jones, William Deverman, Walter H. Manning, John Pugmire, Thomas Barker, Frederick Von Garrell, Thomas Hunt and Louis Behr.

The following men furnished their own substitutes, at a cost of four hundred dollars:

Charles Leland, Aaron R. Haight, Isaac Richards, A. M. Hungerford, George Ferris, Samuel Horton, Robert Hall, Gideon Mead, Warren Ackerman, Timothy Bennett, Samuel Burpo, W. H. Hustis, Constantine Weiss, Edgar Schiefflein, John Boda, Alexander Masterton, Henry A. Bowerman, James Hay, Aaron M. Diederer, John M. Masterton, B. F. Bowerman, S. Purdy Carton, David Dunham, Robert M. Masterton, S. Moore, George King, Thomas W. Atkinson, Edward Kendrick, John Ostrander, O. L. Underhill.

The following men had substitutes furnished by the town at an expense of four hundred and twenty dollars:

William M. Harward, Frederick Knolting, John T. Underhill, Samuel Trelese, Henry Hargrave, John Casey, Frederick Sargent, Henry Lins, John W. Coburn, John S. Yorke, M. B. Valentine, Christopher Wintler, John W. Combs, Edward Hoole, John A. Bowerman.

At a cost of four hundred and twenty-five dollars:

John Duffy, William Preston, James Joy, August Donges.

At a cost of four hundred and ten dollars:

Patrick Garvin, Andrew Kapp, James Waddock, Andrew Clark.

At a cost of four hundred dollars:

Timothy Rain, Lawrence Daniels, Nicholas Bowden, Sanford Fleming, Henry Grant.

At a cost of four hundred and forty-five dollars:

Carl Moser, E. A. Phelps.

At a cost of four hundred and fifty dollars:

William Traband, Bernard Hufnagel, Lawrence Clemens, William E. Howe, William Purcells, Charles V. Morgan, Frederick Boda, John King, G. W. L. Underhill, Isaac Secor, Joseph D. Disbrow, Samuel B. Wiley, Stephen Higgins.

At a cost of four hundred and seventy dollars:

Josiah Zabriskie, William H. Oakley.

At a cost of four hundred and seventy-five dollars:

James Murray, William P. Sleight.

At a cost of four hundred and ninety-five dollars:

John Donlin, Lawrence Horton.

At a cost of five hundred dollars:

Walter B. Comstock, Isaac Weeks, John Coyle, Henry Linderman, John Mulloy, William Rickert, Theodore Horr, John Farley, James Crottey, Henry Lehman, Michael Jackson, Lewis Gale, George P. Sinn, Anthony Beebe.

At a cost of five hundred and twenty dollars:

Tillman Holly, John Knapp

At a cost of five hundred and ninety dollars:

Charles Lamar, Ernest Erbert, William Murphy, Jacob Putney, John Williams, David Jones, Joaquin Jones, Charles E. Manning, William Brown, George Francis, Patrick McNulty, John Starr, John P. Minnich, Edward Dill, Thomas Davis, John A. Hutchinson, Hugh Callahan, Philip H. Harsinger, Henry Hamill, Carey P. Poplin, John Rigby, Tobias Akers, John Jolly, Charles Stewart, Michael Fanning, Timothy G. Lumb, George W. Dullion, John West, John Smith, Frederick Kline, James Cameron, Lorenzo Covaglio, Wolsley Baxter, Theodore Handy, David Bowen, James Hughes, James Fisher, John Nichols, Morris Earle.

At a cost of seven hundred and fifty dollars:

John F. Jarvis, Joseph Harper, Amos Cheney, Tim. Crowley, Charles Helwig.

At a cost of eight hundred dollars:

Francis Seber, Sanford Hallock, John G. Satterlee, Michael Quinlan, Charles Weeks, William H. Duff, George H. Archer, Joseph S. Gregory, Darius Lyon, Joseph Harper (second call), Oliver R. King, D. Lamoureaux, Henry Skidmore, S. G. Vredenburg, David Quackinbush, Christian Stark.

At a cost of eight hundred and twenty dollars:

Michael McCormick.

The following men were drafted and entered the service, receiving the sums set opposite their names:

Edward Barnum, $450.00; Christian Knapp, $310.00.

The only item in the account that is perplexing is one which states that "one recruit" was furnished under the second call for five hundred and ninety dollars, this being, probably, at a time when the draft was nearly over and matters carelessly managed.

THE GRAND ARMY POSTS.—This chapter would, by many, be judged to have been properly completed with the disbandment of the soldiers and the payment of the debts accruing from the Civil War, but the publishers of this history have considered that the real history of the contest in Westchester County can never be said to be finished till that of the "Grand Army of the Republic," within its borders, be also told.

That the writer of the preceding pages should have been requested to add thereto on account of the organization of the Grand Army in the county seems both natural and proper, and he undertakes the task with willingness, inasmuch as there is a great deal of misapprehension, among the people at large, as to the object and scope of action of the body of veterans which exists under that name. A brief sketch of the order itself, and of the connection of this county therewith, will prove of interest to all patriotic citizens, of whatever faith in politics.

The first "post" of the order was formed in one of the Western States, in the year after the close of the war, but it was not till the year 1867 that the idea was developed into a harmonious whole, with a regular system of military discipline, and the different units of "post," "department" and "national" headquarters. In its hierarchy, the familiar routine of military life was followed, as far as possible, with features common to secret social and benevolent societies, following the father of all such bodies—Freemasonry.

At the beginning of the organization of the order there was a great deal more of this similarity than now prevails, the initiation being of a solemn character, calculated to try the nerves of the recruits; the forms of Masonry being imitated by the institution of the successive degrees of "recruit," "soldier" and "veteran"—so called. These degrees were abolished by the National Encampment, a few years after the first formation of the order, and the rules have been simplified in regard to initiations and other points of ritual, till the Grand Army of the Republic can hardly be said to be in any sense a "secret" society, any more than an army in the field, in which the countersign for passing a sentry at night is the only thing not patent to all the world.

The objects of the order, set forth in the rules and regulations (Chap. 1, Art. 11) are as follows:

"1. To preserve and strengthen those kind and fraternal feelings which bind together the soldiers, sailors and marines who united to suppress the late Rebellion, and to perpetuate the memory and history of the dead.

"2. To assist such former comrades in arms as need help and protection, and to extend needful aid to the widows and orphans of those who have fallen.

"3. To maintain true allegiance to the United States of America, based upon a paramount respect for, and fidelity to, the National Government and laws; to discountenance whatever tends to weaken loyalty, incites to insurrection, treason or rebellion, or in any manner impairs the efficiency of our free institutions; and to encourage the spread of universal liberty, equal rights and justice to all men."

The persons eligible to membership are all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors and marines, "who served between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865," and the members of State regiments that were mustered into United States service between those dates, and became "subject to the orders of United States general officers." No person who has at any time, even under compulsion, borne arms against the United States can be admitted to membership, even though otherwise eligible.

The last roster of New York (1885) shows a total of five hundred and forty-one posts in the State, with an average of fifty members or over. Of these, the county of Westchester counts as her own the following: Post Kitching, No. 60, of Yonkers; Post Vosburgh, No. 95, of Peekskill; Post Powell, No. 117, of Sing Sing; Post McKeel, No. 120, of Katonah; Post Morell, No. 144, of Sing Sing; Post Stewart Hart,

No. 169, of Mount Kisco; Post Farnsworth, No. 170, of Mount Vernon; Post H. B. Hidden, No. 330, of City Island; Post Charles Lawrence, No. 378, of Port Chester; Post Cromwell, No. 466, of White Plains; Post W. B. Burnett, No. 496, of Tarrytown, and Post Horatio Seymour, No. 590, of Yonkers, making a total of twelve posts at the present writing. The Tarrytown post was lately organized, to replace an older post (Acker, No. 182) which had given up its charter to the Department Encampment, owing to the lack of interest manifested by the citizens of the place; but reorganized with its present name and number, under the energetic management of a veteran who had formerly commanded the Peekskill post, but had moved to Tarrytown, after his term of office in Peekskill had expired. Horatio Seymour Post is an off-shoot of Kitching, No. 60.

Without further delay we append the rosters of the posts, in numerical order.

Kitching Post, No. 60, of Yonkers.—This post was chartered January 7, 1868, but the name of the mustering officer failed to be recorded on the minute-book of the post. The charter members were:

E. Y. Morris, S. C. Van Tassel, James Stewart, Patrick Kelly, G. W. Farnum, A. H. Tompkins, E. C. Nodine, James Carter, George Hendrickson, William Reilley and D. S. Munn.

The Post Commanders to date have been as follows: E. Y. Morris, for 1868 and 1869; D S. Munn, 1870; John Kuester, 1871 and 1872; William Reilley, 1873 and 1874; James Cadis, 1875 and 1876; Henry Osterheld, 1877, 1878 and 1879; John C. Schotts, 1880; F. A. Curran, 1881; James V. Lawrence, 1882; S. C. Van Tassel, 1883; G. B. Balch, 1884; James Sheridan, 1885.

The officers for 1886 are: Commander, James Sheridan; S. V. C., A. Kipp; J. V. C., James Taylor; Surgeon, George Lockwood; Chaplain, Wm. H. Yerkes; Officer of the Day, John Rice; Officer of the Guard, Oscar T. Barker; Adjutant, C. D. Betts; Q. M., Henry Ferguson; Q. M. S., Joseph Irving.

The following is a complete list of all members of the post, from its organization to the year 1885, with the military history of each man in brief. The term of service, where not otherwise stated, is "three years, or during the war." Names marked with a star (*) are those of members who have died since the formation of the post. Names marked with a dagger (†) are those of wounded men or pensioners. The descriptive book of Kitching Post is not as full on the subject of wounded men as it should be, and there are many men in the post who have suffered wounds, not recorded in the list furnished by the adjutant. Where no rank is given "private" is meant.

Cromwell Post, No. 466, of White Plains.—This post was organized March 19, 1884, by Comrade James H. Jenkins, of Farnsworth Post.

The charter members were Valentine M. Hodgson, Edward B. Long, John C. Verplanck, George W. Brown, Edward W. Bogart, Henry I. Williams, Berlin K. Palmer, David P. Barnes, George W. Coventry, James S. Snedeker, Richard Roach, Charles Whiston and George Lewis.

Valentine M. Hodgson was Commander for 1884, and the officers for 1885 were Commander, Edward B. Long; S. V. C., Crawford N. Smith; J. V. C., George W. Coventry; Surgeon, David P. Barness; Chaplain, David W. Bogart; Officer of Day, George W. Brown; Officer of Guard, Henry J. Williams; Adjutant, Edward W. Bogart; Q. M., Berlin H. Palmer; Q. M. S., James McCarty.

The following is a list of the members, with their military history in brief:

Valentine M. Hodgson, first lieutenant, 67th N. Y.; Edward B. Long, 1st N. J.; John C. Verplanck, musician, 32d N. Y.; George W Brown, 53d Ky.; James S. Snedeker, landsman, gunboat "Hybiscus;" Berlin H. Palmer, 51st N. Y.; Edward W. Bogart, 95th N. Y.; David P. Barnes, first sergeant, 6th N. Y. H. Art.; R. Roach and H. I. Williams, 6th N. Y. H. Art.; George W. Coventry, 40th N. Y.; Charles B. Whiston, 27th N. Y.; Robinson W. Smith, 76th N. Y.; Sidney Martine, 32d N. Y.; James H. Budway, 38th N. Y.; Daniel W. Flandrow, 95th N. Y.; Daniel W. Bogart, drummer, 95th N. Y.; James A. McCarty, 4th N. Y.; George H. Morse, 29th Mass.; Oscar Stephens, 5th N. Y.; Crawford N. Smith, 3d U. S. Inf.; Thomas Rush, 164th N. Y.; Henry A. Maynard, 21st N. Y.; John Lowry, 3d Regt. Prov. N. Y. Cav.; John Simmons, 49th N.Y.; Alexander Jones, 128th N. Y.; Benjamin S. Dick, 22d N. Y. S. M.; Mervin Sniffin, 6th N. Y. H. Art.; J. O. Spencer, yeoman, U. S. S., "Katahdin;" Stanley F. Newell, 37th N. Y.

Ward B. Burnett Post, No. 496, of Tarrytown.—This post was organized July 1, 1884, W. C. Reddy, of Post Rice, New York City, being the mustering officer.

Charles N. McCutchen, late of Vosburgh Post, Peekskill, was the organizer and first Commander of this post for 1884, and was succeeded by C. J. Carpenter, who is the present Commander.

The charter members were:

Richard B. Coutant, Charles N. McCutchen, Henry White, J. C. Jones, Louis Helwig, Thomas Arthur, Charles Humphreys, Joseph S. M. Slagle, J. J. Linson, Alexander Hamilton, Jacob Van Tassell, Harry J. Parnell, C. T. Carpenter, E. T. Yocom, Thomas Rawcliffe, William Covert, Bishop Armstrong, William C. Cushing, Jacob Wood, Henry Humphreys, George B. Cypher and James D. See.

Since organization of the post the following members have been mustered in: Thomas Birdsall, Thomas Taxter, Sylvester Gesner, B. Frank Davis and Elias Bryant.

The list sent by the Commander of the post did not give the regiments of the members in full.

B. F. Davis and C. J. Carpenter belonged to the Seventh and Eighth Regiments of New York Militia, respectively, and served for three and six months.

The post, in succeeding one that had succumbed, after a struggle of several years, has probably but a short existence before it.

Of the charter members several seem to have joined by transfer from other posts.

C. Theodore Carpenter, Commander; Edward S. Yocom, Senior Vice-commander; Thomas Rawcliff, Junior Vice-Commander; William E. Cushing, Adjutant; Bishop Armstrong, Quartermaster; Thomas Birdsall, Chaplain; Jacob W. Wood, Officer of Day; Henry Humphrey, Officer of Guard.

Horatio Seymour Post, No. 590, of Yonkers.—This post was mustered in at Yonkers on Tuesday, June 29, 1886, by Comrade John C. Shotts, of Kitching Post, with the following membership:

Commander: Frederic Shonnard, major, 6th N. Y. H. A.; Senior Vice-Commander: Fisher A. Baker, lieutenant-colonel, 18th Mass. Vol.; Junior Vice-Commander: Edward J. Maxwell, first lieutenant, 63d N. Y. Vol.; Surgeon: Dr. Galusha B. Balch, assistant surgeon, 2d N. Y. Vet. Cav.; Chaplain: John Forsyth; Officer of the Day: James V. Lawrence; brevet-major, Gen. Staff; Officer of the Guard: Augustus W. Nichol; Quartermaster: William Welsh, captain, 68th N. Y. Vol. (by proxy of Comrade Matt. Ellis, formerly of Kitching Post); Adjutant: James F. Farrell, captain, 5th N. Y. Art.; Sergeant-Major: George W. Farnum, corporal, 23d Conn. Vol.; Quartermaster-Sergeant: Thos. Ewing, brevet major general, Army of the Frontier.

CHAPTER X.

WESTCHESTER COUNTY AT THE PRESENT DAY.

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, A.M., LL.D.

One has but to glance at any good map of New York City to realize what must with almost absolute certainty be the rare good fortune of Westchester County. The great metropolis has already stretched its briarean arms in all directions from its northern limits, and its geographical necessities compel it to spread outward like a fan over the surface of Westchester County. Its present corporate shape may be compared to the Cleopatra's needle, which now forms one of its notable monuments. The city is, in fact, a rude obelisk, with its base on the boundary line of Yonkers and its apex at the Battery. The general uniformity of the outline is preserved on the one side by the East River and on the other side, and much more regularly, by the Hudson. These great water highways necessarily interpose a formidable obstacle to the spread of population in either direction, and although the introduction of steam ferriage and the construction of the Brooklyn bridge have modified the inconveniences of transit across broad rivers, the general trend of population continues to the northward. Elevated railroads and the development of transportation facilities have brought all portions of the county within easy reach, and New York is steadily absorbing the outlying territory. Morrisania and Fordham have already been appropriated, and, with the accelerated ratio of increasing population, the day is probably not far distant when almost the entire county will have become little more than a suburb of New York.

A writer of twenty years ago,[1] speaking of the contemplated improvements beyond the then northern boundaries of the city, says: "Assuredly this region will be the site of the future magnificence of this metropolis. During the coming five or ten years the Fifth Avenue will no doubt be soonest built up, and built up grandly, but the city will not stop on that account; it will be succeeded by an age of imperial magnificence. That will be the day for the now neglected west side of the island. The poetical prophecy, and which is fast becoming historical truth, will receive another illustration." Much of this prediction has already been realized and a comparatively brief period in the future may be expected to work a wonderful transformation in the physiognomy of those portions of Westchester County which as yet have not assumed the distinctively urban character.

'Westward the star of empire takes its way,'

While the people of Westchester may felicitate themselves on the added prosperity and increase in values of property which the change will involve, they will have to deplore the inevitable loss in picturesqueness, beauty and variety of interest which the county now presents to the eye in such eminent degree. Cities are ruthless destroyers of rural scenery. They fill up the bosky dells, demolish the picturesque crag and towering hill, mow down the lordly giants of the forest and annihilate the general aspect of rural loveliness and peace. The least sentimental of landowners must regret the inflow of urban population, when, as in Westchester, it involves the destruction of as lovely bits of landscape as the eye of man ever rested on. Traversed by picturesque ridges and romantic streams, with the blue expanse of Long Island Sound on the one side and the lordly Hudson on the other, the county is exceptionally favored by nature, and there is no strip of territory of equal extent in the whole country which combines in the same degree advantages of location and beauty of surface with the artificial adornments wrought in the lapse of many generations by intelligent direction and skill.

While the bolder beauties of the Hudson are not comprised within its limits, its territory adjacent to the borders of that classic stream has long been a favorite theme for song and story. Cooper, Paulding and Irving have drawn a rich store of literary material from within its confines, and the bold, original genius of Poe found much of its inspiration while the poet was roaming along the banks of the river or gazing from the windows of his little cottage at Fordham.

The development along the shore of the Hudson is a striking indication of what may be anticipated for the whole of Westchester County. "The whole region of country bordering the Hudson River, north of Spuyten Duyvel," says a writer,[2] "was, until within a very recent period, occupied by isolated residences and grand estates, some of them embracing several thousand acres. Notable examples were the Philipse and Livingston Manors, the titles to which came directly from the crown. Gradually these extensive tracts were sub-divided, leaving still, however, large areas in the possession of single individuals. Many of these smaller estates have undergone a process of improvement and embellishment, until the lordly mansions on the Hudson have become famed on both sides of the Atlantic for their beauty and picturesque surroundings. . . . Art has done its share to add to the charms of the landscape. Here are the residences of many leading New Yorkers,—elegant, comfortable homes, surrounded with tastefully ornamented grounds, and presenting all the evidences of that domestic enjoyment which is, after all, the sun of human happiness."

Following the course of the Hudson within the boundaries of Westchester County, we pass in succession through many noted localities. The first point of interest is High Bridge, now within the corporate limits of New York, which carries the waters of the Croton Reservoir across the valley of the Harlem River at an elevation of one hundred feet, and is one of the noted engineering triumphs of the world.

The hamlet of King's Bridge is charmingly located in a beautiful valley, near the point where the Harlem flows into the Hudson. High, rolling hills encompass it, on the crests of which are fortifications and fine growths of timber. The locality was first selected by the Dutch as the site of their projected city, New Amsterdam, but afterwards abandoned.

After leaving King's Bridge we approach the city of Yonkers, the largest town in the county, pausing by the way to take a glance at Fort Washington and the Spuyten Duyvel. From Manhattanville to Fort Washington, two miles below Spuyten Duyvel, the shore line presents a fine range of heights, once handsomely wooded. The mounds of the old fort mark a spot which was famous in Revolutionary annals. The loss of this important post, followed, as it was, shortly afterward by the fall of Fort Lee, on the opposite bank of the Hudson, was a disastrous blow to the American cause and spread consternation and gloom throughout the colonies. Washington Heights, which crown the ridge near the site of Fort Washington, are the site of many fine residences.

The Spuyten Duyvel, it is said, derives its name from a legendary anecdote narrated by Washington Irving, who ascribes the performance from which it arose to Anthony Van Corlaer, trumpeter to the doughty Governor Stuyvesant. The original legend asserts that a valiant Dutchman, obstinately bent on crossing the stream in a storm, attempted to swim across "en spyt den duyvel" (in spite of the devil), but midway sank and was seen no more.

Westchester County proper begins at the Spuyten Duyvel. The scenery in the immediate vicinity is very fine. At Riverdale Station, on the Hudson River Railroad (the first station beyond the Spuyten Duyvel), a splendid view is had of the Hudson, with the villas clustered along the eastern bank and the Palisades showing their perpendicular fronts against the swelling outlines of the Ramapo Range. The city of Yonkers is seen in the distance, and near at hand are the convent of Mount St. Vincent and the castle-like mansion (belonging to the convent) which was formerly the property of Edwin Forrest, the tragedian.

The scenery in the immediate neighborhood is made up of undulating hills, sloping gently to the river's range, with innumerable mansions and cottages embowered in trees. The settlement of Riverdale is unique in its way, being a group of handsome residences, the effect of which is unbroken by meaner dwellings or business houses.

VIEW OF FORT WASHINGTON, 1886.[1]

The approach to the city of Yonkers is extremely interesting and picturesque. Handsome knolls and ranges of hills line the edge of the valley, and, on a fine eminence, is the large stone mansion of the Van Cortlandts, the road to which lies through the wooded range known as "Cortlandt's Ridge." It passes over a deep ravine, through which flows a sparkling brook, and is lined by masses of jagged rock. In front of the mansion a handsome view is obtained of the valley of Yonkers, and at the foot of the hill flows Tippet's Brook. On the west side of the ridge is a charming view of the Hudson River, the Palisades and adjacent hills. The ancient residence of the Cortlandt family stands in the valley below, about a mile from King's Bridge. A portion of the estate has been laid out as a park.

Yonkers, seventeen miles from the City Hall of New York, is doubly interesting from its historical associations and its size and importance as the principal town in the county. As the seat of the Philipse

[1] From "Hudson River Illustrated." Copyright, 1875. By D. Appleton & Co.

Manor it was formerly known as Philipsburgh. The old Philipse manor-house is one of the landmarks on the river. In the immediate vicinity are many palatial residences, including "Greystone," the residence of Hon. Samuel J. Tilden. For many years Yonkers was an easy-going Dutch village, but after the opening of the Hudson River Railroad it sprang into sudden life and activity and soon became a flourishing suburb of the metropolis. It is now one of the handsomest cities in the country.

Hastings, the first village above Yonkers, is the spot where Cornwallis, after the fall of Fort Washington, crossed the river to attack Fort Lee. About a mile further on is Dobbs Ferry, near which was fought the battle of White Plains in October, 1776. The Livingston manor-house, near by, was the headquarters of Washington and also the spot where the conference was held in 1783, between George Clinton and Sir Guy Carleton, the British commander, with reference to the evacuation of New York City. At Dobbs Ferry the Hudson widens into a bay which is known as the Tappan Zee.

Irvington, in the immediate vicinity of Dobbs Ferry, derives its name from Washington Irving, whose former residence, "Sunnyside," is one of the chief points of retreat on the river. It stands near the river, embowered in a dense growth of shrubbery. It is of stone, with many gables, the eastern side being clothed with ivy from slips presented to Irving by Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford. The original structure was the "Woolfert's Roost," which gives its title to one of Irving's sketches. On the opposite bank is Tappan, memorable as the scene of the massacre of Baylor's regiment by the British under General Grey, and from the fact that about a mile from the town Major Andre, the victim of Arnold's treachery, was executed and buried.

Tarrytown, about a mile beyond Tappan and on the eastern side of the river, was the scene of Andre's capture. Here was erected a monument in honor of Van Wart, who was one of the three American militiamen who seized the unfortunate young officer. Here also is the famous old Dutch Church, heavy with the marks of more than two centuries, and Sleepy Hollow, described by Irving in his well-known legend narrating the luckless courtship of Ichabod Crane. The neighborhood is rich in interesting associations growing out of the residence here for many years of Washington Irving and members of his household; and the romantic beauty of the surroundings fully fortifies the deep and strong affection which Irving contracted for his riverside cottage and the adjacent neighborhood. Tarrytown is now a charming suburban locality, its hills affording handsome sites for many beautiful villas surrounded by well-kept gardens and lawns. Nearly opposite Tarrytown the Palisades form a lofty cliff, near the shore, called Point-no-Point, and the scenery on both banks of the river in the immediate neighborhood is indescribably beautiful.

Sing Sing, noted as the site of one of the State Prisons, is the next town on the eastern bank of the river. The surrounding scenery is picturesque. About a mile to the east of the town are the Chappaqua Springs. On the west side of the river are Grassy Point and Stony Point, with Forts Clinton and Montgomery, both noted strongholds in the Revolutionary War. About two miles above Sing Sing is the source of the Croton River, which furnishes the water supply for New York City. It is conveyed by an aqueduct forty miles long, with sixteen tunnels and forty-four bridges. Croton Point, four miles above Sing Sing, is a tongue of land projecting into the river and covered with vineyards and orchards. It separates Tappan Zee from Haverstraw Bay. At its extremity a noble view of the river is obtained. Some distance below is Point-no-Point and in the opposite direction the Highlands loom into view. The upper end of Haverstraw Bay is marked by Stony Point on the west and Verplanck's Point on the east. Verplanck's Point was also the site of a fort in the Revolutionary period. The view from this spot is exceedingly beautiful, commanding the passage through the Highlands at West Point. Nearly opposite is Gibraltar or Caldwell's Landing, which marks the commencement of the Highlands.

> "By wooded bluff we steal, by leaning lawn;
> By palace, village, cot, a sweet surprise
> At every turn the vision breaks upon;
> Till to our wondering and uplifted eyes
> The highland rocks and hills in solemn grandeur rise."

It was here that the search was made many years ago for sunken treasure supposed to have been deposited by the noted buccaneer and freebooter, Captain Kidd.

Beyond Verplanck's Point, on the east bank, is Peekskill, forty-three miles from New York. It stands upon a broad bay, at the mouth of a creek, and looks out upon the Dunderberg or Thunder Mountain. It is historically noted as the place where Edward Palmer, a British spy, was executed by order of General Putnam. He was hanged from a tree on the village green. The beautiful Highlands rise in their lovely majesty to the northward and westward of the town, and the river, pent up into a narrow channel between their flinty jaws, rushes onward in impetuous course only to spread out again in the beautiful, placid bay of Haverstraw. There is no grander river scenery in the world than at this portion of the Hudson. Writing of the Highlands, Dr. Mitchell says,—"This solid barrier of rock, which is sixteen miles wide and extends along both sides of the Hudson to the distance of twenty miles, in ancient days seems to have impeded the course of the water and to have raised a lake high enough to cover all the country to Quaker Hill and the Taghkanic Mountains on the east, and to Shawangunk and the Catskills on the west, extending to the Little Falls of the Mohawk, and to the Hadley Falls of the Hudson, but by some convulsion of nature the mountain chain had been broken, and thus the rushing waters found their way to the now New York Bay."

Near Peekskill the territory of Westchester terminates at the boundary line which separates it from Putnam County. It would be impossible to depict in language the manifold beauties and advantages of its Hudson River front, already lined with beautiful homes and destined to become, no doubt, in course of time, one of the most densely populated localities in all the world. For nearly fifty miles it presents an unbroken succession of picturesque building sites with charming prospects of hill and river scenery, thought by many to be unrivaled in any quarter of the globe.

On the other side of the county, skirting Long Island Sound, a widely different panorama is presented, but one which also has individual charms and beauties of its own. The shore line is broken into many promontories or peninsulas and the general effect is remarkably diversified and beautiful. Westchester, the township contiguous to New York City on the east, presents a rolling surface, with fine grass and pasture lands, which are abundantly watered by small streams and springs. The Bronx River, flowing through the middle of the township, is the principal stream, and along its banks are many beautiful localities. The general appearance of the valley is most romantic. East of "Bronxdale" is a low tract of land known as "Bear Swamp," which derives its name from the savage animal that formerly made its home in the morass. Throckmorton's Neck, between Westchester Creek and Pelham Bay, is the site of many handsome residences which command noble views of Long Island Sound. At its extremity stands Fort Schuyler, one of the defenses of New York City from approach by way of the Sound. Here the tides from opposite directions meet in the Sound. Opposite City Island, on the northeast side of the point, are the well-known Stepping-Stones, a line of rocks projecting from the Long Island shore, which become visible at low water. On the highest of them stands the light-house known as "Stepping-Stone Light." On the northeast side of the point lies Locust Island, and on the south are many handsome residences lining the western shore of the East River, including the old Livingston place, noted for its beautiful cedar of Lebanon, said to be the finest in the United States. It is fifty feet in height and its branches extend for a distance of fifty feet. On the road from the Point to Westchester village are many beautiful residences. On the eastern side of Westchester Creek, in Castle Hill Neck, stands the old Wilkins mansion, now a farm-house, in which it is said three Loyalist clergymen, including Dr. Seabury, (afterwards bishop of Connecticut), were secreted during the Revolution.

Cornell's Neck, in the southwest corner of the town, between the Bronx River and Pugsley's Creek, commands some beautiful views of East River and the adjacent islands. The noted property known as "De Lancey's Mill" is located about three miles from the mouth of the Bronx and opposite the village of West Farms. The township of the latter name—formerly part of the borough of Westchester and now incorporated with the city of New York—contains many beautiful sites, among them being the former residence of the poet, Joseph Rodman Drake, on Hunt's Point, near its extremity, overlooking the East River and Flushing Bay. Near the entrance of Jefferd's Neck is Rose Bank, the beautiful estate of William H. Leggett, on the bank of the East River, which here has the appearance of a lake. In front of the house a view is had of Riker's Island, the Two Brothers, the entrance to Hell Gate, with New York City in the distance. The ancient Manor of Morrisania, also at one time a part of Westchester County, is now a district of New York City. It was originally a favorite resort of the Indians, as is shown by the numerous remains discovered in mounds, etc., and remained but sparsely settled for years. In 1848, however, it began to yield to the encroachment of the city's population, and, in course of time, a flourishing town was built up. It now forms the thickly-populated Twenty-third Ward of New York City. Mott Haven, which occupied part of the ancient tract of Morrisania, is the seat of an extensive iron foundry established by Jordan L. Mott. Adjoining it is the Harlem Bridge, affording communication with the city proper. In the vicinity of the bridge is the terminus of the New Haven and Hudson River Railroad, with a large depot and dock. On an elevation northeast of the depot stands the manor-house of what at one time was known as "Old Morrisania," with the ancient vault of the Morris family. On the east side of the Mill Brook, at the southwest angle of the old township of Morrisania, stands the country-seat of the noted statesman, Gouverneur Morris. It is eight miles from New York City and nearly opposite Hell Gate, commanding a noble view of the surrounding country and the river. The Mill Brook Valley passes near the old mansion to its junction with the Harlem Kills. It was the scene, during the Revolution, of many daring exploits of Enoch Crosby, the noted spy. About two miles from Harlem Bridge, near the banks of the stream, in the neighborhood of Tremont, lived the celebrated Charlotte Temple.

East of the brook and nearly opposite North and South Brother Islands, East River, lies Port Morris, said to be "unsurpassed for the anchorage of large vessels by any port in the world." At one of the docks here the famous "Great Eastern" rode in safety. Just above Port Morris, opposite Riker's Island, there is an admirable site for a navy-yard, with the means at hand for constructing a fresh-water basin to be supplied by the Bronx, in which large fleets could be floated. The natural advantages of the locality as a shipping and terminal point are indeed exceptionally fine, and must be greatly enhanced by the completion of the Hell Gate improvement.

The town of Pelham, adjoining Westchester on the east, presents a singular variety of outline, due to the incorporation within its boundaries of Hunter's and City Islands, which cause it to project far out into Long Island Sound. It is historically noted as the scene of the murder of the famous zealot, Anne Hutchinson, who, fleeing from the stern Puritans of Massachusetts, settled either on Pelham Neck or in the immediate vicinity. Pelham Neck is now the site of many handsome residences, chief among which for its historical interest is the Bowne dwelling, which stands on the spot once occupied by the manor-house of Thomas Pell, first lord of the Manor of Pelham, from which the township derives its name. A fine view of City Island and the Sound and Pelham Bay is to be obtained from this locality. City Island is so named from the hopes of the early settlers, inspired by its great advantages of location, that it would one day become the site of a great commercial city. It is a beautiful spot, but its only important industry is a large dock-yard, at which a number of noted yachts have been built. To the eastward lies Hart Island, the site of a city hospital and work-house. Hunter's Island is connected with the main land by a stone causeway and bridge. From the mansion, about the middle of the island, a noble view is afforded.

New Rochelle, the next township, possesses a double interest on account of its natural beauties and interesting historical associations as the site of the ancient Huguenot settlement. In its immediate vicinity the waters of the Sound are dotted with numerous islands, and in the distance the shores of Long Island present a smiling landscape, varied by cosy villages and prosperous looking farm-houses. Nearly opposite the town of New Rochelle is a promontory extending into the entrance to Hempstead Bay, which is known as Kidd's Point, from the popular supposition that Captain Kidd, the pirate, buried some of his ill-gotten treasure there. The lands of this portion of the county, as a rule, are level and stony, but the soil is productive and there are handsome growths of timber on the unimproved tracts.

Mamaroneck, adjoining New Rochelle on the east, was a favorite resort of the Indians, who are supposed to have been attracted by the remarkable beauty of the scenery. The Mamaroneck River, which forms the eastern boundary of the town, is a romantic stream, winding through a picturesque and fertile country and forming some charming valleys. The general surface of the township is broken by hills and the scenery is often wild and impressive. The town is well watered by streams and, altogether, presents unusual attractions as a place of residence.

Rye, the last of the townships that front on the Sound, has the general characteristics of this portion of the country strongly defined. The surface of the shore is broken and rocky, while the interior comprises fertile ridges and plains. Along the water-front are a number of islands, chief among which is Manussing, on which the first settlements were made.

The interior townships of Westchester County are North Salem, Lewisboro, Poundridge, Bedford, North Castle and Harrison in the northern portion; White Plains, Scarsdale and East Chester (with a small water front at the head of Pelham Bay) in the eastern portion, New Castle west of the centre, and Yorktown, Somers and North Salem in the western portion. Those fronting on the Hudson, beginning at New York City and traveling westward, are Yonkers, Greenburgh, Mount Pleasant, Ossining and Cortlandt. The entire face of the county is well watered by a number of streams and lakes and is remarkable for the picturesqueness of its scenery in almost every part. It may be said to consist, roughly speaking, of several ridges of hills parallel to the Hudson River, and separated by valleys. These hills constitute two general ranges, one extending along the Hudson and the other along the boundary line between the States of New York and Connecticut. They are broken up into a number of smaller hills and ridges, whose general course is north and south. The highest are from six hundred to one thousand feet above tide-water. The valleys, also extending north and south, are bordered, as a rule, by cultivated slopes, which add much to the variety and interest of the scenery. The roads running north and south, as they follow the general course of the valleys, are usually level, but those extending from east to west, across the hills and ridges, are very uneven and marked by many deep ascents and descents. In some portions of the county the hills are rocky and precipitous and the scenery bold and impressive.

The principal streams of the county are Peekskill Creek, Furnace Brook, the Croton, Pocantico and Neperhan Rivers, and Tippett's Brook, tributary to the Hudson and the Bronx Rivers; Westchester and Hutchinson's Creeks, Mamaroneck and Byram Rivers, flowing into Long Island Sound; Maharness and Stamford Mill Rivers, flowing east into Connecticut; and Muscoot Creek, Plumb Brook, and Titicus, Cross and Kisco Rivers, tributaries of the Croton. A number of small lakes are located chiefly in the more hilly districts in the north and west. The chief of those are Waccabuc, in Lewisboro; Cross Lake, in Poundridge; Byram Lake, in North Castle; Rye Pond, in Harrison; and Croton and Mohegan Lakes, in Yorktown. The southeastern portion of the county along the Sound is deeply indented by bays and estuaries, which in some instances are bordered by large marshes. By the reflux action of the tide in the streams flowing into the Sound, hydraulic power is furnished which is utilized in several places.

The geological formations of the county have already been described, but it may be added that to its other advantages as a place of residence Westchester adds the important one of an abundance of building stone of the best quality. There are valuable quarries of marble at Sing Sing and traces of valuable ores have been discovered. Several mineral springs have been found in different portions of the county, chief among which is Chappaqua Springs, three miles east of Sing Sing, and esteemed for its medicinal qualities.

The soil of Westchester, owing to the disintegration of natural rock from which it is derived, is mainly of a light and sandy character, capable of great improvements and rendered very fertile by judicious cultivation and the application of manures. Drift deposits and alluvium appear on the Hudson, along the Sound and in other localities. These furnish a much more productive soil. The agricultural interests of the county, as fully set forth in the township histories, are mainly devoted to supplying milk to the New York market, and to gardening, fruit-raising and fattening cattle. The mechanical industries are very large and important. Immense quantities of brick and tile are manufactured along the Hudson for exportation. In the southern part of the county a large number of the inhabitants are employed in New York City. The county, as we have indicated, is steadily becoming more and more popular with the class who appreciate the great advantages of semi-rural homes as a relief from the cares of business. In the summer months the population, of course, is greatly increased. Many wealthy inhabitants of New York have summer residences in the county, and not a few prefer to live here both winter and summer. Among those whose palatial residences adorn the county are Hon. Samuel J. Tilden, Royal C. Vilas, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, the Hamiltons, Lorillards, Jays, Tituses, Wetmores, Havemeyers, Jay Gould, Cyrus W. Field, David Dudley Field, James B. Colgate, W. H. Beers, William Allen Butler, John B. Trevor, David Hawley, Thomas W. Ludlow, Leonard W. Jerome, S. H. Kneeland, George H. Halsey, T. B. Underhill, Nathaniel Valentine, Isaac W. Fowler, Jacob D. Odell, Charles E. Waring, Edward Haight, James T. Adee, Lorillard Spencer, W. A. Dooley, P. R. Underhill, L. D. Huntingdon, Adrian Iselin, George G. Sickles, John Stephenson, E. H. De Lancey, E. F. De Lancey, J. Hairland, G. R. Jackson, J. M. Tilford, G. W. Quintard, C. L. Tiffany, David Dows, Philip Schuyler, the Burrs, the Sacketts, the Minturns, General E. L. Viele, H. A. Chauncey, Professor J. W. Draper, P. J. Armour, Cortlandt Palmer, J. C. Fargo, E. O. Matthiessen, Eliphalet Wood, H. R. Bishop, James Benedict, the late William E. Dodge, Robert Hoe, John T. Terry, George Lewis, S. B. Scheffelin, the Beekmans, John Anderson, A. C. Kingsland, H. Aspinwall, O. B. Potter, General George W. Morell, the Onderdonks, Colonel Van Cortlandt, Philip Van Wyck, D. L. Seymour, William Nelson and many others of equal prominence.

POPULATION. — The population of Westchester County in 1880, when the last census was taken, was 108,988, a loss of 22,360 as compared to the census of 1870, when the population was 131,348. This loss was due to the annexation, in 1874, of part of the county to the city of New York. It is a curious fact to note that the county lost, through this annexation, near thirty-seven per cent. of its foreign born population, as against nine and one-third per cent. of its native population.

In 1880 there was a slight preponderance of females—54,976 against 54,012 males; but the balance stood on the other side as regards children from five to seventeen years,—15,332 being boys and 14,748 girls. There were 22,043 men fit for military duty, —i.e, from eighteen to forty-four years old, inclusive; 7826 were over forty-four years of age, making the total voting population 29,869.

The death-rate per thousand was small, as compared to that of the whole State. The census tables do not give the mortality in each separate county, but in groups of several counties. Group No. 1, comprising Kings, Queens, Richmond, Rockland and Westchester, exclusive of New York and Brooklyn, presents a total population of 299,075 souls, and a mortality of 4881,—males, 2622; females, 2259,—which gives a death-rate of 16.32 per thousand. The death-rate for the whole State is 17.38. The Westchester group is, therefore, greatly favored by Nature and may boast of an uncommonly healthy climate. The difference between these two rates will be better understood when it is remembered that the mortality in the whole State—88,332 deaths in a population of 5,082,871 inhabitants—includes that of all the large cities where death's harvest is always greater than in the rural districts. The deaths in New York City and Brooklyn alone aggregate 43,208, or very near half the number of deaths in the whole State, and, taken from their joint population of 1,772,962, average 24.94 per thousand.

The population of the various towns in the county, according to the census of 1870 and 1880, was as follows:

	1880.	1870.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.—The agricultural resources of our county make a very fair showing. While our farms are not, as in some of the Western States, immense territories, yielding fabulous crops, they give evidence of the prosperity of the many, rather than the opulence of a few,—a healthy state of things, indicating the thrift, independence and contentment of the people. Westchester County contains 2991 farms, of which 2385 are cultivated by their owners, 455 are rented for fixed money rentals and 151 are rented for shares of products.

Of these farms, 888 have an area of from 50 to 100 acres; 909 from 100 to 500 acres; 17 measure over 500 and under 1000; and 3 over 1000 acres. There are only 4 farms under three acres; 183 are over 3 and under 10 acres; 290 over 10 and under 20 acres; and 697 over 20 and under 50 acres. It will be seen from these figures that the majority of our farmers own enough land to raise either profitable crops or live stock. The smaller farms are well adapted for the cultivation of fruits and vegetables and the raising of poultry, a by no means insignificant feature in our list of productions.

The total farming area of the county is 255,774 acres. Of this, 141,583 acres are tilled land, including fallow and grass in rotation; 62,265 acres are in permanent meadows, pastures, orchards and vineyards. There are 40,462 acres in woodland and forest, and 11,464 acres in old fields and other unimproved lands.

The value of farms, including land, fences and buildings, is set down at $33,264,505. That of farming improvements and machinery at $597,892; of live stock at $1,805,838. The cost of building and repairing ferries, in 1879, was $129,336; that of fertilizers purchased during the same year, $48,645. The estimated value of all farm productions sold, consumed or on hand, for 1879, was $2,544,041.

The live stock of the county and its productions in the year 1879 were as follows: Horses, 6919; mules and asses, 40; working oxen, 2418; milch cows, 19,168; other cattle, 5302; sheep, exclusive of spring lambs, 1646; swine, 8207; wool, spring clip of 1880, 6069 lbs.; milk sold in 1879, or sent to cheese and butter factories, 5,637,072 gallons; butter made on farms, 616,825 lbs.; cheese made on farms 2540 lbs.

Cereal productions: Barley, 84 acres produced 2094 bushels; buckwheat, 1101 acres, 13,464 bushels; Indian corn, 11,131 acres, 377,357 bushels; oats, 9004 acres, 238,509 bushels; rye, 4038 acres, 55,130 bushels; wheat, 1582 acres, 22.698 bushels. There were also produced in 1879, 300 tons flax-straw and 10 lbs. maple sugar; 63,408 acres of hay were mown, yielding 69,221 tons.

There were on hand, June 1, 1880, exclusive of spring hatching, 116,782 barn-yard fowls and 7506 other poultry. The number of eggs produced in 1879 was 662,672 dozens; 13,475 pounds of honey and 363 pounds of wax were gathered in 1879; 3 acres cultivated in tobacco yielded 1825 pounds; 326,092 bushels Irish potatoes were raised on 3876 acres.

The value of orchard products, sold or consumed in the year was $164,196; that of garden products, $54,105.

There were 19,653 cords of wood cut and the value of forest products sold or consumed during the year was $90,095.

Spring wool (1880), 1646 fleeces, weighing 6069 of all pounds; 100 pounds broom corn, and 82 bushels dry beans were gathered in 1879.

These figures speak highly for the productiveness of our soil and the industry of our farmers.

Manufacturing Industries.—Not less interesting is the report on the manufacturing interests of the county. While Westchester County stands seventeenth on the list as regards the number of establishments and the amount of capital invested, it will compare favorably with the most important manufacturing counties. The true criterion of prosperity is not so much the amount of capital and the number of manufacturers, as the proportion of working people who find employment at fair wages and the margin of profits after all expenses are paid.

A comparison of the various factories of our manufacturing interests with those of some other counties having a larger number of manufacturing establishments will show that Westchester County is particularly favored in this respect. The census reports give the number of manufacturing establishments in this county as 502, with an aggregate capital of $5,659,424—an average of $10,841.48 per establishment. The number of hands employed during the year was 10,502; to wit: 7,542 men, 2,286 women, and 674 children and youths—an average of nearly 21 hands per establishment.

Three million two hundred and thirty-one thousand three hundred and sixty-four dollars were distributed as wages among these 10,502—an average of $307.69 per hand. As five-sixteenths of the hands are women and children, who earn much less than the men, the wages of the latter are considerably above the average.

The material consumed was worth $7,752,838. If we add this to the amount paid for wages and we deduct the total from the gross amount of products, $14,217,985, we have a net balance of $3,223,783, representing nearly 57 per cent. profit on the capital invested.

Examining other tables, we find that Erie, the largest manufacturing county, has 5,281 establishments, with an aggregate capital of $62,719,399, an average of $11,688.57 per establishment. Forty-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight hands find employment, at a cost of $22,867,176—an average of $468.62 per hand. But Erie has a large number of industries requiring skilled mechanics, such as the manufacturing of agricultural implements, bridge-building, carriage and wagon-building, railroad cars, cooperage, foundry and machine works (which alone employ 2,048 men), ship-building, marble and stove works, tanneries, etc. The mechanics get higher wages, and the average wages of ordinary workingmen are thereby much reduced.

The product of these 5281 manufacturing establishments aggregates the enormous sum of $179,188,685; but the material used costs $130,108,417, and this, added to the wages and deducted from the gross total of products, leaves a profit margin of $26,203,092, or not quite 42 per cent. on the capital invested.

Onondaga County with 1277 establishments used a capital of $13,995,627, or $278.75 per hand. The material used cost $12,222,132, and the gross products aggregate $20,428,477. After deducting wages and cost of material we have here $4,210,718 for profit margin—not quite 38 per cent. on the capital invested.

We give these figures with no desire to make invidious comparisons, but to show that Westchester county, with its 502 establishments and modest working capital, is doing a safer business than most of its wealthier sister counties.

The variety of industries is great, as compared to the total number of establishments. They are as follows, the figures showing the number of establishments engaged in the industry: Agricultural implements, 1; boots and shoes, 11; bread and baking products, 12; brick and tile, 21; buttons, 1; carpets, 1; carriages and wagons, 14; cheese and butter factory, 1; men's clothing, 7; combs, 1; cooperage, 1; files, 2; flouring and grist-mill products, 24; foundry and machine-shop products, 24; men's furnishing goods, 1; gas and lamp fixtures, 2; curried leather, 1; malt liquors, 4; planed lumber, 2; sawed lumber, 13; marble and stone work, 8; musical instruments, 1; floor oil-cloth, 1; patent medicines, 1; steel pens, 1; pickles, preserves and sauces, 5; printing and publishing, 5; rubber and elastic goods, 1; saddlery and harness, 19; sash and doors, 9; scales and balances, 1; ship building, 9; shirts, 5; silk and silk goods, 3; slaughtering and packing, 2; soap and candles, 2; spectacles and eye-glasses, 1; sugar and molasses refinery, 1; tinware, copperware and sheet-iron ware, 23; tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, 13; wire, 1; wool hats, 3.

Among the most important industries is that of foundry and machine-shop products in which the capital invested is $1,067,400. It is represented by 24 establishments, and gives employment to 2190 men whose average wages, however, are only $244.83. The material used amounts to $1,130,382, and the products to $2,314,036. The margin of profits is $647,464.

The manufacture of carpets is one of the best paying industries. A single establishment, with a capital of $300,000 (the largest invested by any one firm), manufactures $2,646,946 worth of goods, using $1,313,634 of material, and paying $600,000 wages to 1606 hands—an average of $373.66 per hand. This establishment employs the largest number of women —1000, 506 men and 100 children.

The highest average of wages is paid by the eye-glasses and spectacle manufacturers, $525.77; they employ 90 men, 6 women and 1 child. The printers and publishers pay, on an average $495 per hand; the scales and balances manufacturers, $487.50, and the ship-builders a little over $500; but these industries employ only men and these in limited number.

The worst paid bread-winners are the shirt makers. The five firms engaged in this business give employment to 15 men, 477 women and 4 children, at average wages of $142.23. Total amount of wages $70,550; material used, $335,600; gross receipts, $477,750. Profit margin, $71,600, on a working capital of $49,000.

One steel pen manufacturer with a capital of $22,500, employs 5 men and 45 women, on average wages of $200. Aggregate of wages and material, $13,450. Gross products, $24,000.

The manufacture of boots and shoes is another important industry, giving employment to 673 men, 180 women and 36 children, whose average wages are $291.29. The capital invested in this business is $333,600, the material used cost costs $865,544, and the amount of products is $1,235,644. Eleven establishments are engaged in this business.

Eight firms are engaged in marble and stone work. Most of the granite works in the country are suited for rough work only, and the stone is quarried for local use. A coarse-grained gneiss, striped alternately light and dark, which is quarried near Hastings, is extensively used in New York City for general construction purposes.

The Tuckahoe marble is quarried at several points. The following interesting account of the belts of Dolomite of Archæan age in which these quarries are, is taken from "Notes by Professors Cook and Smock," published in the census reports (vol. x.)

"One of these belts reaches New York Island, crossing the Harlem River at King's Bridge; another crops on the Sound near Rochelle; others strike the river at Hastings, Dobb's Ferry, Sing Sing and other points, and furnish stones good for construction purposes and of varied colors. The best marble obtained from these deposits are those of Tuckahoe and Pleasantville. The first is white, rather coarse in texture and regular in quality, and the better grades have been used for some of the finest buildings in the City of New York, notably St. Patrick's Cathedral. The color changes to light gray by exposure.

"At the quarry of the Tuckahoe Marble Company the finest grade is nearly a pure white, but this is available only in small quantities, and is used for monumental and ornamental work. In Mr. John F. Masterdon's quarry this same material is quarried more extensively.

"In composition the stone from these quarries is a Dolomite, containing a small amount of iron and some mica. The buildings constructed of the stone from the Tuckahoe Marble Company's quarry are those of the New York Stock Exchange, New York City, and the Mutual Life Insurance Company, at Boston. Those constructed of the material from Mr. Masterdon's quarry are the New York Life Insurance building, New York City, the City Hall, Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Hotel Vendome, Boston.

"At Pleasantville, a few miles north of the Tuckahoe quarries, a coarse, crystalline white marble occurs; formerly this was quite extensively quarried for building purposes. The front of the Union Dime Savings Bank building, in New York City, is built of this stone. Its structure being quite coarse, it is not well adapted for carved work. It has also been found to break easily, especially when used for long columns, and it would not be a safe stone on this account for all kinds of work. The stone is remarkable for its crystalline, the crystals being unusually large and conspicuous, and from this peculiar appearance it has received the name of 'snow flake' marble. This quarry has recently [1880] been furnishing about twenty-five tons of stone per day for making soda water."

FINANCES.—The valuation and taxation of the county in 1880 were as follows:

Value of real estate, $52,095,188; of personal property, $3,579,658. State tax: schools, $75,545; other purposes, $122,901. County tax for other purposes than schools, $278,821. Tax in the school districts, $204,736; in minor civil divisions, $626,623. Grand total of taxes paid $1,306,626.

The gross indebtedness of the county in 1880 was $2,971,757; divided as follows: bonded debt, $2,957,536; floating debt, $14,221. The sinking fund of $5,647 (belonging to Peekskill) reduced the total to $2,966,110 net. This amount is subdivided as follows: county debt, $320,000; township debt, $1,083,278. School district debt, $931. City and town debts $1,554,258 bonded, and $13,290 floating debt, less $5,647 sinking fund. Net debt, $1,561,901.

The city and town debt is divided as follows:

Yonkers takes the lead with a bonded debt of $1,389,000; the purpose for which bonds are issued being,—

For bridges	$22,000
Public buildings	12,000
Refunding old debt	730,000
Water works	625,000
Total	$1,389,000

Sing Sing had a floating debt of		$576
Peekskill, bonded debt	$135,208
Less sinking fund	5,647
		129,561
Port Chester, floating debt		10,000
White Plains, bonded	$23,300
Floating	1,600
		24,900
Mount Vernon, bonded	$6,750
Floating	1,114
		7,864

The financial report of the mayor of Yonkers for the fiscal year ending March 1, 1885, shows the condition of the bonded debt to be as follows:

Consolidation bonds, amount outstanding	$525,000
Water " " "	745,000
Bridge " " "	14,000
Public Building and Dock " "	30,000
Total amount outstanding March 1	$1,314,000

There was paid during the previous year $25,000 on consolidation and $3,000 on bridge bonds. Water bonds were issued to the amount of $15,000.

The county treasurer's report for the quarter ending January 31, 1886, shows the disbursements during the quarter to have been $60,-019.76, and the balance on hand, February 1, $40,258.19.

The total amount paid on account of the county indebtedness during the year, as shown by reports, was twenty-one thousand two hundred and sixty-nine dollars.

EDUCATION.—The people of our county manifest a constant interest in educational affairs and the condition of our schools is such as we may justly be proud of. There has been for many years a steady improvement in the character of school buildings and the methods of teaching have been as steadily perfecting themselves. The teachers' institutes held yearly are of indisputable benefit and their effects are already felt in the schools.

At the spring holding of the institute, at New Rochelle, May, 1885, seventy-one per cent. of the whole number of teachers were in attendance.

The school commissioners' report for 1885–86 shows in the three school commissioners' districts of our county the following:

The number of teachers in the county is 334, apportioned by districts as follows:

1st Commissioners' District	66
2d " "	138
3d " "	130

The total number of pupils of school age in the county was 30,647, as follows:

1st Commissioners' District	6,767
2d " "	12,884
3d " "	10,996

The average attendance in the county was 9,440, divided as follows:

1st Commissioners' District	1,877
2d " "	4,110
3d " "	3,453

The School Commissioners are for the,—

1st District	Jared Sanford
2d "	James B. Lockwood
3d "	John W. Littel, Peekskill

The city of Yonkers being a separate commissioners district, is accordingly not included in the above calculation.

The number of children of school age residing in the district of Yonkers, at the beginning of 1885, was seven thousand three hundred and sixty-two; of these one thousand five hundred and thirty-nine attended private schools and two thousand nine hundred and forty-eight the public schools. Yonkers has thirteen private schools and seven public school buildings; one of which is built of frame and six of brick.

In the county towns there are forty-six private schools, with a total membership of four thousand and thirteen pupils.

Of the one hundred and fifty-four school buildings in the county at the present time (1885) one hundred and twenty-two are built of frame, twenty-eight of brick and four of stone.

The county school libraries contain twenty-seven thousand two hundred and twenty-one volumes, valued at nineteen thousand one hundred and twenty-four dollars. The Yonkers library, three thousand one hundred and fifty volumes, valued at thirty-eight hundred dollars.[1]

According to the annual report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction for 1886 Westchester County has ninety-one children over five and under twenty-one years of age, for each qualified teacher; forty-eight children attending school any portion of the year for each qualified teacher; twenty-eight children the average daily attendance for each teacher; 30.76 per cent. of average daily attendance on whole number of children between five and twenty-one years of age, and 58.33 per cent. of average daily attendance on whole number of children attending school any portion of the year.

The Yonkers report shows one hundred and seventy-two children of school age for each qualified teacher; sixty-one the whole number of children attending school any portion of the year, for each qualified teacher; thirty-seven the average daily attendance per teacher; 21.51 the per cent. of average daily attendance on the whole number of children of school age, and 60.65 the per cent. of average daily attendance on the whole number of children attending school any portion of the year.

CHAPTER XI.

THE BENCH AND BAR.[1]

BY HON. ISAAC N. MILLS,
Judge of the County Court.

PREPARATORY to writing this chapter we have carefully examined the court records, in the county clerk's office at White Plains, from the earliest times; perused the fragments of history, here and there extant, bearing upon the subject, and such biographical sketches of judges and lawyers as can be found; and also received from the lips of some of the veteran members of the bar and old residents of the county a mass of traditionary information, giving the names, characteristics and relative standing of the leading members of the bar for nearly a century past, and abounding in interesting reminiscences and anecdotes, the publication of which the limits of this chapter do not permit.

Westchester County has had an established bench for about two hundred years, and an established bar for nearly, if not quite, that length of time. A period so long could not fail to prove a rich field for historical investigation. While, in the main, the materials in hand are abundant, still, in some cases, it has seemed impossible to recover from oblivion the biography of one who, from the frequent appearance of his name upon the records of the court, we should judge to have been in his time a leading counselor and advocate.

With this mass of materials before us, it is no easy task to write a chapter upon the bench and bar of Westchester County; it would be much easier to write a volume.

Under the scheme of this work, however, many of the leading judges and lawyers are treated of at length elsewhere, in separate biographies, or in connection with the history of the several towns where they resided and whose names they have honored by their lives and work.

As to the living judges and lawyers, we shall undertake merely to give their names and residences, and leave to the future historian the presentation of their characteristics and careers when their life-work shall be complete.

The history of the bench of Westchester County begins in the year 1688, when John Pell was appointed the first judge of the county. On pages 11 and 12, liber B of deeds, in the office of the register of the county, his commission is stated in the following words:

"James the Second, by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, Ireland, &c., to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: know ye that we have assigned, constituted and appointed, and by these presents do assign, constitute and appoint, our trusty and well beloved subject, John Pell, Esq., to be judge of our inferior Court of Common Pleas, to be holden in our county of Westchester, in our territory and dominion of New England, with authority to use and exercise all power and jurisdiction belonging to said court and to do that which to justice doth appertain, according to the laws, customs and statutes of our kingdom of England, and this, our territory and dominion, and the said John Pell, assisted with two or more justices of the peace in our said county, to hear, try and determine all causes and matters civil by law cognizable in the said county, and to award execution thereon. Accordingly, in testimony whereof we have caused the great seal of our said territory to be hereunto affixed. Witness, Sir Edmund Andros, Knt., our Captain-generall and Governor-in-Chief of our territory and dominion aforesaid, this 25th day of August, in the fourth year of our reign, A. D. 1688."

We have given elsewhere a very full account of the Pell family, in connection with the founding of Pelham. The first Court of Sessions, shown by the court records, was held on the 3d of June, 1684, the next year after the county was established. The record does not show who presided, or who sat as associate judges. We have not been able to learn from any source the name of the presiding judge. It is possible, therefore, that some one may have been appointed, or acted, as judge of the county before Judge Pell; or it may be that he had been appointed and acted prior to the appointment above detailed.

Caleb Heathcote was the next judge of the Court of Common Pleas, holding that office from A.D. 1693 to 1720. He was the sixth son of Gilbert Heathcote, of Chesterfield, England, who had fought with distinction in the Parliament army during the civil war which cost Charles the First his head. The Heathcotes were an ancient and honorable family of Derbyshire. They are mentioned as engaged in mercantile pursuits at Chesterfield during the reign of Edward IV. (1470–1471).[2]

A romantic story is told of the cause of Caleb Heathcote's emigration to America. He was engaged to a very beautiful young lady, who jilted him for his elder brother, Sir Gilbert Heathcote (afterwards M.P. for London and Lord Mayor of that city in 1711). Caleb came to New York in 1692. "From the time of his arrival he became a leading man in the colony," and being possessed of great wealth, which he had acquired in mercantile pursuits, he made extensive purchases of lands in Westchester County. These, on the 21st of March, 1701, were "erected into the lordship and manor of Scarsdale, to be holden of the King in free and common soccage, its Lord yielding and rendering therefore annually, upon the festival of Nativity, five pounds current money of New York, etc." Besides his judgeship, Mr. Heathcote held other offices of honor in the province. He was colonel of the Westchester militia all his life, "first mayor of the borough of Westchester, a councilor and surveyor-general of the province, mayor of New York for three years, for a time commander of the colony's

[1] Many interesting facts relating to the history of the bench and bar in Westchester County may be found in this volume in the chapter on the Civil History, prepared by the Rev. William J. Cumming, of Yorktown.

forces, and from 1715 to his death, in 1721, receiver-general of the customs of all North America."[1]

A sincere churchman, he was senior warden of Westchester Parish from 1695 to 1702, and senior warden of the parish of Rye from 1703 to 1710.[2]

William Willett, who succeeded Colonel Heathcote as judge of the Court of Common Pleas of the county in 1721, was the son of Colonel Thomas Willett, of Flushing, Long Island, and the grandson of Honorable Thomas Willett, first mayor of New York. The Willetts descend from the Rev. Thomas Willett, a distinguished English divine, who died in 1597. The descendants of Honorable Thomas Willett occupied prominent positions in the province, such as high sheriffs, judges and mayors.

Frederick Phillips was judge of the Court of Common Pleas from 1732 to 1734. His full history is given in connection with Yonkers, where his residence was located, and also in the history of Greenburgh.

Israel Honeywell, one of the earliest settlers of the town of Westchester, where he had a number of local offices, was judge of the same court from 1734 to 1737, and again from 1740 to 1743. Samuel Purdy, of Rye, was also judge of that court in 1734–37, and again from 1740 to 1752.

John Thomas was judge of the Court of Common Pleas in 1737–39, and again from 1765 to 1776. Judge Thomas was the son of the Rev. John Thomas, a missionary of the Honorable Propagation Society at Philadelphia, and first rector of St. George's Church, Hempstead, L. I., in 1704.[3] Judge Thomas was the most prominent personage in Rye. He espoused the patriotic side in the Revolution, and his influence was greatly felt in its behalf. In 1777 a party of British troops, making one of their frequent raids into the interior of the county, seized Judge Thomas at his house in "Rye Woods." He was particularly obnoxious to the British, who had long been seeking to effect his capture. He was taken to New York and cast in a prison, where he died soon after. He was buried in Trinity Church-yard.[4]

John Ward, one of the judges of the Common Pleas in 1737–39 and 1752–54, was from East Chester. He died in 1754. Probably a relative of Hon. Stephen Ward.

Lewis Morris, Jr., of Morrisania, sat on the bench of that court in 1738–39. A notice of him will be found in the history of Morrisania.

William Leggett, of West Farms (then part of the town of Westchester), was judge of the same court in 1752–54. He was the third son of Gabriel Leggett, of Essex County, England, who "emigrated to this country in 1661, and in right of his wife, Elizabeth Richardson, daughter and co-heiress of John Richardson (one of the joint partners), became possessed of a large portion of the [Planting] Neck." Judge Leggett was mayor of the borough of Westchester, A.D. 1734.

Nathaniel Underhill, judge from 1755 to 1774, was the great-grandson of the "redoubtable" Captain John Underhill, a soldier under the illustrious Maurice of Nassau, Prince of Orange, in the Low Countries, who came to New England in 1630, and attained such distinction there that he was appointed one of the first deputies from Boston to the General Court, and one of the earliest officers of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery.[5] Nathaniel Underhill was elected mayor of the borough of Westchester in 1775. He filled various other offices and died in 1784.

Jonathan Fowler was judge in 1769–71 and 1773–75. No positive data are to be found concerning this personage. In all likelihood he was the son of Caleb Fowler, county judge during the intervening year 1772 and until 1776. Caleb Fowler was a resident of the West Patent of North Castle, where he owned a good deal of property. He was surrogate in 1761–66. His son Jonathan (one of the twelve children) was appointed one of the executors of his will, which instrument, dated in the year 1760, was offered for probate September 14, 1784. The persons already mentioned appear by the court records to have been the presiding judges of the County Court of Common Pleas during the colonial period and at the times respectively given. The list differs somewhat from that given in the New York Civil List or in Bolton's History, but is believed to be substantially correct.

From May, 1776, until May, 1778, the Court of Common Pleas held no session in Westchester County. After the latter date there was a principal or "first" judge, as he was called, in this court, and a number of associate judges. Sometimes there was as many as five associate judges at one time.

Robert Graham, of White Plains, was the first to fill this office of "first" judge. A biographical notice of this distinguished man is given elsewhere.

Stephen Ward, of East Chester, appointed in 1784, was for many years "first" judge of the County Court of Common Pleas. "He was the son of Edmund Ward, of East Chester, for a long time a member of the Colonial Assembly, and grandson of Edmund Ward, of Fairfield, Conn., who removed to East Chester about the latter period of the seventeenth century." Hon. Stephen Ward was an ardent patriot, and was proscribed at an early period of the Revolution by the Loyalist party and a price set upon his head. "Ward's house" was the scene of several engagements between the Americans and the British, and was finally burned down by the latter in 1778.

Ebenezer Lockwood, of Poundridge, was the next

"first" judge, 1791–94. Judge Lockwood was known as "Major" Lockwood through the Revolutionary War, he having been a major in the regiment of Westchester County Militia, commanded by Colonel Thomas Thomas, and engaged in active service during most of the campaign of 1776. From 1776 to 1783 he filled several public offices. He was a member of the Provincial Congress, member of the Committee of Safety, member of the Provincial Convention for forming a Constitution of Government for the State, and was returned a member of the Legislature for several years after the close of the war.

Judge Lockwood was born in Stamford, Conn., and was the fourth son of Joseph Lockwood, who emigrated to Poundridge in 1743.

Jonathan G. Tompkins, of Scarsdale, father of Vice-President Daniel D. Tompkins, was first judge from 1794 to 1797. "He was a member of the State Convention which adopted the Declaration of Independence and the first Constitution of the State. He was elected to the Legislature and remained in that capacity during the whole period of the Revolution, and on the institution of the University was appointed one of the regents, which situation he held until his resignation of it, in 1808."[1]

Judge Tompkins was the son of Stephen Tompkins, whose ancestors emigrated originally from the north of England and landed at Plymouth, Mass. Jonathan was adopted by Jonathan Griffin, from whom he received his middle name, Griffin. Judge Tompkins died in 1823, aged eighty-seven years.

Ebenezer Purdy, of North Salem, sat on the county bench 1797–1802 (the Purdys are numerous and the only Ebenezer we find among them is put down by Bolton as the son of Abraham Purdy, of Yonkers; born 1754.)

John Watts, who was "first judge" of Court of Common Pleas in Westchester County from 1802 to 1807, was born in New York, of which city his father (also named John) was a prominent citizen and a member of the King's Council. Judge Watts received a legal education and was eminently qualified for the bench. At twenty-five years of age he was appointed royal recorder of the city of New York, 1774, and was the last to hold the position. From 1791 to 1794 he was Speaker of the Assembly of New York, and afterwards he became a member of Congress. His home was at No. 3 Broadway, New York. He was one of the wealthiest men in New York City, and owned much property not only there, but also throughout the State. He had a fine residence in Westchester County, near the village of New Rochelle, on a slope overlooking Hunter's Island, and there lived in very good style. In person, he was remarkably fine-looking. He married Jane, daughter of Peter De Lancey, of "The Mills," in the town of Westchester. In Mr. Watts' character, equanimity was the most noticeable trait. As a writer and speaker, he possessed much conciseness of expression, and Samuel B. Ruggles once said of him, that "John Watts could express more on a page of note paper than most men could on a sheet of foolscap." Mr. Watts died September 3, 1836, being then within three days of eighty-seven years of age. Of his family of eight or nine children, but one survived him, and that one was childless. He had three grandchildren, however, one of whom, John Watts De Peyster, now living in New York, was his chief legatee. Mr. Watts was the founder and endower of the Leeke and Watts Orphan House, corner One Hundred and Tenth Street and Ninth Avenue, New York.

Caleb Tompkins, son of Jonathan G. Tompkins, of Scarsdale, and eldest brother of Vice-President Daniel D. Tompkins, was first judge of the County Court of Common Pleas from 1808 to 1820, and again from 1823 to 1846. He died January 1, 1846, aged eighty-six years and nine days. He was buried at White Plains. Mr. Tompkins was a learned jurist and a man of great abilities. He possessed, in an eminent degree, the gifts and virtues for which the Tompkins family has ever been noted.

Nehemiah Brown,[2] who served two terms as county judge, was of the ancient family of Brownes of Rye and of Hastings, England, and a lineal descendant of Peter Brown, whose name is inscribed on the Pilgrim's Monument at Plymouth, Mass.

He was born at Rye, Westchester County, November 29, 1775, and until his death, on November 1, 1855, occupied the lands on which he was born, and which had been held by his family since the first settlement of the town. Few men were better known in his county or held in higher esteem. Of sound judgment, inflexible integrity, withal genial and given to hospitality, his counsel was widely sought and valued. He received a captain's commission in the War of 1812, but, as far as is now remembered, was not engaged in the field, being detailed to assist in the fortifications of Throgg's Neck and other points in the vicinity of New York. He served as a member of the Legislature in 1824, and two terms as county judge, occupying the bench with Judges William Jay, Constant and others. A righteous man and beloved, he left a rich heritage of memories to his family and friends.

Judge Brown's first wife was Mary, daughter of Major Seymour, of Greenwich, Conn. The second was Pamelia, daughter of Dr. Clark Sanford, of Petersburg, Va. The third and surviving wife was Abby Jane, daughter of David Brown, of Rye. His only children were by his second wife, viz.: Sanford C. Brown, a young man of exceeding promise, who, although dying at the age of twenty-eight years, from exposure in Asia Minor, on business for his firm, was a prominent director and member of the Stamford

Manufacturing Company, and universally popular in business and social circles; Mary P., wife of Samuel K. Satterlee, of Rye; and Anna Evelyn, wife of Dr. Arthur F. Bissell, of New York City.

William Jay,[1] second son of the Hon. John Jay, filled the intervening term between Judge Tompkins' two terms—that is, from 1820 to 1823. Judge Jay was born at New York June 16, 1789. His early education, which was conducted under the care of his father, was finished at Yale College, where he graduated in 1808. Adopting the profession of the law, he speedily became prominent in its practice, and in 1818 was appointed by Governor Tompkins judge of the County Court of Westchester. This office he held with honor to himself, and to the credit of the community of which he formed a part, until 1842, when he was relieved from the position by Governor Bouck, in compliance with the demand of that portion of the Democratic party whose sympathies were with the South and slavery, and on account of his plainly expressed views in favor of Abolition. From his earliest years he seemed destined to be a life-long defender of the right and a stern opponent of wrong, in whatever shape they appeared. As early as 1815 he was the means of organizing a temperance society, one of the first in the country, which, at the time, seemed likely to be overwhelmed with intemperance and its accompanying evils. He was one of the founders of the American Bible Society, and till the close of his life was one of the ablest and most devoted supporters of the institution, which has printed the word of God in almost every known language, and distributed it freely in every clime.

When the evils of slavery began to be one of the vital questions of the time, the cause of human freedom found in Judge Jay an enthusiastic advocate. In 1826 there was living in this county a freeman of color named Horton. Going to the city of Washington, he was there arrested as a fugitive slave and advertised for sale, to pay the expenses of his arrest and imprisonment. Providentially, a copy of the newspaper containing the advertisement came into the hands of Judge Jay, and he made application to Governor De Witt Clinton to demand his release as a free citizen of the State of New York. This was one of the first events in the history of the great struggle against slavery, which ended only when battle-fields had been stained with the blood of its supporters. Throughout this long contest Judge Jay was ever active with tongue and pen in behalf of liberty. In 1835 an effort was made by the slavery power, through President Jackson, to prevent the circulation of Abolitionist documents by means of the United States mails. This effort, so repugnant to the principles upon which our government was founded, was met by the American Anti-Slavery Society with a dignified and earnest reply, which was written by Judge Jay, and was one of his ablest efforts. When the Legislature seemed about to pass laws intended to crush the efforts of the Abolitionists, by prohibiting the publication and circulation of Anti-Slavery documents, he charged the grand jury of the county that any laws tending to prevent freedom of speech or of the press were null and void. The official manifesto of the American Anti-Slavery Society was also written by him, and was signed by men whose names are now famous in history.

After being relieved from the office of judge he went to Europe, extended his travels to Egypt, and made a careful examination of the institution of slavery as it existed there. A firm believer that the time would come when men should "beat their swords into plowshares," and "learn war no more," he became president of the American Peace Society, and published a work, "War and Peace—the evils of the first, with plans of preserving the last." This book led to the famous protocol adopted by the Congress of Paris after the Crimean War, the first united international effort to have arbitration take the place of war. In 1833 he published the life and writings of his father, the chief justice.

Judge Jay was an able writer and possessed reasoning powers of the highest order. The works which he published were forty-three in number, and to analyze them would require a volume. It is sufficient to say that all, without exception, were devoted to the elevation of society, by the removal of the evils which retard its progress. His useful and eventful life ended October 14, 1858. This event caused heartfelt grief among all who realized the value of the friend of humanity. The various societies of which he was a member paid tributes of respect to his memory, and Frederick Douglas, as the fit representative of the race for whose freedom he had labored so long and so well, delivered an eloquent and fitting eulogy. It was his fortune, like that of many others who have labored in a noble cause, not to be permitted to see the result of his labors. The end of slavery, for which he toiled so long, came not till years after he had passed away, and was accomplished by means of which he never dreamed. But of all the names that grace the list of the friends of humanity and freedom, none deserves a higher place than that of William Jay.

His portrait is placed over the bench in the county court-house at White Plains, in grateful and appropriate recognition of the illustrious position which the name of Jay holds in the annals of Westchester jurisprudence. After Judge William Jay left the bench, in 1823, Judge Caleb Tompkins was re-appointed to the position of first judge, which he held up to 1846, when he died.

George Case, of New Rochelle, a side-judge of the Common Pleas and General Sessions of the county, during the last two years of Judge Tompkins' life, often presided as first judge in his absence. It is said that

[1] This sketch was prepared and inserted by the editor.

Mr. Case came from New York City and began to practice in Westchester County in 1834. He resided at New Rochelle and died there in 1863. He had the reputation of being somewhat arbitrary in his actions while judge, and was not regarded as an eminently learned jurist, but was respected by all as a man of entire integrity. He was a widower when he came to New Rochelle, and had a daughter, who died before him. He had a considerable fortune.

Robert S. Hart, now living (1886) at Bedford, was, in 1846, appointed to succeed Judge Tompkins. He was nominated by Governor Silas Wright and unanimously confirmed by the Senate. Judge Hart is still in vigorous health and active practice, and in years of practice is the senior member of the Westchester bar. He was the last of the judges appointed. His successor, Albert Lockwood, of Sing Sing, was elected under the Constitution of 1846 as county judge, and those who have occupied the position since have been elected. Mr. Lockwood proved to be a very successful judge, and gained a most enviable reputation, especially for judicial fairness.

John W. Mills, of White Plains, succeeded Mr. Lockwood on the bench in 1851. He had studied law under J. Warren Tompkins, and before being admitted to the bar became deputy county clerk, December 30, 1836. He was admitted to practice in 1837, was appointed master in Chancery in 1844, and an examiner in Chancery in 1846. He was county judge from 1851 to 1855, surrogate from 1862 to 1870, and was supervisor of White Plains several times. He was at one time associated in the practice of his profession with J. Warren Tompkins, subsequently with John J. Clapp, and afterwards with Robert Cochran. Later still he was the senior member of the law-firm of Mills, Cochran & Verplanck. After the dissolution of the firm he attended to private business only. Mr. Mills died suddenly, September 25, 1882, of apoplexy, in the seventy-third year of his age. At one time he had a very large and lucrative practice, perhaps the largest, of the members of the Westchester bar at that time.

Judge William H. Robertson[1] who succeeded Judge Mills in 1855, is a son of Henry Robertson, of whom a brief sketch appears in another part of this work. He was born at the family homestead in Bedford, October 10, 1823. His boyhood was spent on his father's farm, and his early education was obtained at the district schools and at Union Academy, in Bedford, of which Alexander G. Reynolds was principal. He taught school for a considerable time in Bedford and Lewisboro. He read law in the office of Judge Robert S. Hart, in Bedford village, was admitted to the bar in 1847, and in 1854 formed a partnership with Odle Close for the practice of law in White Plains, under the firm-name of Close & Robertson, which has continued till the present time. Before attaining his majority his taste for politics developed itself and he took a warm interest in the Harrison campaign of 1840. His first vote was cast for Henry Clay in the fall of 1844. The next spring he was elected town superintendent of schools, and continued in that position for several years. He has been four times supervisor of Bedford and twice chairman of the Board of Supervisors. His legislative career began in 1848, when he was elected to the Assembly, and he was re-elected the following year. In 1853 he was chosen to the State Senate, where he at once took a prominent position. Among other public acts, he introduced the bill for establishing the Department of Public Instruction, which may justly be considered one of the most important events in the educational history of the State. In the Assembly of 1849, and also in the Senate of 1855, he supported Hon. W. H. Seward for United States Senator. Only one other person, Reuben Wells, of Warren, voted twice for Mr. Seward for that office. In 1855 Mr. Robertson was elected county judge of Westchester County, and was twice re-elected to that responsible position, thus holding it for twelve years, and discharged the duties of the office with such ability and fairness as to win the commendation of the members of the bar, and merit the respect of all classes of citizens.

He served six years as inspector of the Seventh Brigade New York State Militia, was chairman of the military committee appointed by Governor Morgan in 1862 to raise and organize State troops in the Eighth Senate District, and was commissioned to superintend the draft in Westchester County.

In 1860 he was a member of the Electoral College, and voted for Abraham Lincoln. He supported him again in the National Convention of 1864, and during his whole administration was one of his most loyal and faithful adherents. In 1866 he was elected a representative in the Fortieth Congress by a majority of two thousand two hundred over William Radford, who had represented the district for the two terms immediately preceding. While member of Congress he voted for the impeachment of President Johnson, took an active part in the legislation which led to the restoration of the Southern States to the Union, and throughout his term devoted himself to the interests of his district and his constituents.

Judge Robertson's second term of service in the State Senate began in 1872 and continued without interruption for ten years, during the last eight of which he was president pro tem. of that body. He served as chairman of the Committees on Commerce and Navigation, Rules, Literature and Judiciary. As the head of the Judiciary Committee for eight years, he occupied a position of great responsibility and usefulness, and it is freely conceded by all who are capable of judging, that it is due to his ability and watchfulness that many unwise and improper bills were prevented from becoming laws. As a Senator he participated in six State trials—those of Judges Barnard, McCunn, Curtis and Prindle, Superintendent De Witt C. Ellis, of the Bank Department, and Superintendent John F. Smythe, of the Insurance Department.

In 1876 Mr. Robertson was one of three gentlemen of this State who, at the request of the President, visited Florida to supervise the counting of the votes for the office of President.

In 1872 the personal and political friends of Mr. Robertson throughout the State made a vigorous effort to place him in nomination for the Governorship, and with excellent prospects of success, until the assembling of the convention, when the name of the honored soldier and statesman, General John A. Dix, was presented, and he was chosen to head the ticket. Again, in 1879, Judge Robertson had a strong support for the nomination, but owing to the opposition of what was known as the "machine" influence in the party, he was defeated.

In February, 1880, Mr. Robertson was appointed a delegate to represent the State in the National Convention to be held in Chicago in June. A vote was passed at the State Convention, instructing its delegates to vote as a unit, the purpose being to enable the majority of the delegates to carry it en masse for General Grant. Mr. Robertson had been in Congress with Mr. Blaine, was his warm admirer and personal friend, and believed him to be the favorite of the Republicans of Westchester for the Presidential nomination. Soon after the State Convention he published a letter in the Albany Journal, in which he repudiated the principle of the unit rule, and declared for Mr. Blaine. The letter attracted attention throughout the country and gave its author great prominence in the opposition to the "third term movement." It is generally conceded that it was his leadership and organizing ability, more than that of any other man, that broke the power of the "unit rule" in Republican conventions, and defeated the "third term" candidate.

In March, 1881, Mr. Robertson was nominated by President Garfield for collector of the port of New York. His political acts having been distasteful to the Senators from this State, they demanded the withdrawal of his nomination by the President. This being refused, a bitter contest followed, which was ended by the resignation of the Senators in May, and the confirmation of Mr. Robertson soon afterward. He did not, however, assume the collectorship until the 1st of August, as the Legislature (he being in the Senate) did not adjourn till late in July. His judicial and legislative experience had prepared him for the most difficult duty of the position, the consideration and decision of intricate points of revenue law, and he discharged its obligations to the satisfaction of the importers, and with the almost universal commendation of the public press.

Mr. Robertson has been conspicuous and influential in local and State Conventions for many years, took an active part in the National Conventions of 1864, 1876, 1880 and 1884, and was for fifteen years a member of the Republican State Committee. In his political life he has been remarkably successful, having never been defeated when a candidate before the people, although his principal canvasses have been made in a district of which the party majority was against him. He has achieved this result by the strength of his personal character, his fidelity to friends, his uniform and sincere courtesy, his unquestioned integrity and his legal and business ability. He possesses in an unusual degree "the genius of common sense," an acute knowledge of human nature and thorough self-control. He is of literary tastes and studious habits, and values no less than his political honors the degree of LL.D., which was conferred on him by Williams College in 1876.

In 1865 Mr. Robertson married Miss Mary E. Ballard, daughter of Hon. Horatio Ballard, who was a prominent lawyer of Cortland County, and well known throughout the State. In 1869 he built the house at Katonah, where he has resided since that time. In the community where he lives, he is a judicious and willing counselor of all who seek his advice, a liberal contributor to religious and charitable objects, a public-spirited citizen and a valued friend.

Robert Cochran, who succeeded Judge Robertson in 1867, was born in New York City in 1824, and after being graduated from Columbia College, became associated in the practice of the law with George T. Strong, with whom he remained for several years. Subsequently he went into partnership with General Munson I. Lockwood at Sing Sing, and afterwards (in 1857) with Samuel E. Lyons, at White Plains. Still later he became a law partner of Judge John W. Mills, formerly county judge.

In 1854 he was elected supervisor of White Plains, and at the annual session of the board took a prominent and influential part in procuring the passage of the resolutions to change the location of the courthouse from the old site on Broadway and to erect the new buildings where they now stand. He was elected on the Democratic ticket as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1867, and at the annual election in that year was elected county judge of Westchester County for the term of four years. In 1874 he was elected to the office of district attorney, and in 1875 was elected supervisor of White Plains, over Elisha Horton, Jr., the then Republican incumbent. In all these positions Judge Cochran discharged the duties confided to him with marked ability, and no one ever questioned his integrity. In the practice of his profession he was remarkably successful, and was regarded by his associates at the bar as a learned and brilliant lawyer. He is reputed to have been one of the ablest judges who ever sat upon the county bench. He was learned in the law, conscientious and painstaking in his opinions and eminently courteous and dignified.

About 1877 Judge Cochran was compelled by failing health to retire from the active practice of his profession. He died December 14, 1880, in Brooklyn, whither he had removed. The cause of his death was consumption, brought on by malaria. He left a widow and several children by a former wife.

Silas D. Gifford,[1] then of Morrisania, was chosen in 1871 to succeed Judge Cochran. He was born at Canaan, Columbia County, New York, January 31, 1826. His grandfather, Amaziah Gifford, was a soldier in the Revolution, and was said to have run away from home at the early age of fourteen, joined the army and served four years. He then went to Columbia County, where he lived for some years, when he was accidentally recognized by an acquaintance, which led to his restoration to his friends and relatives in Dutchess County. He married Sarah Whitman, and they were the parents of four children, —David, who died in Rensselaer County; Samuel, who moved to the West; Mary, wife of Silas Devol; and Isaac S. The latter was a Baptist clergyman, and was settled in Caanan, Columbia County, at the time when his son, the present judge, was born. He married Annis, daughter of Jonathan Ford, and they were the parents of five children,—Amanda M; Horace C., of Berlin, Rensselaer County; Silas D., Edwin S., of Stamford, Conn.; and Sarah J., wife of John M. Lyons.

Judge Gifford resided with his parents at Caanan till he reached the age of twelve, and then removed with them to Berlin, Rensselaer County. He afterwards became a student in the well-known collegiate institution at Williamstown, Mass. His father subsequently removed to Bedford, in this county, and upon leaving college, his son made his home at the same place. The first episode of his life was a service of one year as school-teacher at Sleepy Hollow, near Tarrytown, where he was a successor of the immortal "Ichabod Crane," though his career as an instructor of youth did not terminate as disastrously as did that of his "illustrious predecessor." He then entered the law-office of Hon. Robert S. Hart, at Bedford, and upon being admitted to the bar in 1852, established an office of his own in Morrisania, and has kept his law-office there until the present. Becoming prominent in politics and in his profession, he was appointed to the office of town superintendent of common schools, elected justice of the peace in 1856, and re-elected at the close of his term. In 1862 he was appointed by Governor Morgan surrogate of Westchester County, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Robert H. Coles. He was elected supervisor of Morrisania in 1870. His election to the office of county judge of Westchester County occurred in 1871, and he held the office continuously till the close of 1883. Upon the occasion of his retirement from a position he had so long and worthily filled, he was presented by the officers of the court with a beautiful gavel, as a token of their high appreciation of the dignity and impartiality which had ever characterized his discharge of official duties, and of their esteem of his many excellencies as a citizen.

He was appointed a member of the Recruiting Committee during the late war, was instrumental in organizing several companies of volunteers, and by his active energy the quota of troops required from his town at that time was supplied without the necessity of a draft. During long years of prominence in political affairs he has always been recognized as among the leaders of his party, and his official career has been an honor to himself and to the community whose suffrages placed him in a well-deserved position. He married Miss Elizabeth, daughter of John Rae. They have two children, Jessie and Stanley, both now living with their parents at Marble Hall.

Judge Gifford lives in the village of Tuckahoe, in the town of East Chester, in a mansion known far and wide as "Marble Hall." It stands upon the site of the home of Stephen Ward, a prominent Revolutionary hero, who was surrogate of the county and a citizen of character and influence. This locality was the scene of a sanguinary conflict between the contending forces in the Revolution, when Ward's house was burned.

The present incumbent, Isaac N. Mills, of East Chester, was chosen at the election of 1883 to succeed Judge Gifford, and is the present county judge. The following sketch of Judge Mills is taken from the Mount Vernon Chronicle of October 19, 1883, and is inserted in this chapter upon the sole responsibility of the editor:

"It is unnecessary for us to tell the people of the town of East Chester who the Republican nominee for county judge is; but in order that those outside of our town who do not know him may be able to fully realize his fitness for the office he seeks, the following sketch of his life may prove useful:

"He is a descendant, on his father's side, from a family of farmers, of moderate means, who have resided and tilled farms in the town of Thompson, Windham Co., Connecticut, prior to the Revolutionary War. On his mother's side, he is descended from a family of Rhode Island Quakers, residents of that State for many generations, to a branch of which family General Greene, of Revolutionary fame, belongs. Mr. Mills was born in the town of Thompson, Conn., September 10, 1851, and is, therefore, thirty-two years of age. At the age of seventeen he decided to become a lawyer and entered the Providence Conference Seminary, at Greenwich, R. I., to prepare for college. In the winter of 1869 and 1870 he taught a a district school for a term, near Newport, at the same time working evenings, in order to keep up his studies in his class at the seminary. In the summer of 1870 Mr. Mills graduated from the seminary with the highest rank in his class. That same fall he entered Amherst College, where, during the four years' course, several prizes for excellence in Latin, Greek, philosophy, physiology, debate and extemporaneous speaking were awarded to him. In 1874 he graduated as the valedictorian of his class—a class numbering in all ninety-five members, out of which seventy-five graduated. Of that class, two of the graduates are now professors in Columbia College, one is a professor at Williams College and several others are prominent in other professions. Mr. Mills then entered Columbia Law College, of New York City, from which he graduated in 1876. In October, 1876, he came to Mount Vernon and became a member of the law-firm of Mills & Wood. He continued as such, in the active practice of law, until May, 1882, when that firm was dissolved by mutual consent. Since then he has been actively engaged in legal practice in this county and in New York City. While a resident here he has been a close student of the law, and has devoted himself exclusively to its practice. It is conceded by all who know him that he is honest, upright and able. He has been engaged in many important litigations and has been largely successful in them.. The judges and lawyers before whom and with whom he has practiced speak of him in the highest terms. There is no one at the Westchester County bar who is more devoted to the interests of his clients, or earnest or successful in their advocacy. He will, if elected, make an exceptionally able and unquestionably upright judge, and for this reason should receive the votes of his fellow-citizens. His ability as a lawyer, his thoroughness, his keenness in detecting the salient point, and, above all, his judicial temperament, the proprietor of the Chronicle can speak most unqualifiedly, because he has known Mr. Mills as a fellow law student and a partner in the practice of the law for eight years. In the law school he ranked among the very brightest, keenest, hard-working men, and his record at the Westchester bar is one full of honor."

Only three of the judges of the present Supreme Court have been Westchester men, viz.: the late William M. Scrugham, of Yonkers;[1] Abraham B. Tappan, of Fordham, who is now living, and Jackson O. Dykman, the present incumbent.

Judge Dykman[2] was born in the town of Patterson, in Putnam County. His great-grandfather, Joseph Dykman, settled in what is now the town of Southeast, in that county, and became a captain in the Continental army in the Revolutionary War.

His early life was the uneventful career of a boy in the country, attending the common school of the neighborhood and working on a farm. In this manner he obtained sufficient education to enable him to teach a common school at a very early age. He pursued this occupation until he commenced the study of the law in the office of the Hon. William Nelson, then a prominent lawyer at Peekskill, Westchester County, who manifested a lively interest in his advancement, and gave him generous aid. After his admission to the bar, he settled in Cold Spring, Putnam County, where he was shortly after elected school commissioner, and subsequently district attorney of the county.

In the spring of 1866 he removed to White Plains, in Westchester County, where he has since resided. In the fall of 1868 he was elected, by a very handsome majority, district attorney of Westchester County, then a very responsible position, which he filled to the entire satisfaction of the people. He particularly distinguished himself by the energy, skill and success with which he prosecuted the famous Buckhout murder trial, one of the celebrated cases in the history of the county.

In the fall of 1875 he was elected to the high office of justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York for the Second Judicial District by a union of both political parties. He was nominated and supported as the regular candidate of the Republican party and elected by the people by a majority exceeding ten thousand.

That nomination, made by a party with which he had never acted, was a splendid tribute to his ability, integrity and impartiality, and the result has shown that the confidence of the people was not misplaced. In the performance of his judicial duties, Judge Dykman is ever patient, affable and courteous. He is kind and obliging to the members of the bar, and especially so to the younger lawyers. He has been a member of the general term of the Supreme Court from the time he took his seat on the bench, and his opinions in that court, in the numerous cases on appeal, evince laborious research, sound judgment and discretion and absolute fairness and impartiality, and demonstrate the propriety of his elevation to the high judicial position he occupies.

At the circuit for the trial of cases he is a favorite with both lawyers and suitors for his patience and impartiality. He manifests great love for justice and right and deep abhorrence for wrong and oppression.

He is emphatically a man of the people, with whom he has always mingled freely and sympathized fully, and whose interests he has ever been ready to maintain and defend. He listens with willingness to the petitions and complaints of all, and the people love him and place reliance upon him. He is a man of simple habits and modest deportment, but studiously observes the qualities of amenity and propriety, and treats all with whom he comes in contact with great consideration and politeness.

In many ways he is an illustration of what may be accomplished under our republican institutions, where all positions are within the grasp of those who desire to attain them. By energy and perseverance he has risen to a high position without the aid of wealth or influence.

The people have found him a man on whom they could rely, and have accordingly bestowed on him their confidence and raised him to eminence, and it is not too much to say that he has fulfilled all their expectations. There never was a stain on his private character nor on his public record, and the breath of suspicion has never assailed him.

In his domestic and private life he has been exemplary and fortunate. He was early married to Miss Emily L. Trowbridge, of Peekskill, a descendant of the New Haven family of that name, a most excellent and domestic lady, who aided and encouraged him in all his struggles; and he never hesitated to declare that he owes his success and advancement to her untiring energy and zeal, her wise counsel and her laudable ambition. In many dark days she showed him the silver lining of the cloud and gave him new hope and energy. She still lives to share his honors and his prosperity as she shared his adversity,—a noble example of a faithful wife, a devoted mother and a benevolent Christian woman.

They have two sons, both of whom are lawyers. The elder, William N. Dykman, married Miss Bell Annan, and is practicing his profession very successfully in Brooklyn. The youngest, Henry T. Dykman, married Miss Ella B. Clyne, of Dutchess County, and is practicing law in White Plains, where he has accumulated a very good practice.

Such is the Honorable Jackson O. Dykman, and his example may well be imitated by the young men of the country.

He is a Democrat in the broadest sense of the term, but not a partisan, and a consistent member of the Episcopal Church.

The following is a list of the surrogates, as given in the New York civil list. Most, if not all, are mentioned biographically in our sketches of the bar, which follow,—

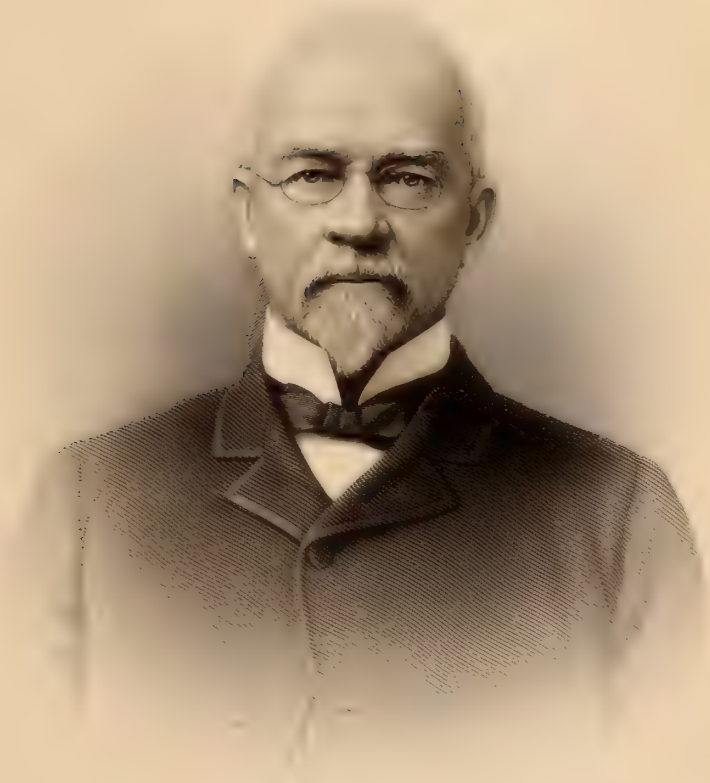
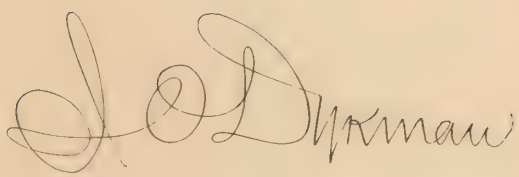
Samuel Clowes was the first lawyer, of whom any record can be obtained, who practiced in Westchester County. He was a Queens County man and filled the office of clerk of that county from April 30, 1701, to July, 1710. Having moved to Westchester County, he soon rose to prominence, and from 1717 to 1744 he was one of the two leading attorneys of the Westchester bar, and doubtless the first prosecuting attorney of Westchester County. December 9, 1722, occurs the following entry in the court records of White Plains: "The Court of Gen'l Sessions appoints Mr. Samuel Clowes counsel for the King in all cases where he is not already concerned for the subject." After 1744, owing to his advanced age, he gave up the active practice of a profession in which he had risen to eminence, commanding the respect and admiration of his brother lawyers and of the people. Mr. Clowes died, full of years, in Jamaica, Long Island, in 1760. In his will, which bears date of July 24, 1759, but was not offered for probate until August 28, 1760, he put down his age at eighty-five years and five months.[1] He was, therefore, over eighty-six years of age at the time of his death, the exact date of which we have failed to discover.

Another lawyer, whose name appears simultaneously with that of Mr. Clowes, in 1717, in connection with a number of proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas, was —— Vernon. His first name is omitted in the court records, and little is known of him beyond the fact that he practiced law until 1728.

Mr. Murray and Mr. Jamison are next mentioned—first name omitted—as practicing, from 1719 to 1736–37, in Westchester County. The former was, no doubt, Joseph Murray, of New York, member of the Colonial Council of New York from 1744–58.[2] He died in 1758. There can be also little doubt that "Mr. Jamison" was David Jamison, one of the patentees of Harrison's Purchase (the town of Harrison), at one time chief justice of New Jersey and attorney-general of New York.[3]



Mr. Wileman (doubtless Henry Wileman) practiced occasionally in the Westchester County Courts from 1720 to 1725.[4]



John Chambers, of New York, practiced in the Westchester courts from 1724 to 1751. He was an able and successful lawyer, he and Mr. Clowes doing almost all the legal business until Mr. Clowes retired, in 1744, when Chambers retained the lion's share.

Other lawyers, hailing principally from New York City or from Queens County, appeared infrequently in the County Courts in those early years. They were Whitehead, 1721; Costifin, 1728; Price, 1728; T. Smith (possibly Thomas Smith, of New York, member of the Committee of One Hundred in 1775), whose name is frequently mentioned, 1727–69; Edward Blagge, 1728–32; Seymour, 1729; Lodge, 1731–56; Kelley, 1732–51; Warrol, 1732; White, 1740–41; Crannel, 1744; Green, 1744–47.

John Bartow, of Westchester town, was a lawyer of some repute from 1742 until 1772. He at one time (1760–64) held the office of county clerk. He died in 1802, at eighty-seven years old. Mr. Bartow, we believe, was the first attorney resident in Westchester County.

John Alsop, of New York, practiced law in Westchester County, with remarkable success, between 1744 and 1759, inclusive.

Benjamin Nicoll, lawyer of New York, was clerk of Westchester County in 1745. He died about 1759–60, as there is an entry in the record of the proceedings of the Court of Common Pleas, May, 1760, of an order appointing Thomas Jones attorney, in a certain cause, "in the room of Benjamin Nicolls, deceased." Mr. Nicoll was a lawyer of great ability.

Timothy Wetmore, referred to above, was one of the leading attorneys at this bar previous to the Revolution. He was the son of Rev. James Wetmore, of Rye, and a man of influence in the community. He was graduated from King's College in 1758, and was admitted to practice April 26, 1760. He was a pronounced Tory, and signed the protest at White Plains, April 11, 1775, against Congress and committees, and pledged his life and property to support the King. He afterwards removed to the province of New Brunswick where he practiced his profession many years and held situations of honor and trust. In 1800 he returned to New York, where he died March, 1820, aged eighty-three or eighty-five years.[1]

The court records furnish us with the names of a number of lawyers who practised for one or more years in the county. Having failed to obtain such information concerning them as could be embodied into a biographical notice, we give here merely the names and dates at which they appear on the records, between 1745 and 1776,—Samuel Clowes, Jr., 1745-55; Parker, 1747–49; McEvers, 1748, 1749 and 1756; Bennett, 1748–53; John Cortlandt, 1750–56; Scott, 1752–53; Moore, 1752-65; Augustine Van Cortlandt, 1753–67; Woods, 1762–76; Ludlow, 1761–71; Kent, 1762–72; Ryker, 1765–68; Helme, 1765–73; Vincent, Matthews, 1770–71; Benson, 1771; Antill, 1771; Townsend, 1770–76 (probably Micah Townsend, Esq., of White Plains); John McKesson, 1771; Wickham, 1763–72; De Peyster, 1773; Murray, 1774; and Bogart, 1776.

Hon. Richard Morris (of the Morrises, of Morrisania, and whose biography is given in another chapter) practiced in Westchester County (1752–76); He, with Thomas Hicks (1752–64), Benjamin Kissam (1756–75) and Timothy Wetmore, afterwards attorney-general of the province of New Brunswick, became the leading lawyers after Alsop and Nicolls had ceased to figure. Thomas Jones (1760–71) and Samuel Jones (1764–76) did also a good deal of legal business.

Gouverneur Morris, son of Hon. Lewis Morris, fourth proprietor and second lord of the Manor of Morrisania, practiced law in Westchester County about the year 1772. He had graduated at King's College (now Columbia), in 1768. Entering upon the practice of law, he soon gained a high reputation. In 1775 he was a delegate to the Provincial Congress in New York. The same year he was appointed a member of the Committee for Public Safety for Westchester County. In 1776 he was one of the committee for draughting a Constitution for the State of New York. He went to France in 1787 and remained in Paris until 1795, as American minister, witnessing thus the terrible scenes of the French Revolution from its incipiency to its consummation.

He exhibited as great ability in his public capacities as he had displayed oratorical talents and legal learning at the bar. He was a member of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States; "was chosen Senator of New York in 1800, and in 1808 appointed one of their commissioners to lay out the city of New York into streets and avenues north of Bleecker Street. In the summer of 1810 he examined the route for the Erie Canal, and took an active part in originating and promoting that noble work."[2]

He died in 1816, aged sixty-four. His wife was Ann Carey Randolph, daughter of Thomas Randolph, of Roanoke, and a descendant of the celebrated Pocahontas. He left a son, Gouverneur Morris, Esq., of Morrisania. Barber, already quoted, says of him—"The activity of his mind, the richness of his fancy and the copiousness of his eloquent conversation were the admiration of all his acquaintances, and he was universally admitted as one of the most accomplished and prominent men of our country."

The illustrious John Jay, LL.D., first chief justice of the United States under the Constitution of 1789, practiced in the Westchester County Courts from 1769 to 1776. Judge Jay was the eighth child of Peter Jay, Esq., merchant, by his wife, Mary Van Cortlandt. He was born on the 12th of December, 1745. He received a collegiate education at King's College and took his degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1764. Already he had decided upon the law as his profession, and in 1768 he was admitted to the bar. A mere outline of the life of this great citizen would fill more space than we can devote to the bench and bar of Westchester County. From the day when he was appointed to the First American Congress, in 1774, to the year 1801, when he retired from public life to enjoy well-earned rest at Bedford, in this county, his career was of usefulness and patriotic devotion. Chief justice of New York from 1777 to 1779, President of Congress, minister plenipotentiary to Spain in 1779, a signer of the definitive treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783, chief justice of the United States in 1789 and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain in 1794, he rendered the most eminent services to the government he had helped to form. He closed his public career as Governor of the State of New York, from 1795 to 1801. He died full of years and honor, May 17, 1829. The following entry appears in the record of the Court of Common Pleas of Westchester County, under date of May 25, 1829: "The court and members of this bar, entertaining the highest respect for the pure and exalted character of the late venerable John Jay, do resolve that we will wear crape upon the left arm for thirty days in token of our respect." Ability, firmness, patriotism and integrity—all that go to make man great,—he possessed in an eminent degree; and, better still, he was, as the last lines of his epitaph recite, "in his life and in his death, an example of the virtues, the faith and the hopes of a Christian."

John Jay,[1] son of William Jay, distinguished as an author and jurist, and grandson of the illustrious chief justice whose name and works are emblazoned on the scroll of American fame, was born in New York, June 23, 1817. His early life was passed in the home of his grandfather, at the family seat in Bedford, where he remained till the death of the latter in 1829. His early education began under the most favorable circumstances, and was finished at Columbia College, where he graduated with high honors in 1836. He began the study of law in the office of Daniel Lord, Jr., having as a fellow-student Hon. William M. Evarts. During his college days the Anti-Slavery movement began to be the all-absorbing topic of the hour, but there are few of the rising generation who can appreciate the difficulties which a young man of talent and ancestral name would encounter in allying himself to the then unpopular party, and identifying himself with the avowed opponents of the system which was supported by the wealth and power of the country, and the authority of the Church, and declared to be in full accord alike with the teachings of the Bible and the Constitution, established by the founders of the republic, which controlled the actions of every department of the government, and moulded the views and commanded the support of every officer, from the President to the postmaster of the humblest village. To those who can understand the power and influence of this institution in the day when Mr. Jay began his life-work, the destruction of slavery must appear as the miracle of modern times.

In 1834 he became a manager of the New York Young Men's Anti-Slavery Society. On the 4th of July of that year, a day sacred to freedom, an anti-slavery meeting in New York was dispersed by a mob, and the city was the scene of riot and outrage, against which the authorities afforded no protection. Among the residences marked out for attack was that of Dr. Abraham R. Cox, with whom Mr. Jay was then living, but the determined action of a few young men, who, with himself, prepared for an armed resistance, induced the mob to pass on to places that were not protected by equally brave defenders. From that time until the day when slavery came to an ignominious end he was in full accord with the leaders of emancipation, and in 1839 he took an active part in preparing the way by which the Abolitionists became a distinct political party, with platforms and candidates of their own. In that year he presented to the Whig National Convention an elaborate report as to the powers and duty of Congress under the Constitution to exclude slavery from the Territories, and in a speech on the "Dignity of the Abolition Cause," he urged political action and the use of the ballot, calling upon the friends of the cause to no longer confine themselves to appeals to the conscience and understanding. During the same year he was brought still more prominently into notice through a controversy with some of the higher officials of the Episcopal Church, arising from the exclusion from the Theological Seminary of a colored candidate for priestly orders. In 1842 he delivered an address on the "Progress and Results of Emancipation in the West Indies," and to his far-seeing mind the time seemed not distant when a similar result would be accomplished in our own land. In 1844, when the question of Texan annexation was attracting the attention of the country, he was the organizer of a demonstration against the project, and was supported by many of the most distinguished men of the day, the presiding officer of the meeting being the venerable Albert Gallatin, the last survivor of the Cabinet of Jefferson. Although in the Presidential contest which succeeded, a strong effort was made to induce the Abolitionists to cast their votes for Henry Clay, yet, through the influence of Mr. Jay, and the leaders whose views were identical with his own, sixty thousand votes were given by the new party for the Hon. John P. Hale, who was thus the first Anti-Slavery candidate presented for the suffrages of the country.

In the practice of his profession Mr. Jay was frequently called upon to defend in the courts persons arrested as fugitive slaves. In the peculiar state of feeling which then existed, the defense of these cases could not fail to attract public attention in all sections of the country, and the reported cases, among which may be mentioned "In re Kirk," "In re Da Costa" and the famous "Lemon Case," which were conducted by him with matchless ability, must ever be an important chapter in the legal history of the times.

In 1848 Mr. Jay, accompanied by his wife, made a visit to Europe, and during his travels formed many acquaintances among the most prominent men of the day. While in France he did not fail to visit what was to him a spot endeared by ancestral tradition, the "City of the Huguenots." Upon his return he resumed his labors for the cause of freedom, and when the country was agitated by the proposal to repeal the Missouri Compromise, he was among the first to gird for the coming struggle, and a call prepared by himself, and headed by the significant words, "No violation of plighted faith," "No repeal of the Missouri Compromise," filled the Broadway Tabernacle, on the evening of January 30, 1854, with the best citizens of New York. The resolutions drawn by him were adopted by acclamation, and the opinions thus expressed found a ready response in every free State throughout the Union. A succession of meetings organized by him for the same object served to intensify this feeling, and resulted in the establishment of the Republican party, of which Mr. Jay was justly considered one of the most prominent founders. In the Presidential campaign of 1856 he could not fail to take a conspicuous part, and a speech delivered by him at Bedford on the 8th of October, "America Free or America Slave," was one of the most efficient political documents of the time. During this time he was unceasing in his labors to gain the influence of the church in behalf of the cause of freedom,—labors which unfortunately met with bitter opposition, which only served to show him in his true character as a fearless champion of the right.

Throughout the struggle which culminated in the triumph of the Republican party and the election of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Jay was a conspicuous actor. Informed at an early hour of the Confederate design to seize the national capital, he called the attention of the nation to the danger, and prompt means were taken to avert it. In April, 1861, he was one of the organizers of the great meeting in Union Square New York, from which proceeded a flood of patriotism that swept the Northern States. During the war he was one of the most efficient members of the Loyal League of New York, and afterwards of the Union League Club, in the councils of which he has ever held an important place. When under the auspices of the Union League, and by the authority of Secretary Stanton, colored regiments were raised, he made an eloquent address to the second of these commands previous to its departure for the seat of war. His son, Colonel William Jay, who served from the beginning to the end of the war on the staffs of some of the most prominent generals, frequently received visits from his father, who was a witness of the destruction of several national vessels by the ironclad "Merrimac," and her subsequent defeat by the "Monitor," and accompanied President Lincoln, Mr. Stanton and Mr. Chase on their return to Washington from Fortress Monroe, a few days after the famous fight.

In the fall of 1865 he again visited Europe, and presided at the Thanksgiving dinner at the Grand Hotel, in Paris, on the 7th of December, where, at his suggestion, Southern gentlemen who acquiesced in the result of the war, were invited to take part in the festival.

During his absence Mr. Jay was elected president of the Union League Club, and when a disposition was manifested on the part of some of its members to dissolve the organization, on the ground that its work was finished, his influence was given in behalf of the majority, who believed that the club had an important duty to perform in the future. In 1867 he was appointed by Governor Fenton a commissioner to represent the State at the establishment of the National Cemetery on the battle-field of Antietam, and true to his nature, he was prompt to sustain the view that liberality and magnanimity alike required that the Confederate dead should also receive honorable burial. In April, 1869, he was nominated by President Grant to the important position of minister to Austria, a nomination which was unanimously confirmed by the Senate; and at a meeting of the Union League, an address was delivered to their retiring president by Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, in response to which Mr. Jay expressed the belief that the honor was intended as a compliment to the club, and as a recognition of the efficient aid it had furnished to the government in its struggle for existence. While minister at Vienna he was empowered to negotiate a treaty which should determine the status of Austrian subjects who had become naturalized as American citizens, and it was finally ratified by the Austro-Hungarian government, after much opposition from successive war ministers, who naturally regarded it as an effort to aid Austrian subjects to evade the military service of the Empire. Another convention was concluded by Mr. Jay in 1871, with Count Andrassy, affording to each country a mutual protection in trade marks, a matter of great importance to our manufacturers, and this treaty is remarkable as being the highest recognition that the Kingdom of Hungary had received in four hundred years.

The Vienna Exposition of 1873 led many American citizens to visit the Austrian capital, and increased the social duties of the Legation. The temporary suspension by the President of the American Commission, on the ground of irregularities in the management, and the official duties which devolved upon Mr. Jay in consequence, aroused much personal feeling against him, and gave rise to much abuse and misrepresentation in both the European and American press. Charges made against him were, after full examination, found to be groundless, and his character as a wise and able representative of this nation was fully sustained.

In 1874 he resigned his diplomotic position and returned to America during the following year. In 1876 he delivered before the New York Historical Society the Centennial Oration in commemoration of the battle of Harlem Plains, and, at the request of the same society, prepared a tribute to the memory of John Lothrop Motley, his predecessor at Vienna, a paper which excited considerable controversy. In 1877 he was appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury chairman of a committee to investigate the affairs of the New York Custom House;—and his report led to many changes and reforms in that branch of the national service. During the same year he was again elected president of the Union League, and upon his declining a re-nomination, in 1878, he was succeeded by George Cabot Ward.

In January and February, 1878, he took an active part in opposing the ill-advised attempt of the city officials to erect an armory for the National Guard in Washington Square, and, in company with many of the best citizens, deemed it of importance that the few breathing-places in the crowded portions of the city should not be diminished.

With a deep interest in the welfare of that portion of Westchester County which had been the home of his ancestors, as well as his own, he was prominent in the formation of a society for village improvement, known as the Katonah Association, which has been of great and lasting benefit in elevating the taste of the community.

The news of the assassination of President Garfield reached Mr. Jay while yet in Europe, and at a meeting of American citizens held at Paris, an eloquent address was delivered by him, portraying in vivid language the duties of the hour.

The frequent contributions from his pen upon the questions of the day are well-known to all, but among them especial mention may be made of articles which appeared in the International Review, on the Catholic question and on Presidential elections.

The four hundreth anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther occurred November 4, 1883, and the event was duly celebrated by a public meeting at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the American Evangelical Alliance. "Never before," says the New York Herald, "was such a throng gathered under its roof," and the opening address made by Mr. Jay, as president of the Alliance, was an effort worthy of himself and of the fame of the "Great Reformer."

Upon the seventy-ninth anniversary of the New York Historical Society he read a carefully prepared and highly interesting paper upon the peace negotiations of 1782–83. This paper, which was printed, is a valuable contribution to national history.

To enumerate the various speeches delivered by Mr. Jay upon important occasions, in which he has expressed his views upon national questions, and the various writings he has contributed to our historical and political literature, would far exceed present limits. Through a long life he has been a conspicuous actor upon the stage of public events, and his views and opinions have never failed to attract attention and command respect, and his name will descend to posterity as unsullied as that of his illustrous ancestor. During his whole career he has never in any controversy stopped to consider the odds against which he was fighting. To him to undertake has been to continue, and the sentiment ascribed to the Hero of Switzerland seems to have been the motive-power of his own actions: "Je ne sais pas si la chose est possible, mais je sais qu'il faut la faire."

In him the spirit of the Huguenots lives again, and in him we see a worthy successor of the gallant host who fought at Ivry, and followed as their oriflamme the helmet of Navarre.

When the sessions of court began to be resumed, in 1778, an entirely new set of lawyers appeared. From that time to 1794 the name of Pell appears very frequently on the records. This was doubtless Hon. Philip Pell, born July 7, 1753, "judge-advocate of the Continental army in the Revolutionary war, and a member of the Cincinnati Society." Mr. Bolton says of him: "This illustrious individual had the honor of riding by the side of General Washington when he entered New York City upon 'evacuation day,' November 25, 1783. He was a graduate of King's College (now Columbia) in 1766, and is said to have been one of the best Greek scholars of that day." Hon. Philip Pell was the grandson of Philip, fifth son of Thomas, eldest son of Lord John Pell. He lived in Pelham and was twice married—first, to Mary Ward; second, to Anna Lewis. He died in 1811, and left an only son, like him named Philip, the father of Philip Pell, of San Francisco, California.

Richard Hatfield was another leading lawyer in Westchester County after 1776, the period of his greatest activity ceasing about 1790, though he continued to plead occasionally after that date. He was evidently an energetic man, of uncommon activity, and filled many offices. He held that of county clerk from 1777 to 1802, was surrogate of the county from 1778 to 1787, a delegate to the State Convention which ratified the Constitution in 1788; member of Assembly in 1794; member of the Council of Appointment of the State in 1795, and member of the State Senate from 1795 to 1803. He was one of the organizers of the Presbyterian Church at White Plains, and assisted in organizing the Methodist Church there also. He died at his residence in White Plains in 1813, and left a son Richard, whose name also appears, but infrequently, as practicing law in Westchester County, and a daughter Esther. Another daughter married James Woods, and left a son, Richard Hatfield Woods.

John Strang, one of the attorneys of the Supreme Court was admitted to practice in the Court of Common Pleas of Westchester County in May, 1779, and remained in practice until in the year 1797. During this period he was one of the three leading lawyers of the county. Mr. Strang was the son of Major Joseph Strang, a Revolutionary character of note in Yorktown, and was born near Crompond. He studied law in the office of John Jay, afterwards chief justice of the United States. His place of residence, at least during a portion of the period of his activity as an attorney, was in Bedford, and there Peter Jay Munro was a student in his office for a few months.

Probably at the termination of his career of active practice he removed to Peekskill. At least he lived there for many years towards the close of his life at the house of his sister-in-law, Mrs. Underhill Strang. Mr. Strang died about the year 1830, being then nearly eighty years of age. He never married. A few old-time residents of Peekskill remember him as he appeared late in life, and how he used to pace up and down the sidewalk in front of his residence, holding in front of him a long cane, which he grasped a little above the middle, and wearing a shirt with a ruffled bosom and a tightly-fitting dress coat. In stature he was small. He is said to have been a man of reserved manners and of strong likes and dislikes. He is said to have been buried at Crompond. A tradition among the descendants of Underhill Strang is, that John Strang was an assistant judge advocate in the Revolutionary War, and, but for the fact that he was away on a furlough, would have acted as judge at the trial of Major Andre.

William Popham, of Scarsdale, practiced in the Westchester County Courts in 1785. This gentleman, better known as Major William Popham, descended from a very old and distinguished family, the Pophams of Popham, in the county of Hampshire, England. The sixth in descent from Gilbert Popham, the founder of the family in the year 1200, was Sir John Popham, Knight of the Bath, lord chief justice of the Queen's Bench. The Pophams took sides against the King in the English Revolution and, upon the restoration of Charles II., John Popham, the direct ancestor of Major Popham, removed to Ireland. He was for many years a gentleman of the household to King James the First, and married, it is said, a daughter of the celebrated president John Bradshaw. His great-grandson, William Popham, of Bandon, county of Cork, Ireland, was the father of Major William Popham. This gallant soldier was born in Ireland in 1752 and came to America with his parents at the early age of nine years. The Pophams settled in the town of Newark (State of Delaware), where William spent his youth and received a finished education. He was intended for the ministry, but on the breaking out of the Revolutionary War he entered the American army.[1]

He distinguished himself at the battle of Long Island—his first engagement—and was made a captain. At White Plains and at Brandywine he again gave proofs of indomitable valor and military ability. He acted as aid to General Clinton in the Northern Division of the army, and was also the aid of General Sullivan in the western expedition among the Indians. After the war he resided a few years in the city of Albany, where he entered upon the study of the law, and practiced his profession. He thence removed to New York City, where he practiced law for a few years. In the year 1787 he purchased a farm in Westchester County, which he made his abode. He was then clerk of the Court of Exchequer, an office which he held until it was abolished. He died at New York, September, 1847, aged ninety-five years. He was a remarkably religious man and a member of the Episcopal Church. "He was the friend and companion of Washington, and claimed as his intimates many of the most remarkable men of his day. He belonged to the old school of American gentleman, and in mind and body was distinguished for activity and sprightliness. He was an accomplished scholar, and in every particular a thoroughbred gentleman."[2] Major Popham was president of the New York Society of the Cincinnati. His remains repose in the Popham family vault, near St. James' Church, Scarsdale.

Other lawyers mentioned between 1778 and 1800 are Nathaniel Lawrence, district attorney in 1796, whose name is not frequently mentioned, however, in the court records; Cutting, 1785–88; Skinner, 1787–1805; Troup 1787–95 (probably Robert Troup, of New York; he had a good practice in this country); Pierre Van Cortlandt, of the town of Cortlandt, admitted in 1787, but not often in court; Frederick Prevost, 1787; John Johnston, 1787; Augustus James, 1787; Ogilvie, 1787–93; Lewis, 1787; Watkins, 1788; Brookholst Livingstone (afterward judge of the Supreme Court), 1788; Adrian Kissam, 1789; Aaron J. Lawrence, 1790; Oliver L. Ker, 1790–93; Read, 1790–94; Thomas Cooper, 1790–98; Josiah Ogden Hoffman, 1790; Francis Lynch, 1790–94; James Morris, 1791–94; William Wyche, 1793–96; George D. Cooper, 1793–1812; Cadwallader D. Colden, 1798; James Woods, who had a good practice from 1794 to 1811; Charles Thompson, who did a fair legal business from 1794 to 1816; Joseph Constant, 1795–99; and Benjamin Ferrio, 1795–1805.

At this period Aaron Burr frequently had cases in this court, especially between and including the years 1785 and 1794, when he may be said to have been one of the active members of the bar. Alexander Hamilton, his distinguished political opponent, also tried cases in this county about that time, but they were very few in number.

Peter J. Munro was the leading lawyer from 1789 until 1821. He lived in Mamaroneck, but most of his business was done in New York, where he had an office. He was paralyzed for some years before his death, which occurred September 22, 1833, at an advanced age.

Edward Thomas, surrogate of Westchester County, was a leading lawyer and had an extensive practice, 1786–1806. He was the grandson of Judge John Thomas, the patriot who died a prisoner in New York, in 1777. Edward Thomas married Anne Oakley. He died in 1806, aged forty-four years. His

Chauncey Root Mitchell, who practiced in Westchester County, 1808–11, was the fourth child of Rev. Justus Mitchell, of New Canaan, Conn., and was a brother of Minott Mitchell, of White Plains. He was born June 25, 1786, married Anna, daughter of Hon. Robert Johnston, of Somers, moved shortly thereafter to Delhi, Delaware County, and died there February 5, 1814, aged twenty-seven years. He was possessed of brilliant talents, and was highly gifted as an orator.[1]

David Brush, of Greenwich, Connecticut, practiced here occasionally, 1810–27; and William Silliman, of East Chester had a small practice, but was principally in New York.

Balsamin C. Austin, surrogate of Putnam County in 1813, practiced in this county, 1813–22. He was a man of ability, and but for his unfortunate intemperate habits would have acquired a first-class practice. He lived in Peekskill during these years and then went to Washington, D. C., where he died during Tyler's administration. He was married to a Miss Diven.

John McDonald, a native of White Plains, practiced law from 1814 to 1826 with moderate success. He then moved to New York and became a master in Chancery there. He spent the latter part of his life in gathering materials for a history of Westchester County. The result of his labors is a manuscript which is deposited in the Lennox Library, New York.

Aaron Ward, of Sing Sing, was admitted to the bar in 1816. His history is given in connection with his native town. He was a member of Congress, and more noted as a politician than as a lawyer. He was a member of the law-firm of McDonald & Ward, 1816–18, of Ward & Miller, 1825--29, and of Ward & Lockwood, 1831 and onward. The firm of Ward & Lockwood did a large pension business.

J. White Strang, who was admitted to the Westchester County bar in 1819, was a man of commanding talents and a good orator. He was the son of Dr. Samuel Strang, who was one of the earliest physicians who practiced in Peekskill. He studied law with William Nelson, in Peekskill, and after being admitted to practice, was engaged in a number of cases in which Nelson was employed on the other side, and the intellectual combats between the two are yet remembered, by some of the old members of the bar, as having been the occasion of brilliant displays of legal abilities on both sides. Although a brilliant and able man, he seemed averse to business. Had it not been for this fault, it is thought that he would have obtained a very prominent position at the bar. He died about 1831.

From about 1820 to 1850, Richard R. Voris was the leading advocate of the county. His family was of Dutch origin, and settled at Jamaica, L. I. He was, in early life, a merchant in New York City, and after being successful for some time, met with reverses and failed. Then he studied law with McDonald, at one time of the firm of McDonald & Ward. He began the practice of law at Sing Sing about 1820, and continued it there till his death, in 1852. He left a widow and two children,—Elizabeth L., who became the wife of Marlborough Churchill, and Edgar M., who was for many years a successful physician at New Rochelle.

Richard R. Voris was district attorney for several years before the Constitution of 1846.

He was large and portly, of very fine presence and great dignity and courtesy. He was very successful as a jury advocate. His style in speaking was lucid, simple and still ornate, and his delivery was very easy and natural. He has, we think, the reputation of having been the ablest jury orator this county has ever had. Old residents, in speaking of the lawyers of their earlier days, commend Nelson for practical business sense, Minott Mitchell for astuteness, both in counsel and practice, J. Warren Tompkins for general ability, and Voris for eloquence at the bar. They were all undoubtedly lawyers of much more than average ability, and for many years were some or all of them engaged in all the important litigations before the courts of the county.

William W. McClelan practiced somewhat in this county during the first half of this century, especially in the second quarter of it. He was born at Troy, N. Y., in 1788, and was a son of Hugh Stuart McClelan, who was assistant commissary-general of the Continental army during the Revolutionary War, and a distinguished patriot. The family emigrated to this county from Scotland in colonial days; and it has, in its various members, exhibited a good degree of that sturdy independence and persistence which characterize people of that nationality.

William W. was well educated in the city of New York, where he studied law in the then well-known law-office of Woods & Bogart, and was admitted to practice in New York Common Pleas on the 30th of December, 1809; in the Supreme Court on the 13th of May, 1813, as attorney; and on the 15th of May, 1816, as counselor; in the Mayor's Court of New York City on the 20th of May, 1815; in Court of Chancery on the 15th of June, 1820; and in the Westchester Common Pleas on the 24th of September, 1832. He was appointed master in Chancery, on the 10th of July, 1815, and held the office for many years. He practiced his profession assiduously and successfully in the city of New York until the year 1831, when he largely retired from practice, and established himself at New Rochelle, where he continued to act as counselor and adviser until the time of his death, in November, 1854. He was really more of a New York City than a Westchester County attorney, and his principal achievements at the bar were in that city. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and tolerant of all religious belief. In 1831 he married Frances B. Vickers, at New York City, and reared a family of five children, one of whom, Pelham L., was for a time district attorney of this county and still resides in the village of Mount Vernon, and is an attorney and counselor in active practice.

Hon. William Nelson, late of Peekskill, was in the first half of this century prominent in this county, both as a lawyer and a business man.

His paternal ancestors were of English origin and Puritans. The first one of them who came to this country settled upon a farm in Mamaroneck, in this county, about the middle of the seventeenth century. The Nelsons were leading men in the county during the colonial times. One of them, Polycarpus Nelson, was a signer of the famous declaration by the chief citizens of this country, in support of William and Mary, and in opposition to the House of Stuart.

A branch of the Nelson family settled in Dutchess County, where, at Crum Elbow Creek, on June 29, 1784, William Nelson was born. His father, Thomas Nelson, was a farmer, and William was reared as a farmer's son, working upon the farm in summer and attending district school in winter. He did not have the advantages of a collegiate education. He studied law at Poughkeepsie in the office of Theron Rudd, then an attorney of distinction and large practice, and in 1807 was admitted to the bar. He had intended settling in the extreme West, which was then Buffalo, but circumstances diverted him to Peekskill, where he spent a long, busy and honorable life. He probably did as much as, if not more than, any other person to promote the growth and development of that place. Among other good works, he was largely instrumental in establishing the deservedly famous Peekskill Academy. As a lawyer he ranked high, not so much for eloquence or skill at the bar as for industry, good common sense and integrity. His sterling qualities were appreciated by the people, and brought him a large and lucrative practice and many public honors.

From 1815 to 1818 he was district attorney of his district, comprising the counties of Westchester, Putnam and Rockland. Afterwards, when his district comprised Westchester alone, he held the same position. He held it altogether more than twenty-five years. He was also an Assemblyman from 1819 to 1822; State Senator, and as such, a member of the court for the correction of errors from 1824 to 1827; and Congressman from 1847 to 1851.

In 1812 he married Cornelia M. Hardman, and lived happily with her until her death—a period of fifty-seven years. He survived her only five weeks, and died on the 2d day of October, 1869, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. They reared a large number of children, several of whom have attained to prominent positions, and fully maintain the distinguished name of the family.

William Nelson had the happy, and, for lawyers, somewhat rare, faculty of business skill and sagacity in the management of his own affairs. He left an estate valued at nearly one million dollars. In this respect he undoubtedly excelled all other members of the Westchester County bar, past or present.

His character has been well expressed by another, in these words: "Mr. Nelson had great natural vigor of character; was painstaking and unwearied in every duty to which he addressed himself. He was wise in counsel, and eminently sagacious and practical, genial in nature, courteous in manner, simple in his mode of life, and, above all, possessed a rare singleness of purpose and integrity of nature. These qualities, in addition to a piety that was devout, but unobtrusive, enabled him to sway a large influence over his friends and neighbors, and all other persons with whom he came in contact. His whole life illustrated the true republican simplicity and integrity which characterized the earlier days of the State."

Joseph Warren Tompkins, for many years a leading lawyer in the county, was a native of White Plains and a nephew of the late Governor Daniel D. Tompkins. He graduated at Union College in 1822, and immediately thereafter began to study law in the office of Minott Mitchell. He was admitted to practice in 1825, opened an office in White Plains and commenced the practice of his profession under the most favorable auspices. He soon commanded a large and lucrative professional business, which he retained to the end of his busy life. Up to within a few years of his death he had been employed in nearly every case of magnitude in this and the adjoining counties of Putnam and Rockland. Mr. Tompkins died at his residence in White Plains, August 23, 1872, in the seventy-first year of his age. He left a widow and two children. He was a strong advocate before a jury, and in the trial of a good case had few equals.

Albert Lockwood held a position of prominence in his day at the Westchester County bar. He was the sixth child of Stephen Lockwood, who was born in Connecticut in 1764, and married Sarah Ingersoll in 1790. Albert was born in Stanwich, Conn., November 18, 1802. The family removed from Connecticut to the town of Ossining, Westchester County, about 1825, where Stephen Lockwood purchased a farm of one hundred and fifty acres, located about a mile from Sing Sing. Albert worked with his father and brothers on the farm in summer, and taught the district school during the winter, and during his leisure time studied law. He was admitted to the bar when about twenty-seven years old, and in 1831 formed a partnership with General Aaron Ward, of Sing Sing, which lasted until about 1848. From 1847 until 1851 Mr. Lockwood was county judge, and further political honors would doubtless have been bestowed upon him but for his death, which occurred November 18, 1852. In 1852 he was the Republican nominee for Supreme Court justice. In 1833 Mr. Lockwood married Eliza Jane, daughter of Jacob Arthur, of Kinderhook, N. Y., a lady of estimable character, who died in 1850. Their children were Arthur I., now of San Antonio, Texas, and Frederick E., Isabella B., Albert C., and Theodore, all of New York City.

Mr. Lockwood was a man of upright character and was highly respected. He was not eminent as an advocate, but was possessed of good common sense, and was a safe adviser in legal matters. Through the political influence of his partner, General Aaron Ward, who was for a long time a member of Congress, Mr. Lockwood obtained a great deal of pension business. Ralph Lockwood, a brother of Albert, was an attorney in New York, and acquired a large business and a high reputation. General Munson I. Lockwood, at one time clerk of Westchester County, and agent and warden of Sing Sing Prison, was another brother.[1]

Stephen D. Horton gave promise of obtaining eminence at the bar, but met with an early death. He was descended from Barnabas Horton, who came to this country from England in 1640. Stephen was the son of Wright Horton, of Yorktown, and Ann Quers his wife, and was born in Yorktown October 3, 1808. He came to Peekskill in 1831, began the study of law with Hon. William Nelson, became the partner of the latter in 1835, and a few years afterwards engaged in practice by himself. He died March 5, 1842, and was buried in the yard attached to the First Presbyterian Church, in Peekskill. He was married to Delia Clapp, sister of Dorlon Clapp, of Peekskill, and had one daughter, who was born in 1842 and died in 1855.

Robert H. Coles, surrogate, 1855–62, was originally from the neighborhood of Tarrytown. He studied law in the office of Minott Mitchell, at White Plains, and located in New Rochelle, where his energy and devotion to his profession soon obtained him a good practice. He was secretary of the Westchester Fire Insurance Company of New York in its early days, when it was located at New Rochelle. He was a Democrat in politics, and an active worker for his party. His death occurred January 15, 1862. He was then barely thirty years old. He was buried in the church-yard at Sleepy Hollow. Mr. Coles was not regarded as a brilliant lawyer, but he was pushing and energetic and was considered honest and reliable. He was married to Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Palmer, of White Plains, and had two daughters and one son.

Elijah Yerks was a lawyer of considerable prominence in Westchester County for many years. He was, in 1805 or 1806, born near Unionville, in Mt. Pleasant, and in early manhood was proprietor of a country store. He subsequently began the study of law in the office of Minott Mitchell, at White Plains, and on being admitted to the bar, in 1833, located in Peekskill. In 1840 he removed to Carmel, Putnam County, where he and Owen T. Coffin, the present surrogate of Westchester County, were the only representatives of the legal profession. After four or five years he returned to Peekskill, and later removed to Tarrytown, where he died in 1864. He was unmarried. Mr. Yerks was one of the most systematic and painstaking of men. He was not quick nor brilliant, and was not considered as more than a fair orator, but he was a reliable adviser. He was economical and accumulated property to the amount of twenty or thirty thousand dollars.

Alexander H. Wells was born at Cambridge, Washington County, N. Y., to which place his father, Daniel Wells, emigrated from Hebron, Conn. He was a graduate of Cambridge Academy, and studied law while filling the office of surrogate, to which, owing to his political influence, he was appointed by Governor William H. Seward in 1840, and which he held until 1844. He was made warden of Sing Sing Prison in 1848. Mr. Wells was a political writer and edited the Haverstraw Weekly Times four years, the Hudson River Chronicle three years and the Troy Daily Times three years. He wrote with force and facility, but his impetuous nature led him often into mistakes which a more prudent journalist might have avoided. He died in Sing Sing in 1857.

Frederick J. Coffin, who succeeded A. H. Wells as surrogate in 1844, was born at Nantucket in 1783. His parents removed to Hudson, N. Y., when he was a mere child. He was admitted to the bar in 1806 and almost immediately thereafter came to Westchester County. He settled in Somers, and married Charlotte Green. He was a master in Chancery for many years, and at one time a justice of the peace in Somers. He also held for a period the office of postmaster of that town. During his incumbency in the surrogate's office he lived in White Plains. At the close of his term he removed to New York, where he died October 23, 1860.

Mr. Coffin was a pleasant, kindly man, and as lawyer had a good practice. His powers as a speaker were good, and his reputation for integrity was high. While many of his decisions in cases coming before him as surrogate were appealed, it is said that his finding was sustained in every case.

Mr. Coffin's children were Mary E., now of New York City; George G., of New York; Isaac G., of Brooklyn; Jarvis B., of San Francisco; and Sarah Ann, Robert A., Frederick J. and Josiah B., deceased.

William Warburton Scrugham, a judge of the Supreme Court for the district including Westchester County and the first lawyer who practiced in the village (now city) of Yonkers, was the son of an Irishman who came to this country from Dublin about the year 1810, and opened a dry-goods store in the lower part of New York City. William was born in March, 1820, and was deprived of both his parents when very young. He was entered at a boarding-school in Westchester County while little more than a child, and remained there for many years, after which he was transferred to the grammar school of the Columbia College, in New York, where he continued to stay until 1838. He then began the study of law in the office of Samuel E. Lyons, at White Plains, and was admitted to practice in 1843. In the latter part of that year he removed to Yonkers, then a mere hamlet, the people of which were almost all tenants of Lemuel Wells. In 1846 he was elected supervisor of the town of Yonkers, and he held that office for many consecutive years, until he declined to serve any longer. In 1847 he was chosen chairman of the Board of Supervisors.

At the first election for district attorney under the present Constitution he was chosen to the office, and he performed its duties for about nine years (1847–56). He was indorsed by both political parties for the office, and his election was practically unanimous. In 1849 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the Seventeenth Regiment of the State Militia. In 1859 he was elected a justice of the Supreme Court of New York, and he was incumbent in that office at the time of his death, August 9, 1867.

Judge Scrugham did not like the excitement incident to the trial of causes, and would very rarely enter upon them alone, even in his own cases, but when he did engage in such a trial he was found to be prepared on every point. In his office of public prosecutor, however, he tried all his cases without assistance, believing it to be his duty to do so. In the conduct of his cases he showed good judgment. His practice grew with the growth of Yonkers, and he was enabled to follow his inclinations. He devoted himself chiefly to real estate and counsel business. As a judge he produced a favorable impression, and he would have undoubtedly been re-elected but for his death. He was possessed of a pleasant and genial wit. Judge Scrugham was married, in 1859, to Miss Mary Kellinger, of Yonkers. They had three children,—two daughters and one son.

John J. Clapp, originally from Greenburgh, studied law at the office of J. Warren Tompkins, at White Plains, and located in that town when he was admitted to practice. He was a man of strong common sense; manifested good abilities, both in the office and before the court. His standing as a trial lawyer before the jury was high. He was energetic in disposition, an indefatigable student of the law, and acquired a competence. He died early, in 1866, being then about forty-five years of age. He married Maria Banta. They had three sons,—John Henry, Peter B. (who died young) and Oscar.

Jonathan Henry Ferris was born in the hamlet of Oregon, in the town of Cortlandt, was graduated from Williams College, and studied law in the office of Hon. William Nelson, of Peekskill. He was admitted to the bar about 1842, began the practice of his profession in Peekskill, and soon afterwards entered into a partnership with Calvin Frost, which lasted for many years. A number of years before the close of his life he went to New York and practiced there. Later he went to Haverstraw, and finally he returned to Peekskill. The following year he fell into the Hudson River from a dock in New York while preparing to board a steamboat for Peekskill, and contracted pneumonia therefrom, which resulted in his death, on June 7, 1873.

Mr. Ferris was a man of brilliant abilities, which became obscured to a degree by some unfortunate habits into which he fell. He was refined in his tastes, quick in his conceptions, emotional and sympathetic in his disposition, polished in his manners and graceful and effective in speaking and writing. He was a great reader, and was possessed of vast stores of information. He built up a large practice.

Leonard P. Miller who lived in New Rochelle for many years, and practiced somewhat in this county, was a man of rare ability as a speaker. He was a son of Nicholas Miller, a school-teacher, and afterwards, from 1845 to 1855, a hotel-keeper at New Rochelle. He graduated at Columbia College with a high reputation as a scholar, especially in the classics, and was offered a professorship in Greek at that college. He was for many years a tutor in the family of John Hunter, of Hunter's Island, and educated the grandson, the present John Hunter. While in that position his unoccupied time was devoted to the study of law, under the instruction of William W. McClelan, and about 1859 he was duly admitted to practice. His time and attention were chiefly occupied with the management of several large estates, viz.: the Hunter, Overing, Van Cortlandt and other estates. He bore a conspicuous part in several of those noted ejectment suits, in which the title of large tracts of land held under patents in Ulster, Sullivan, Greene and Delaware Counties were tested.

About 1850 he was married to a daughter of the late Captain Josiah Le Count, and had one son, John H., who is now a prominent lawyer in New York City. As a speaker, he was brilliant and captivating.

A devoted adherent of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he was ordained as a lay preacher, and on several occasions preached eloquent sermons to large audiences. He died at New Rochelle, October 16, 1876, at the age of fifty-two. Although he did not participate largely in the general practice of law, owing to his special engagements, and so did not become as widely known in the county as a lawyer as some others; yet he was a man of superior qualities, and well deserves to be remembered.

John M. Mason, late of Yonkers, deserves notice as a member of the Westchester County bar, although he practiced chiefly in the city of New York.

Mr. Mason was born in the city of New York on November 8, 1821. He graduated at Columbia College, and studied law with his father, Hon. John L. Mason, who was an eminent lawyer, and from May 1, 1849, to January 1, 1852, one of the judges of the New York Superior Court.

In 1849 Mr. Mason formed a partnership in the law with his cousin, John M. Knox, under the name of Knox & Mason, which continued until his death, and enjoyed a high reputation for ability and integrity.

Mr. Mason possessed a clear and acute mind and a remarkable tenacity of purpose, which, with his untiring diligence and application, made him a most serviceable and efficient adviser and advocate. He was highly esteemed by the members of his profession, who invariably found him candid and liberal in his practice, while zealous in behalf of his client and his cause. He was very patient and persevering in his examination of intricate questions, and in that important branch of the law which relates to titles of real estate, was especially skilled. During most of his active professional life he was a constant sufferer from physical ailments, against which he struggled with an endurance and patience which exhibited, in a most striking manner, energy and resolution.

Mr. Mason took up his residence in Yonkers in 1854, and participated actively in every movement by which its growth and interests have been promoted. In announcing his death to School No. 6, Thomas Moore, principal, appropriately said: "I consider John M. Mason the father of the public-school system in Yonkers, and the main promoter of education in our county."

At the organization of School No. 6 in Yonkers, in May, 1861, Mr. Mason was elected one of the trustees, and he served for some fifteen years, most of the time as president of the board. Neither the arduous duties of his profession nor bodily infirmity influenced him to neglect his duties to the school. In all weathers, and at all seasons, he was promptly in his place. His time and labor were given without stint, and the high standard of public-school education in that city is, no doubt, mainly due to Mr. Mason's devotion and influence. As counsel of the water commissioners, Mr. Mason rendered important services to that city in conducting the intricate proceedings for the condemnation of land and water rights.

He died at Yonkers on the 17th day of February, 1878, leaving a widow and six children.

Elisha P. Ferris, late of White Plains, was a lawyer in good practice and repute from 1865 to the time of his death, which occurred February 8th, 1882.

His family is an old one in this county, and, by intermarriage, connected with the Purdy and several other old Westchester families. He was born February 6, 1840, at White Plains, was educated in the public schools of that place, studied law there in the office of the late John J. Clapp, and was admitted to the bar in 1862. He always kept his office at White Plains. Industrious, patient and reliable in business, he built up a lucrative practice. His popularity with his fellow-townsmen was great, and he held many local offices and positions of trust, among others, justice of the peace, president of the village, president of the Board of Education and supervisor.

His health failed him, and for several of his latter years he suffered from consumption, but displayed great resolution in resisting the disease and in attending to his business. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a prominent Mason.

On the 30th of April, 1868, he was married to Sarah Wright, of Whitestone, Long Island. She survived him, with three children—daughters.

John Seymour Bates was born in Bedford, and a son of Nehemiah Bates, who was for many years a merchant at Bedford village, and once county clerk of the county. The family came to Bedford from Stamford, Conn., and were among the first settlers.

He graduated at Columbia College in the class of 1838, studied law in New York City with George N. Titus, a lawyer of high standing, and was admitted to the bar about 1840. He returned to Bedford village about 1844, and practiced law there until about 1876, when his health failed and he retired from active practice. He removed to Harlem, and there died in 1884. He was district attorney from 1866 to 1868.

As a lawyer, he was quick in perception, sound in judgment, fluent and ornate in speech, and of rare coolness and self-command.

Of the lawyers who have passed away within the last decade, none stood higher in general estimation than Amherst Wight, Jr., of Port Chester. The son of Amherst Wight, who for sixty years was a member of the New York City bar, and in his prime a very prominent lawyer, he may be said to have inherited his fondness for the legal profession and his ability in its practice. The father, Amherst Wight, Sr., was a graduate of Amherst College, and belonged to an old Massachusetts family. He married Johanna Bonnett, who belonged to an old and distinguished New York City family. The son, Amherst Wight, Jr., was born in New York City, August 15, 1828. He attended a private school to his thirteenth year and then went into his father's law-office. The father was an eminent scholar, learned not only in law, but in general studies as well, and he gave his personal attention to his son's education. Under the tuition of the father, the son in time became a ripe scholar and acquired a liberal education.

In 1855 the son was admitted to the bar in New York City. In April, 1856, he married Adele Griswold, a daughter of Daniel S. Griswold, of that city. The father and son entered into a law partnership under the name of Amherst Wight & Son, and practiced in New York City. The firm did a large business, especially in real estate law.

In 1864, on account of the ill health of his wife, Amherst Wight, Jr., removed to the country and took up his residence at Port Chester. The change did not restore the health of Mrs. Wight, and in June of that year she died. Although not at first designing to engage in Westchester practice, he found himself gradually involved in it. Accordingly, in 1870 he formed a law partnership with John H. Clapp, a son of John J. Clapp, and opened an office in Port Chester, in addition to the office in New York City. This partnership continued until Mr. Wight's death, and conducted a very large and valuable business.

His sterling qualities won for him the confidence and regard of the community in which he resided; and, although a sincere and outspoken Republican, he was several times elected to prominent positions in his district, which was very largely Democratic. Among other public positions which he held by popular suffrage were supervisor of the town of Rye, 1871 and 1872, member of the State Assembly, 1873 to 1875, and president of the board of trustees of the village of Port Chester. He was also, in the fall of 1876, the Republican candidate for Congress in his district. In August, 1867, he married Ellen M. Abendroth, a daughter of William Philip Abendroth, late of Port Chester. He died at Port Chester on the 28th of June, 1877. He left surviving him his widow and four children—three (two sons and a daughter) by his first wife and one (a daughter) by his second. His death was universally deplored as a great public loss. He had the entire confidence and respect of all, both as a lawyer and as a citizen. As an advocate his standing was not exceptionally high, but as a prudent and reliable counselor he had no superior among his Westchester cotemporaries.

John A. Husted, for many years an active and influential attorney at Tarrytown, was born at Round Hill, Conn., March 21, 1831. In his youth his parents moved to Western New York, and in the year 1853, he came to Tarrytown, New York; and while engaged in teaching school he commenced the study of law with Elijah Yerks, Esq., a lawyer of that village. After a year or two he went into the office of J. Warren Tompkins, at White Plains, New York, and continued his studies until September 1, 1856, when he was duly admitted in the Supreme Court as an attorney and counsellor-at-law, and at once commenced to practice law in Tarrytown. There for a number of years he was engaged in some of the most important ejectment and partition actions ever tried in Westchester Co. He was an excellent equity lawyer. He died at Tarrytown, N. Y., October 9, 1884.

Edward P. Baird, formerly of Yonkers, for many years enjoyed the largest and most lucrative practice in that city. He was at one time counsel for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, in reference to its Westchester business; also counsel for the Yonkers' banks, and for many important estates. The people of that city intrusted him successively with the important offices of corporation counsel and city judge. He was a son of the eminent theologian, the late Rev. Dr. Robert Baird, of Yonkers, and a brother of the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Baird, still of that city. His life was spent in Yonkers from early childhood until 1882, when he removed to Minneapolis and settled there in the practice of his profession. He died there October 27, 1885, in the forty-ninth year of his age, leaving a widow and two children.

Isaiah Thornton Williams, who recently died at Chappaqua, was one of the leading lawyers at the Westchester County bar during the past twenty years. He was born at New Ipswich, N. H., on February 12, 1819. He came of an old New England family on his father's side, being able to trace his paternal ancestry to one of the Pilgrims who came over in the "Mayflower;" while on his mother's side, he came of a Southern family. His uncle on that side, Judge Tenney, of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, not only distinguished himself in the field of jurisprudence, but also gained a less enviable fame on the field of honor, being killed in a duel, Sergeant S. Prentiss acting as his second. Mr. Williams was educated at the Academy of Exeter, N. H. While there he made the acquaintance of Ralph Waldo Emerson, and was invited by him to spend a part of the vacation at his home in Concord. This acquaintance ripened into a friendship, which lasted unabated until the death of Mr. Emerson. Through Mr. Emerson, Mr. Williams made the acquaintance and acquired the friendship of A. Bronson Alcott and Henry D. Thoreau.

After leaving the academy he went to Buffalo, and studied law in the office of Henry K. Smith, and afterward in that of President Fillmore, where he remained some years. During Mr. Fillmore's administration he was a frequent guest at the White House, and met many of the prominent statesmen of that period.

He continued in the active practice of law at Buffalo until 1854, when he moved to New York City, and there opened an office. He soon built up a large practice, being retained in many suits of the first importance. He had been in New York but a very few years, when he formed the closest friendship with Horace Greeley, continuing unimpaired to the last sad days of Mr. Greeley's life. He was retained by Mr. Greeley to defend The Tribune in the many libel suits which were brought against that paper during Mr. Greeley's management, among the most noted of which were the cases of the notorious Count Johannes, and of Dewitt C. Littlejohn, at that time Speaker of the Assembly, in both of which cases Mr. Williams was successful. He was also associated with Charles O'Conor in several important suits. For a time he was partner of Francis B. Cutting; but his mind was of a cast which rendered him impatient of partnerships, and he much preferred to be alone, assisted only by clerks. He did not confine himself wholly to the practice of his profession, but took an active part in the political struggles of 1856, when he made speeches in favor of his old friend, Mr. Fillmore, and in 1860, when he spoke for Lincoln. During the war he took a part in the exciting controversies of that period, sharing in the dangers which surrounded Mr. Greeley and those who acted with him.

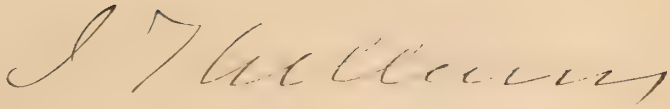
Mr. Williams did not confine himself to those questions of public interest which pertained more especially to America. In 1857 he visited Europe, where he interested himself in the ballot question which then agitated England, making speeches in its favor both in England and Wales. While abroad he visited the principal capitals of Europe, enjoying exceptional facilities for meeting prominent men, because of Mr. Fillmore's letters of introduction. In Paris, in London and at Oxford University he received marked attention from men distinguished in scholarship, politics and law, by whom he was sought, for his brilliant conversational powers. While in Paris he was thrown into the society of Charles Sumner, between whom and Mr. Williams a friendship was formed, which survived with unabated warmth for many years.

In 1867 excessive labor in his profession broke down his health, and he was obliged to retire from the practice of law. He thereupon accepted the position of register in bankruptcy for New York County. He acquired a high reputation in that office, writing many valuable opinions. In 1872 he threw himself heart and soul into the political struggle for the Presidency between Mr. Greeley and General Grant, speaking in several States in favor of the former.

In 1860 Mr. Williams went to live at Fordham, then in Westchester County, but since annexed to New York City, where he remained until 1869, when he bought a farm near Mr. Greeley's residence at Chappaqua, in which he took great interest and pride. In 1877 he resigned the registership of bankruptcy and returned to the practice of his profession, and opened an office at White Plains, having formed a partnership with M. M. Silliman. In 1881 he dissolved this partnership and returned to New York, although he had built up a large and lucrative practice in Westchester County, and there continued in the active practice of his profession up to the time of his death. His last birthday, on which he reached the age of sixty-seven, was spent in arguing a case before the Court of Appeals at Albany.

In 1849 he married Ellen E. White, a daughter of Ferdinand Elliot White, of Boston. She died in 1877, and he did not marry again.

In Westchester County he was one of the original incorporators of the Westchester Historical Society and one of its vice-presidents. At the time of his death, and for many years before, Mr. Williams was a member of "All Saints" Protestant Episcopal Church, at Briar Cliff, and was greatly interested in the temporary home for destitute children. He also took an active part in the meetings of the Bedford Farmers' Club. He died at his residence in Chappaqua on April 5, 1886, after a few hours illness, of neuralgia of the heart, in his sixty-eighth year, leaving four sons and one daughter surviving him. He was well read not only in the law, but in general literature, and in social intercourse he was a most kind, entertaining and courteous gentleman.



Reuben W. Van Pelt, late of Yonkers, for many years, especially in his early manhood, held a very high position both at the Westchester and the New York City bars. He was of very great capacity as a lawyer and early in his practice gained full recognition of his abilities. As a young man he made phenominal progress in his profession.

Unfortunate circumstances several years ago diverted him largely from legal practice, and afterwards he engaged in various speculative ventures, none of which proved successful. He died at Putnam, Conn., on the 2d day of May, 1886.

In the prime of his practice as a lawyer he delivered some of the finest arguments, both before the court and before the jury, that ever have been heard in the county. He was of good origin and had a liberal education. His ability, energy and industry are acknowledged by all who knew him.

David B. Williamson was a son of Major-General Williamson, of Maryland, who acquired distinction in the organization of the National Guard of that State. He was born in Maryland, but lived abroad during most of his youth, and was educated in Germany. For some time he was an attache of the United States Legation at Madrid. He was about twenty-five years of age when he returned to this country and began the study of law in New York, where he made his home. He took a warm interest in the State Militia and was a member of the Seventh Regiment. General Fitzgerald appointed him his chief-of-staff, a position which he held for several years. He was prominent among the military lawyers who codified the laws affecting the National Guard, and was chosen president of the National Guard Association. Mayor Edward Cooper, of New York City, appointed him park commissioner, and for four years he served as treasurer of the board. He married a daughter of Elias Butler, of Hyde Park, who, with five children, survives him. He died July 12, 1886, at his home in Dobbs Ferry, aged fifty-five years.

The present members of the Westchester bar are men of ability and integrity, and many of them are in the enjoyment of lucrative practice and of high repute, not only within the county, but throughout the State and at the bar of the Court of Appeals. We here give their names and residences. Several of them, however, have retired from active practice, or practice chiefly in New York City,—

The present distinguished justice of the Supreme Court from this county, Hon. Jackson O. Dykman, and surrogate, Hon. Owen T. Coffin, are treated of at length in another part of this work.

As we review the Westchester judges and lawyers, their records, professional and otherwise, we readily conclude that the county has been especially gifted in both. Its judges, at least in the past, have been learned, upright and faithful to duty. There is neither record nor tradition that any of them ever was guilty of corrupt or improper conduct in his position. Each has left the ermine unsullied.

The lawyers, as a class, have been exceptionally able, dignified, courteous, industrious, true to the interests of their clients and trusted counselors of the court. Many of them, as Benjamin Nicoll, Timothy Wetmore, Richard Morris, Gouverneur Morris, John Jay, Philip Pell, Richard Hatfield, John Strang, Peter Jay Munro, Edward Thomas, Martin S. Wilkins, Daniel D. Tompkins, William Nelson, Minott Mitchell, Richard R. Voris, Joseph Warren Tompkins, Albert Lockwood, John J. Clapp, Jonathan Henry Ferris, Amherst Wight, Jr., and Isaiah T. Williams, were lawyers of unusual ability and high reputation. By their careers at the bar, they honored the legal profession, and remain bright examples for the emulation of their successors.

BIOGRAPHY.[1]

HON. OWEN T. COFFIN.

Of the existing generation of public men, there is none who is more thoroughly identified with the public affairs of Westchester County than its present surrogate, Owen T. Coffin, who was born July 17, 1815, at Washington, Dutchess County, N. Y. He is descended from an honorable ancestry, being sixth in the line from Tristram Coffin, who came from Devonshire, England, and was subsequently chief magistrate of the island of Nantucket. The energy of the ancestor has been impressed upon his descendants and their name is identified with many of the most important business enterprises of the country. Among the most conspicuous of these descendants was Isaac Coffin, a gallant naval officer, who, previous to the Revolution, was in the British service, and rising to the rank of admiral, was knighted by his sovereign and received a grant of the Magdalen Islands, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, which are still in the possession of his family. He was afterwards a member of Parliament, and distinguished both as a wise and a witty legislator.

[1] The following biographical sketches of members of the Westchester County bench and bar were prepared and inserted in this chapter by the editor.

Orrin N. Coffin

Robert Coffin, the father of Owen T., was a thrifty farmer and a man of high standing and great influence in his town, of which he was a magistrate for many years, and although not a member, he was an adherent of the principles of the Society of Friends, which was very numerous in the section where he lived. Taking a great interest in the affairs of the State, he represented his county for a term or two in the Legislature. He married Magdalen, daughter of Taber Bentley and granddaughter of Col. James Vanderburgh, who was one of the most influential citizens of Beekman, Dutchess County, and a worthy representative of an ancient family, who came from Holland and settled in that region at an early day. He was a member of the Provincial Congress in 1776, and a zealous friend of the patriot cause. At his house Washington and Lafayette were frequently entertained, with many of their brother officers. The mother of the present surrogate possessed the characteristics of a true and noble-hearted woman, which greatly endeared her to her family and friends; like her husband, she was in sympathy with the principles of the Society of Friends, and excelled in those qualities which have made the members of that faith models of morality and virtue. Between herself and her children there existed a most affectionate confidence, and their joys and sorrows were made her own.

The children of Robert and Magdalen Coffin were ten in number. Jane, the oldest (now deceased), married Caleb Morgan, of Poughkeepsie, and Alexander H., the second child, is living in that city. Hezekiah R., Charles and Sarah, wife of Henry M. Swift, live in Dutchess County. Eliza married George B. Caldwell, of Poughkeepsie. George W. is mayor of Santa Barbara, Cal. William H., deceased, left a family now living in New York, and Robert G. is on the old homestead, about half a mile south of the village of Mechanic, Washington township, Dutchess County.

Owen T. Coffin was the seventh child and the fourth son, and remained on the farm with his parents, assisting them during the summer and attending the excellent Quaker school in the winter months. When fourteen years old he was sent to the academy at Sharon, Conn., and thence to Kinderhook Academy, where he was distinguished for his assiduous attention to study and for his great fondness for mathematics, in which he attained proficiency. Entering Union College in 1833, he graduated in 1837 with great credit in the same class with Hon. John K. Porter, judge of the Court of Appeals, between whom and himself there has been a constant friendship. After leaving college he began the study of law in the office of Judge Rufus W. Peckham, and for a time had charge of the portion of his business usually attended to by a managing clerk. Upon his admission to the bar, in 1840, he established practice in Carmel, Putnam County, where he remained two years, gaining a large business and winning respect and confidence. In 1845 he became a member of the well-known law-firm of Johnston, Coffin & Emott, of Poughkeepsie. He retired from the firm to form a copartnership with General Leonard Maison, a distinguished lawyer and prominent in State affairs. He continued the practice of his profession in Poughkeepsie, holding several places of trust, among them the office of district attorney, until 1851, when he received an invitation from Hon. W. Nelson and his son, W. R. Nelson, to associate himself with them as a partner in a law-office established in Peekskill, and, having accepted the invitation, he removed to this county, which has since been his place of residence. In 1871 he was elected surrogate of Westchester County, re-elected in 1876 and again in 1882, and holds the office at present.

When one considers the extent of Westchester County, its wealth and population, it is evident that the office of surrogate is one of the most important in the gift of the people. The incumbent is frequently called upon to decide questions of the greatest importance and involving extensive interests.

To the solution of these questions Mr. Coffin has applied with unceasing industry the powers of an active and vigorous mind, well stored with legal knowledge, and a reputation for honor and integrity which renders his opinions and decisions worthy of the respect and confience of his legal brethren, and of the entire community. To determine these questions requires a thorough knowledge of the statutory law, and a familiar acquaintance with the cases in which the brightest lights of legal science have given their interpretations of law. That Mr. Coffin possesses these qualities in the fullest degree is a fact that is fully recognized, and it is the unanimous opinion of those most capable to judge that of all who have held the office in Westchester Co., no one deserves to occupy a higher rank, and few have had a more extensive acquaintance with the members of the legal profession in the State of New York. To mention even a tithe of them would far exceed these limits, but it is sufficient to state that he had abundant opportunity of witnessing the efforts and studying the methods of such "legal giants" as Daniel Cady, Joshua A. Spencer, Greene C. Bronson, Hiram Denio, Ambrose L. Jordan, and others famous for learning and eloquence.

Mr. Coffin married Belinda E., daughter of Gen. Leonard Maison, in 1842. By this marriage he had three children, two of whom died in early childhood, and one, Elizabeth, wife of the late Edward B. Platt, is living in Dutchess County. Mrs. Coffin died in 1856, and, in 1858, he was again married to Harriette, daughter of the late Dr. Samuel Bancroft Barlow, and a sister of S. L. M. Barlow, of New York City. On her father's side, Mrs. Coffin is related to Joel Barlow, the distinguished author of "The Columbiad," and on her mother's to Major Charles Wadsworth, who, when Sir Edmund Andros demanded the charter of Connecticut, snatched it in the darkness caused by the sudden extinction of the lights, and hastened to conceal it in the famous "Charter Oak."

By this second marriage Mr. Coffin has two children, Magdalen Bentley and Samuel Barlow, who is now a student in Union College. A third child died in infancy.

Previous to his election as surrogate he was elected, in 1859, supervisor of the town of Cortlandt, but declined all offers of re-election. He takes a deep interest in educational matters, and has been for twenty-five years president of the board of trustees of the Peekskill Academy. For many years he has been a member and warden of the Episcopal Church at Peekskill, and a regular attendant upon and devout participator in its services.

In the words of one who has known him for many years—"Though past his sixty-ninth year, Mr. Coffin is still in the vigor of active life. This is no doubt owing to the regularity of his habits and his great fondness for out-door work in field and garden. No one is more systematic in his industry. By it he is enabled to discharge promptly all official duties, to give considerable time to general reading and to work every day with his own hands on his ample grounds situated on the river-bank at Peekskill, which Barry Gray named Sunset Hill. Should a stranger call there in the early morn, or just before the close of day, in the season for it, and when the weather is propitious, and should he encounter a slender man, in shirt sleeves, with a sharp face, aquiline nose, bright, but fixed and cheery look, iron-gray beard and hair, the whole head General Jackson like, and should he receive frank and cordial reception, enlivened with some sportive remark, he may know that he is face to face with Owen T. Coffin, surrogate of Westchester County."

EDWARD WELLS.

Mr. Wells, a leading member of the bar of Westchester County, was born in Durham, Greene County, New York, December 2, 1818. His father, Noah Wells, was a native of Colchester, New London County, Conn., where he married Dimmis, daughter of David Kilbourne. Both families came from England, and their genealogies have been published by their members. The ancestry of Mr. Wells, on his father's side, has been very thoroughly traced in the "History of the Wells Family," by the late Albert Wells, of New York, a work of the greatest value, and embracing the results of extended research; and his genealogy on his mother's side appears in the "History of the Kilbourne Family," written by Hon. Payne Kenyon Kilbourne.

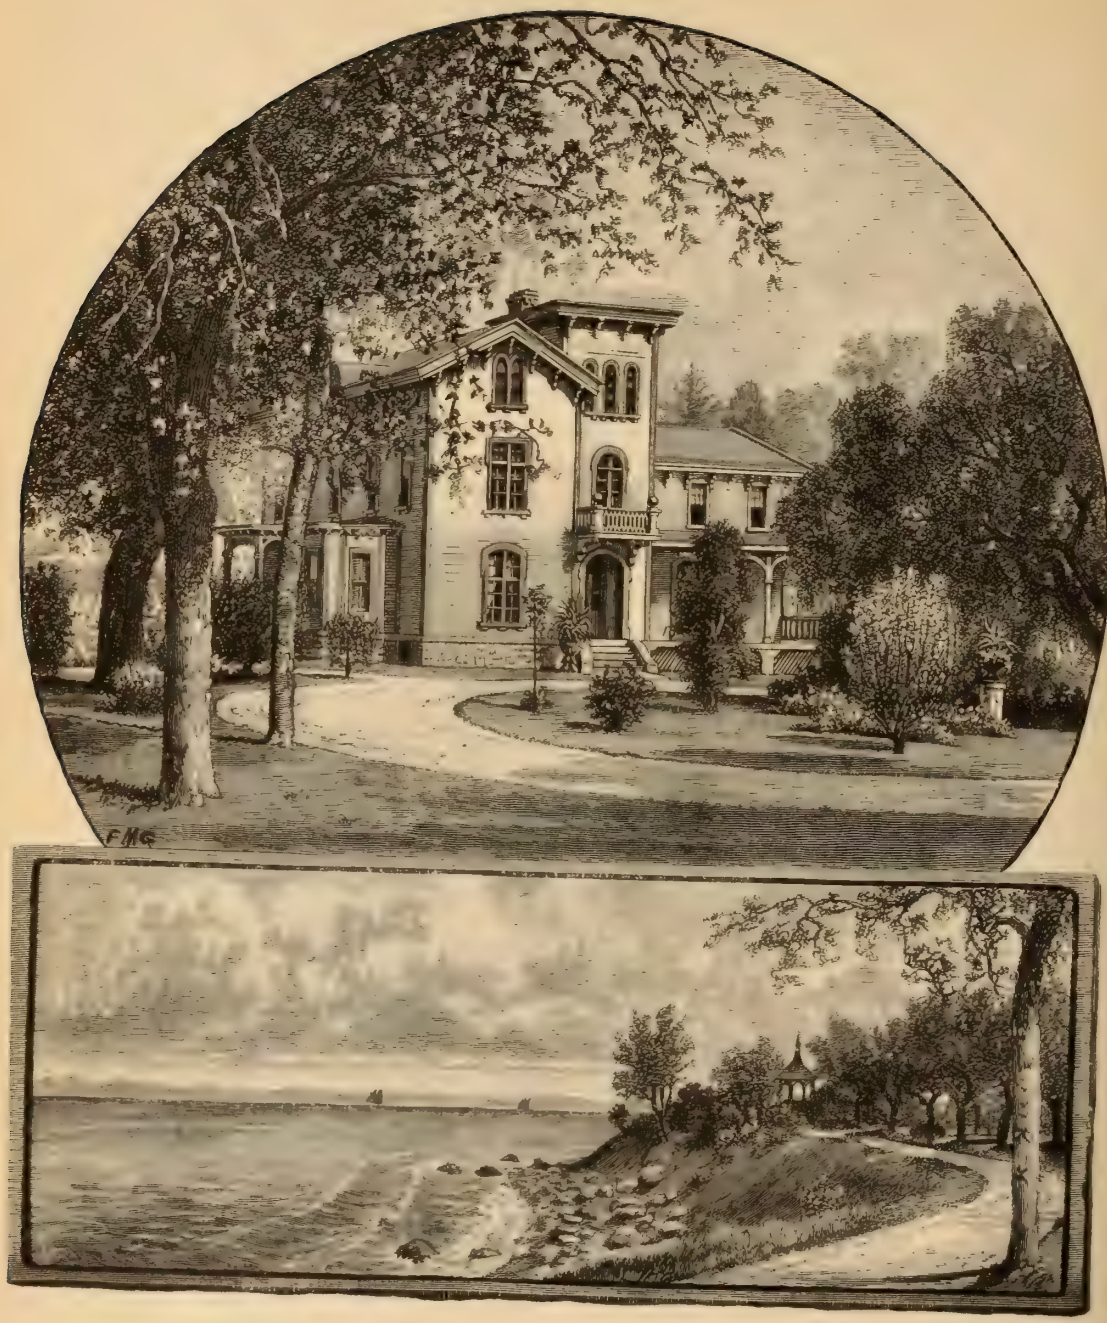
The children of Noah Wells were Rev. Noah H.; Albert, who was thirty years principal of Peekskill Military Academy; Mary E., wife of Hiram Bell (deceased), of East Haddam, Conn.; Francis H., a prominent lawyer of San Francisco, Cal.; and Edward.

Noah Wells removed to Greene County in 1810, and died in June, 1829. His widow then removed to Fishkill Landing, in Dutchess County, and her son Edward was fitted for college at Newburgh Academy, which was then under the management of his brother Albert, who was his guardian. In 1835 they removed to Sing Sing, where he continued his studies at Mount Pleasant Academy, then under his brother's charge, and at the conclusion of his preparatory course entered Yale College and graduated in 1839. He returned to Sing Sing and studied law in the office of General Aaron Ward, who was associated with Albert Lockwood, and remained till 1842, being for a portion of the time assistant teacher in Mount Pleasant Academy. He then removed to White Plains and studied with Minott Mitchell, was admitted to the bar as attorney and solicitor in October, 1842, and in 1845 as counselor-at-law.

Upon his admission he removed to Peekskill and established his practice in partnership with John Currey. This partnership was dissolved five years later. Mr. Wells has continued the business till the present time, and has established not only an extensive practice, but a highly honorable reputation as a counselor. In 1850 he was nominated by the Whigs for district attorney, was elected by a majority of three hundred and thirty and at the conclusion of his term re-elected by the largely increased majority of one thousand one hundred, and declining a nomination for a third term, devoted his time and labors to the practice of his profession.

He has ever taken an active part in all efforts to promote the moral welfare of the community and was for several years president of the Westchester County Bible Society. He is a zealous advocate of the temperance cause and fearlessly supports its principles. At the formation of the Republican party in 1854, he found its views coincident with his own, and has ever since been a prominent member of that organization. Fervid in his opposition to slavery, he was a firm supporter of the Union in the war which ended in the destruction of the system which had so long been a blot on the nation.

He married Hannah Hamill, daughter of Rev. Charles W. Nassau, D.D., of Lawrenceville, N. J., who was formerly a professor and for a time the president of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa. Their children are Edward, Jr., who graduated from Yale College in 1884; Charles Nassau, now a student of Lafayette College; and Anna Hamill, who resides with her parents at Peekskill.



Mr. Wells is a man of extensive learning, the possessor of a large and valuable library, well versed in general literature, and especially in the study of Roman civil law, and holds an honorable position as a member of the legal fraternity.

CHARLES THORN CROMWELL.

Mr. Cromwell is a descendant of the famous family whose history was for so many years identified with that of the British Empire. Among his ancestry are enrolled the names of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, Secretary of State to Henry VIII., who was beheaded July 28, 1540; Sir Henry Cromwell, of Hinchinbrook, surnamed, for his munificence, the Golden Knight; Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of England, and many others.[1]

Two nephews of the Lord Protector came to this country; one settled in South Carolina and the other in Westchester County. It is from the Westchester branch of the family that Charles Thorn Cromwell is descended. His father, John I. Cromwell, who married Elizabeth Thorn, of Glen Cove, L. I., was a wholesale dry-goods merchant in New York City until the war was declared, in 1812, with Great Britain.

At that time he gave up his business, and, raising a company of volunteers, marched with it to the northern frontier, becoming actively engaged there in most of the battles which took place. He was appointed second lieutenant of artillery and was in command of a company at the battle of Plattsburg, where he also acted as quartermaster. His bravery won for him the respect and esteem of his superior officers, and he was brevetted first lieutenant as a reward of merit. Many flattering letters from the generals under whom he served, from time to time, are still in the possession of his son, notable among which is an autograph note from Major-General McComb.

At the close of the war his name was honorably mentioned in general orders and the government offered him a position upon the peace establishment, which he declined, in order that he might retire from active life, which he did. Removing to Glen Cove, he purchased a farm and resided upon it until his death, in 1824.

Charles Thorn Cromwell, his third child, was born in New York, May 8, 1808. After attending private schools at Jamaica and Flushing, L. I., he entered Union College, graduating in 1829. While there, with three others, all of whom are now dead, he organized the "Sigma Phi Society." After his graduation he entered the law-office of Minott Mitchell, at White Plains, N. Y., and remained with him two years, when, with two friends, he made a tour of Europe. He spent a year in most interesting and profitable diversion, and then returned to New York and was admitted to the bar.

He opened an office in the city, where he remained for many years, building up for himself an extensive and lucrative practice. Twenty years ago he retired from business, though his name is still connected with the legal firm which he organized, and whose office is at No. 21 Park Row.

[1] For a full account of the Cromwell family, see "Foster's British Statesmen," vi. 2; also, "Carlyle's Letters and Speeches of Cromwell," i. 32–40.

During his active career Mr. Cromwell handled many prominent cases with such skill as to win for himself not only a high reputation in commercial centres, but also the regard and respect of the entire profession.

For many years he has lived in his beautiful residence on Manersing Island, near Port Chester, spending his winters in New York.

He is a member of Christ Church (Episcopal) and was formerly one of its vestrymen, having contibuted largely toward its erection. He married Henrietta Amelia Brooks, daughter of Benjamin Brooks, of Bridgeport, Conn. She is a descendant of Colonel John Jones and Theophilus Eaton, first Governor of the colony of New Haven. There were three children, one of whom (the eldest son) was drowned from a yacht in Long Island Sound. Those surviving are Oliver Eaton and Henrietta, who married John De Ruyter.

Mr. Cromwell, though well along in life, still retains his strength, and his name continues to be associated with every progressive and benevolent movement in and about the village which is the home of his choice. He is at present one of the oldest living members of the St. Nicholas Club.

WILLIAM PATTERSON VAN RENSSELAER.

Mr. Van Rensselaer was the second son of the patroon, Stephen Van Rensselaer, of Albany, and was born March 6, 1805. His mother was a daughter of Judge William Paterson, of New Jersey. After graduating at Yale College, in 1824, he was commissioned aid-de-camp to Governor De Witt Clinton, with the title of colonel, which post he soon relinquished, and from 1826 spent four years in Europe, traveling extensively and pursuing legal studies in Edinburgh.

Upon his return he entered the office of Peter A. Jay, then a well-known lawyer in New York. For a number of years afterward he resided in Albany and Rensselaer County, but the last twenty years of his life were spent at his home at Manursing Island, near Rye, Westchester County. He died in New York, November 13, 1872.

He inherited from his distinguished father many noted characteristics. Conspicuous among these was a true simplicity. Free from all pretension and eminently unselfish, he found his happiness in a life of retirement and in unobtrusive but earnest endeavors to do good. A genuine sympathy with works of Christian benevolence was another inherited trait. He was an attentive observer of the great and philanthropic movements of the day and a most liberal supporter of every worthy cause whose claims were brought to his notice.

A man of noble impulses and clear convictions, he was no less decided in the rebuke of injustice and iniquity that in the approval of that which was good.

The uprightness and elevation, the kindliness and generosity of his nature, his fine intellectual gifts and high culture, and with all an unaffected humility, the fruit of true religion, made him the marked example of a Christian gentleman.

SAMUEL JONES TILDEN.

In an old-fashioned frame dwelling-house still standing, though considerably older than our Federal Constitution, Mr. Tilden was born on the 9th of February, 1814. The old homestead, where four generations of the family have been reared, fronts upon the long street which constitutes the back-bone of the village of New Lebanon, in the county of Columbia, in the State of New York.

Mr. Tilden's ancestry may be traced back to the latter part of the sixteenth century and to the county of Kent, in England, where the name is still most honorably associated with the army, the navy and the church. In 1634 Nathaniel Tilden was among the Puritans who left Kent to settle in America. Eleven years previous he had been mayor of Tenterden. He was succeeded in that office by his cousin John, as he had been preceded by his uncle John in 1585 and 1600. He removed with his family to Scituate, in the colony of Massachusetts, in 1634. He was one of the commissioners to locate that town, and the first recorded conveyance of any of its soil was made to him. His brother Joseph was one of the merchant adventurers of London who fitted out the "Mayflower." This Nathaniel Tilden married Hannah Bourne, one of whose sisters married a brother of Governor Winslow and another a son of Governor Bradford. Among the associates of Joseph Tilden in fitting out the "Mayflower" was Timothy Hatherby, who afterward married the widow of Nathaniel Tilden, and was a leading citizen of Scituate until expelled from public life for refusing to prosecute the Quakers.

Governor Tilden's grandfather, John Tilden, settled in Columbia County, since then uninterruptedly the residence of this branch of the Tilden family. The Governor's mother was descended from William Jones, Lieutenant-Governor of the colony of New Haven, who, in all the histories of Connecticut, is represented to have been the son of Col. John Jones, one of the regicide judges of Charles the First, who is said to have married a sister of Oliver Cromwell and a cousin of John Hamden. The Governor's father, a farmer and merchant of New Lebanon, was a man of notable judgment and practical sense and the accepted oracle of the county upon all matters of public concern, while his opinion was also eagerly sought and justly valued by all his neighbors, but by none more than by the late President Van Buren, who, till his death, was one of his most cherished and intimate personal friends.

Samuel J., after a suitable preparatory education at Williamstown, Massachusetts, was entered at Yale College in the class of 1833, where, however, in consequence of ill health, he was not able to complete the course. He concluded his collegiate studies at the New York University, and then took the course of law in that institution, at the same time entering the law-office of the late John W. Edmunds, then a prominent member of the New York bar. While yet in his teens he was a watchful student of the political situation, and tradition has preserved many interesting stories of his triumphs, both of speech and pen, in the political arena. Young and obscure as he then was, Presidents Jackson and Van Buren had few more effective champions in this State of the great measures of their respective administrations than this stripling from New Lebanon.

He was admitted to the bar in 1841. Four years before, and when only twenty-three years of age, he delivered a speech in Columbia County on the subject of "Prices and Wages," which not only attracted the attention and won the admiration of the leading political economists of that time, but is to-day one of perhaps the half-dozen most profound, comprehensive and instructive papers on that complicated subject now in print in any language.

Upon his admission to the bar, Mr. Tilden opened an office in Pine Street, in the city of New York, which will be remembered by his acquaintances of that period as a favorite resort for the leading Democrats, whether resident or casually on a visit to that city.

In 1844, in anticipation and preparation for the election which resulted in making James K. Polk President, and Silas Wright Governor of the State of New York, Mr. Tilden, in connection with John L. O'Sullivan, founded the newspaper called the Daily News, by far the ablest morning journal that had up to that time been enlisted in the service of the Democratic party. Its success was immediate and complete, and to its efficiency was largely due the success of the Democratic ticket that year. As Mr. Tilden did not propose to enter into journalism as a career, and had embarked in this enterprise merely for its bearing upon the Presidential campaign of 1844, he retired from it soon after the election, presenting his entire interest in the property to his colleague.

In the fall of 1845 he was sent to the Assembly from the city of New York, and while a member of that body was elected to the convention for remodeling the Constitution of the State, which was to commence its sessions a few weeks after the Legislature adjourned. In both of these bodies he was a conspicuous authority, and left a permanent impression upon the legislation of the year, and especially upon all the new constitutional provisions affecting the finances of the State and the management of its system of canals. In this work he was associated, by personal and political sympathy, most intimately with Governor Wright, Michael Hoffman and with Azariah C. Flagg, then the controller of the State, who had all learned to value very highly his counsel and co-operation.

The defeat of Mr. Wright in the fall of 1846, and the coolness which had grown up between the friends of President Polk and the friends of the late President Van Buren, resulted fortunately for Mr. Tilden, if not for the country, in withdrawing his attention from politics and concentrating it upon his profession. He inherited no fortune, but depended upon his own exertions for a livelihood. Thus far his labor for the State, or in his profession, had not been lucrative, and, despite his strong tastes and pre-eminent qualifications for political life, he was able to discern at that early period the importance, in this country at least, of a pecuniary independence for the successful prosecution of a political career. With an assiduity and a concentration of energy which has characterized all the transactions of his life, he now gave himself up to his profession. It was not many years before he became as well known at the bar as he had before been known as a politician. His business developed rapidly, and though he continued to take more or less interest in political matters, they were not allowed after 1857 to interfere with his professional duties.

From that time until 1869, when he again consecrated all his personal and professional energies to the reform of the municipal government of New York City, a period of about twenty years, his was nearly or quite the largest and most lucrative practice in the country conducted by any single barrister. During what may be termed the professional parts of his career he has associated his name imperishably with some of the most remarkable forensic struggles of our time.

It was, however, during this period of Mr. Tilden's life, in which he was devoting himself almost exclusively to his profession, that his name figures prominently in one of the most important political transactions in American history. The convention held in 1848 at Baltimore for the selection of a Presidential ticket to be supported by the Democratic party presumed to deny to the regular delegates from New York State, of whom Mr. Tilden was one, admission to their body upon equal terms with the delegates from other States, assigning as a reason that the convention which chose them had declared that the immunity from slavery contained in the Jeffersonian ordinance of 1787 should be applied to all the Territories of the Northwest, so long as they should remain under the government of Congress. Mr. Tilden was selected by his colleagues of the delegation to make their report to their constituents,—a report which helps to make the Utica Convention of June, 1848, one of the most momentous in the history of the country.

"With this intolerant proscription of the New York Democracy began the disastrous schism which was destined to rend in twain both the great parties of the country and practically to annihilate the political organization which had given a wise and beneficent government to the country for half a century. Then, too, and there were laid the foundations of the political conglomerate, which in 1860 acquired, and for a quarter of a century retained, uninterrupted control of our Federal Government. . . .

"Just twenty-eight years after the delegate from New York, who had been selected by his colleagues for the purpose, broke to their outraged constituents the story of their State's humiliation, that same delegate received the suffrages of a large majority of his countrymen for the highest honor in their gift; and to-day, through that delegate's influence, another citizen of New York who was nominated by a Democratic National Convention, which imposed no sectional tests, and who was elected without the vote of a single slaveholder, becomes the chief magistrate and most honored citizen of the Republic.

'The wheel is come full circle.'

and the bones of the Democratic party that were broken upon the cross of slavery in 1848, now, after an interval of thirty-six years, are once more knit together, and the traditions and the doctrines inherited from the golden age of the Republic are about to resume, not merely their official, but their moral supremacy in the nation." [1]

The four years from 1869 to 1873 were mainly devoted by Mr. Tilden to the overthrow of what was known as the Tweed Ring, which had thoroughly debauched every branch of the New York City government, legislative, executive and judicial, and was threatening the State government also with its foul embrace.

"The total surrender of my professional business during that period," he has said in one of his published communications, "the nearly absolute withdrawal of attention from my private affairs, and from all enterprises in which I am interested, have cost me a loss of actual income, which, with expenditures and contributions the contest has required, would be a respectable endowment of a public charity.

"I do not speak of these things," he adds, "to regret them. In my opinion, no instrumentality in human society is so potential in its influence on the well-being of mankind as the governmental machinery which administers justice and makes and executes laws. No benefaction of private benevolence could be so fruitful in benefits as the rescue of this machinery from the perversion which had made it a means of conspiracy, fraud and crime against the rights and the most sacred interests of a great community."

When Mr. Tilden thus wrote he had not experienced nor could he have foreseen the legal consummation of his labors in the arrest, imprisonment or flight of all the parties who, only a few months before, seemed to hold the wealth and power of the Empire State in the hollow of their hands, nor the condemnation of Tweed to the striped jacket and cell of a felon, nor the recovery of verdicts which promised to restore to the city treasury many millions of ill-gotten plunder.

Nor could he have foreseen, among the most direct and immediate results of his labors for the purification of the New York City and State governments, his election as Governor in the fall of 1874, by a majority of more than fifty thousand over General Dix, the Republican candidate.

The talents and public virtues which, as a municipal reformer, won the confidence of the people of his native State and made him Governor, on this new and wider theatre won the confidence and admiration of the nation and made him its choice by a considerable popular majority for the Presidency in 1876. It was not, however, in the order of Providence that he or the people were to enjoy the legitimate fruits of this latter victory.

When Congress convened in the winter of 1876–77, and proceeded to discharge its constitutional duty of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, it appeared that there were one hundred and eighty-four uncontested electoral votes for Samuel J. Tilden for President and for Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, one hundred and sixty-five uncontested electoral votes for Rutherford B. Hayes for President and William A. Wheeler for Vice-President, and twenty votes in dispute. One hundred and eighty-five votes were necessary for a choice; consequently, one additional vote to Tilden and Hendricks would have elected them, while twenty additional votes were required for the election of the rival candidates. The whole election, therefore, depended upon one electoral vote. This gave to the mode of counting the vote an importance which it had never possessed at any of the twenty-one previous elections in the history of our government.

The provisions of the Constitution relating to the mode of counting the vote were sufficiently vague to furnish a pretext for some diversity of opinion upon the subject, wherein the temptation to find one was so great. A majority of the Senate being Republicans and a majority of the House of Representatives being Democrats, that the Senate would not agree to to count any one of these twenty votes for Tilden and Hendricks was assumed; and to avoid a conflict of jurisdiction, which was thought by some to threaten the peace of the country, a special tribunal, to consist of members of Congress and of the Supreme Court, fifteen in number, was created, upon which the duty of counting the electoral vote was devolved by an act of Congress. One of the members of this tribunal was classified as an Independent, seven as Republicans and seven as Democrats. The Republicans voted to count all the votes of the three contested States for Hayes, and the Independent, voted with them, and the candidate elected to the Presidency by a considerable popular majority was compelled to give place to the candidate of a minority.

The circumstances under which Mr. Tilden was deprived of the Presidency made it inconvenient, indeed impossible, to obey the counsels and warnings of declining health to lay down the leadership of the great party whose unexampled wrong was represented in his person, until he could surrender it into the hands of its proper national representatives. As soon, however, as the National Democratic Convention assembled in 1880, he felt constrained to address to the chairman of the New York delegation the memorable letter in which he proclaimed his well-considered intention to retire from public life, for the labors of which he had long felt his health and strength were unequal. In 1884 he was obliged to repeat his resolution, to prevent his nomination by the delegates to the National Convention, who were almost unanimously chosen because of their avowed partiality for Mr. Tilden as their candidate, notwithstanding his impaired and failing health. Finding it impossible to obtain his consent to run, the convention accepted a candidate of his choice from the State which he had served so long and faithfully, and his choice was ratified by the nation at the general election.

Mr. Tilden is now enjoying the repose he has so fully earned, and such health as repose only could confer, at his princely home of Greystone on the banks of the Hudson, now the pilgrim's shrine of the reinstated party, which Jefferson planted and which Jackson and Van Buren watered.

"He is one of the few surviving statesmen who had the good fortune to receive early political training in the golden age of the Democratic party, when public measures were thoroughly tested by the Constitution and by public opinion, and when by ample debate the voters of the whole nation were educated, not only to embrace, but also to comprehend, the principles upon which their government was conducted,—a training to which his subsequent political career bears continual testimony. Whatever heresies of doctrine have crept into our public policy since those days, the responsibility for them will not rest with him. In all the papers and speeches with which from time to time he has endeavored to enlighten his countrymen, it will be difficult to find a line or a thought not in harmony with the teachings of the eminent statesmen who, during the first fifty years of our national history, traced the limits and defined the functions of constitutional Democracy in America. From that epoch to this there has been scarcely a question of public concern having its roots in the Constitution which Mr. Tilden has not carefully considered and more or less thoroughly treated. He was a champion of the Union and of President Jackson against the Nullifiers and Mr. Calhoun. He denounced the American system of Mr. Clay as unconstitutional, inequitable and sectional. He vindicated the removal of the government deposits from the United States Bank by President Jackson, and exploded the sophistical doctrine of its lawyers that the Treasury is not an executive department. He vindicated President Van Buren from the charge made by William Leggett of unbecoming subserviency to the Slaveholding States in his Inaugural Address. He was among the first to insist upon free banking under general laws, thus opening the business equally to all, and abolishing the monopoly which was a nearly universal superstition. He exposed the perils of banking upon public funds. He advocated the divorce of bank and State, and the establishment of a sub-treasury. He asserted the supervisory control of the Legislature over corporations of its own creation. He exposed the enormities of Mr. Webster's scheme to pledge the public lands for the payment of the debts of the States. He drew and vindicated in a profoundly learned and able report the Act which put an end to the discontents of the New York 'Anti-renters.' He wrote the protest of the Democracy of New York against making the nationalization of slavery a test of party fealty. He was the first, we believe, to assign statesmanlike reasons for opposing coercive temperance legislation. He pointed out, as no one had done before, the danger of sectionalizing the government. He planned the campaign, he secured the requisite legislation, he bore much the largest share of the expense, and, finally, he led the storming-party which drove Tweed and his predatory associates to prison or into exile. He purified the judiciary of the city and State of New York by procuring the adoption of measures which resulted in the removal of one judge by impeachment and of two judges by resignation. He induced the Democratic Convention of 1874 to declare, in no uncertain tone, for a sound currency, when not a single State Convention of either party had yet ventured to take a stand against the financial delusions begotten of the war, which for years had been sapping the credit of the country. It was at his instance that the Democratic party of New York, in the same Convention, pronounced against third-term Presidents, and effectively strengthened the exposed intrenchments which the country, for eighty years and more, had been erecting against the insidious encroachments of dynasticism. During his career as Governor Mr. Tilden applied the principles of the political school in which he had been educated to the new questions which time, civil war and national affluence had made paramount. He overthrew the Canal Ring, which had become ascendant in all the departments of the State government. He dispersed the lobby which infested the legislative bodies. He introduced a practical reform in the civil service of this State, and elevated the standard of official morality. In his messages he exposed the weakness and inadequacy of the financial policy of the party in power, the mismanagement of our canal system, the Federal assaults upon State sovereignty, and the pressing need of radical reforms both in the State and Federal administrations." [1]

It is due to Mr. Tilden, also, to say that he has rarely discussed any matter of public concern without planting the structure of his argument upon the solid ground of fundamental principles. Always cautious in the selection of his facts, singularly moderate in his statements and temperate in his language, he, better than perhaps any other statesman of our time, can afford to be judged by his record. Who that has figured so prominently in public affairs has said or written less that he would prefer not to have said; less that his maturer judgment cannot approve; less that will not commend itself to the deliberate judgment of thoughtful men and to an unprejudiced posterity?

HON. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW.

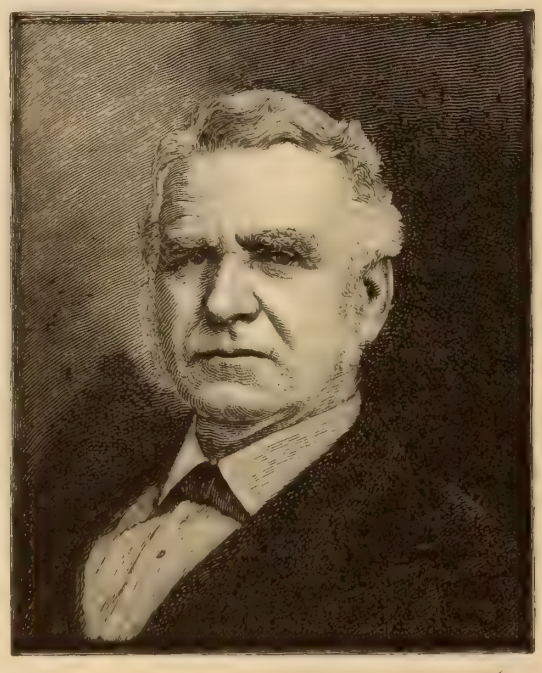
Mr. Depew, distinguished as a lawyer and statesman, was born at Peekskill, April 23, 1834. His ancestry was of the Huguenot race, from which have sprung so many noble men to make immortal names in history. His family were early settled at Peekskill, where his father, Isaac Depew, resided on the farm which had been the home of his ancestors for two hundred years. His early years were spent on the old homestead, and his education was finished at Yale College, where he graduated in 1856. Resolved to enter the legal profe-sion, he studied law with Hon. William Nelson, was admitted to the bar in 1858, and commenced practice in his native town. His natural ability, sound knowledge of the law and great oratorical talent caused his rapid advancement. In his youth he took part in politics, was a delegate to the Republican State Convention in 1858, and a distinguished and effective speaker in the campaign of 1860. In every Presidential contest from that time to the present, his speeches have been listened to by thousands of his fellow-citizens, and his opinions have never failed to attract attention and command respect. At the beginning of the war he was adjutant of the Eighteenth Regiment N. Y. V., and served three months. In 1861 he was elected member of Assembly, and re-elected in 1862. His legislative career, which was marked with great ability, prepared the way for a still higher position, and in 1863 he was elected Secretary of State. He received, but declined, the appointment of commissioner of emigration, but served for one year as tax commissioner for the city of New York. In 1866 he received from President Johnson the appointment of minister to Japan,—a position which he resigned after holding the commission for one month. He was appointed one of the commissioners of the new capitol at Albany in 1871. The Liberal Republican party gave Mr. Depew the nomination for Governor in 1872; but he, together with the rest of the ticket, failed of election. During the controversy which led to the resignation of Hon. Roscoe Conkling as United States Senator, Mr. Depew was one of the most prominent among the candidates proposed as his successor, but withdrew his name in the interests of harmony. He was appointed one of the regents of the university in 1877, a position which he still retains. For several years he was vice-president and general counsel for the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, and is now (1886) president of the road,—a position which furnishes ample scope for his abilities.

Among the prominent orators of the day, there are few who have been more frequently called upon to deliver addresses upon occasions of public importance. A speech delivered in the Legislature, in 1862, upon the subject of "State Finances" has been considered one of his best efforts, and attracted wide attention. On the 4th of July, 1876, he delivered the centennial oration at Sing Sing, and made a brilliant address at Kingston on July 30, 1877, the anniversary of the formation of the State government. On September 23, 1880, he addressed a large assembly at Tarrytown, in commemoration of the capture of Major Andre, and he was the orator of the day upon the occasion of unveiling the statue of Alexander Hamilton, in Central Park. At the election of a United States Senator, in 1885, he was tendered the nomination by all divisions of the Republican party, but declined to be considered a candidate, and the choice fell upon Hon. William M. Evarts.

Upon his maternal side, Mr. Depew is connected with the family of the celebrated Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, his mother being a granddaughter of the sister of that illustrious statesman.

He married, in 1871, Elise, daughter of William Hegeman, Esq., of New York, and has one son, who bears his father's name.

FRANCIS LARKIN.



Francis Larkin, well and prominently known among the legal fraternity of Westchester County, was born at Sing Sing, August 9, 1820. His father, John Larkin, came from the neighborhood of Belfast, Ireland, and after his arrival in this country, married Elizabeth Knox, who was also born in Ireland, near Donegal. The early part of Mr. Larkin's life was passed on a farm, upon which he worked till he attained his majority. After teaching school for a while, he resolved to study for the legal profession, and entered the office of Richard R. Voris, Esq., who was a prominent lawyer, and District Attorney of the County. In 1847 he was admitted to the bar as attorney and counsellor at law. Immediately after his admission he established his practice in Sing Sing, and has continued it to the present time, and by strict attention to the duties of his profession, has established an enviable reputation, commanding the confidence of a very extended clientage. He has been a member of the Republican party, and received its nomination for Congress, in 1864, but as the district was strongly Democratic, his opponent, Hon. William Radford, was elected.

He has held the offices of trustee and president of the village of Sing Sing, and justice of the peace, and in 1851 was elected supervisor of the town of Ossining, in which positions he performed the duties of the offices to the entire satisfaction of the community.

He was married April 1, 1852, to Sarah E., daughter of Ebenezer Hobby, of New York. Their children are Mary E., wife of Adrian H. Joline, a prominent lawyer of New York City; Sarah, wife of Dr. Joel Madden; Frank, who married Lily, daughter of George A. Brandreth; John, Adrian H., and Alice. Of these Frank and John are practicing lawyers, and both graduates of Princeton College, and the youngest son, Adrian H., is now a student at the same institution. The youngest daughter is at present studying at the school for young ladies under the tuition of Miss Dana, at Morristown, N. J.

Francis Purdy

HON. SAMUEL PURDY.

The family of which Mr. Purdy is a representative has long been settled in Westchester County, their ancestor being Francis Purdy, who was living in Fairfield, Conn., previous to 1659. The line of descent is as follows,—1st, Francis; 2d, John; 3d, Joseph; 4th, Jonathan; 5th, Jonathan; 6th, Benjamin; 7th, Sylvanus; 8th, Samuel M.

Sylvanus Purdy, the father of Samuel M., married Effalinda, daughter of Andrew Purdy, of East Chester, and his son was born at the homestead of his maternal grandfather, August 28, 1824. This homestead (which was on the farm formerly belonging to Bartholomew Ward, and sold by him to Andrew Purdy), stood in what is now the village of Mount Vernon, at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Fourth Street, on the east side, and now belongs to the heirs of John Stevens. The early boyhood of Mr. Purdy was passed at this place, and at the age of twelve he went to Mamaroneck, and attended a school taught by John M. Ward, a well-known teacher of that day. Here he prepared to enter Columbia College, a plan which he afterwards abandoned, and at the conclusion of his school term he entered, in 1843, the law office of Samuel E. Lyon. In this office he remained four years, was then admitted to the bar, and established his practice at West Farms. During his first year there he was elected to the offices of Justice of the peace and town clerk, and has been continuously re-elected to the former position. He was elected supervisor of the town of West Farm, and held that office in 1855, 1856, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867 and 1868, being four times elected without opposition, and at the other elections by a very large majority. In 1867 he was elected member of Assembly by a majority of eight hundred and twenty, and served on the committee on internal affairs. The following year he was re-elected, and was re-appointed on the above-named committee.

His practice as a lawyer has been almost entirely confined to real estate. In this branch of legal knowledge he has few equals, and it may be safely said that there is no one who is more thoroughly conversant with the history of the land titles in this county. He is constantly called upon to decide questions concerning ancient boundaries, the locations of which have passed from memory. The amount of money invested upon the security of real estate in this county, and of which he has the charge and oversight, exceeds a million dollars, which shows better than any words can express, the confidence which is placed in him by the community where his clientage is so large.

He was in early life a Whig, but joined the Democratic party at the election of Buchanan, and has ever since been connected with it.

He married, in 1847, Rachel, daughter of Caleb Purdy, of Harrison. Their only son, Caleb, a young man of great promise, died, in 1869, soon after his graduation from Columbia College.

Mr. Purdy is a member of the Episcopal Church, and now holds the position of senior warden, and is superintendent of the Sabbath-school.

Soon after establishing his practice at West Farms

Samuel M Purdy

he purchased the homestead formerly belonging to Dr. William Hoffman, on the west side of Main Street, or the old Boston Post Road, which has ever since been his residence.

Mr. Purdy is a type of the self-made man. Commencing with small means he has accumulated a competency ; by strict attention to business, and by his integrity and honesty of purpose, he has gained what is of still greater importance, the confidence and respect of the entire community.

WILLIAM AUGUSTUS BEACH.

On Broadway in Tarrytown stands the handsome stone mansion, which for four years previous to his death was the residence of William Augustus Beach, formerly a leading lawyer in New York City, and is at present occupied by his family.

Mr. Beach was born at Saratoga Springs, New York, December 10, 1809. His father, Miles Beach, was an early settler and successful merchant in that village. His mother, whose maiden name was Catharine Warren, was a first cousin of General Warren of Revolutionary fame. Augustus (as Mr. Beach was usually known) received no college education. He studied law in his native village and for some years after his admission to the bar was engaged there in the practice of his profession. In the law firm of which he was a member, Nicholas Hill, Jr., and Augustus Bockes, who was later a supreme court judge of that district, were the other partners. From the first, he showed remarkable powers in influencing juries to the conclusions he desired, and a keenness in seizing upon the points of advantage in his cases, and he soon acquired a local reputation as an advocate of ability.

In 1851 he removed to Troy, New York, where he made his residence for the next twenty years. In this new and larger field, he achieved a proportionately greater fame and success. He founded the firm of Pearson, Beach & Smith, which later, on the retirement of Hon. Job Pearson, became Beach & Smith. Legal interests of great importance were intrusted to his care, and he became attorney and counsel for all the large railroad corporations in the city.

When the Hudson River Bridge Company secured articles of incorporation for the purpose of bridging the Hudson River at Albany, the city of Troy, which was opposed to the building of the bridge, engaged Mr. Beach to endeavor to prevent its construction by an appeal to the courts. A preliminary injunction was obtained enjoining the bridge company from proceeding with their work,but an attempt to have the injunction made permanent resulted in the case being carried into the Supreme Court of the United States, where the bill of complaint was dismissed.

During the administration of Governor Seymour, while the Civil War was in progress, Mr. Beach was retained to defend Col. North and others, who were charged with tampering with the votes of soldiers. This case was carried into the Supreme Court of the United States, where, during that time of high political excitement, it occasioned widespread interest. Mr. Beach not only succeeded in procuring the acquittal of his clients, but also laid the foundation for the proceedings which ended in the discontinuance of the system of substituting military inquisitions for authorized civil courts. His argument was listened to by Senators and Representatives and his skillful conduct of the case made him the recipient of many enthusiastic manifestations of approbation.

In 1868 he obtained the acquittal before the courts of impeachment of canal commissioner Robert C. Dorn.

During his residence in Troy he was frequently tendered the nomination to a judgeship, but declined the honor. The title of judge, however, was commonly prefixed to his name.

In 1871 he removed to New York, where he commanded at once a large practice, and was pitted in the legal arena against the foremost lawyers of the city. He took the place of Charles A. Rapallo, now a justice of the New York Court of Appeals, in the firm of Rapallo, Daly & Brown. Afterwards on the withdrawal of Mr. Daly, the firm became Beach & Brown. Their office was in the Herald building. Mr. Beach became engaged in a number of noteworthy cases. In the action brought by the Erie Railway Company against Wm. H. Vanderbilt, popularly known as the five million dollar suit, Messrs. Beach and Rapallo were retained by Mr. Vanderbilt, and succeeded in obtaining a verdict in his favor. In the celebrated suit of Bowen vs. Chase, which involved the title to the valuable real estate left by Madame Jumel, Mr. Beach appeared for the plaintiff and was opposed by Charles O'Connor. The trial lasted for over a month, and resulted in the disagreement of the jury.

In the prosecution of Edward S. Stokes for the murder of James Fisk, Jr., he assisted the district attorney, with the result that Stokes was convicted of murder in the first degree. In a re-hearing of the case Mr. Beach did not appear and the decision was reversed. When Frank Walworth was tried for killing his father Mr. Beach and Charles O'Connor defended him, and Mr. Beach refused any remuneration for his services.

Perhaps the most widely known of his cases was the suit brought by Theodore Tilton against Henry Ward Beecher. He was senior counsel for Mr. Tilton and was assisted by Wm. Fullerton, General Roger A. Pryor, Samuel D. Morris and Thomas E. Pearsall. For Mr. Beecher appeared William M. Evarts, John K. Porter, Austin Abbott, Benjamin F. Tracy, Thomas G. Shearman, John L. Hill and John W. Sterling. In summing up the evidence for Mr. Tilton, Mr. Beach occupied the sessions of the court from June 10th to June 23d, 1875. The result of this trial, as is well known, was the disagreement of the jury.

After this time his activity in the pursuit of his profession began to decrease. For ten or fifteen years previous to his death he suffered from heart disease, which gradually grew worse, and in the first half of 1884 his condition became very serious. The immediate cause of his death was a congestive chill, taken at the house of his physician, at Tarrytown, at one o'clock Saturday afternoon, June 28, 1884. He was removed to his own home on Broadway, in Tarrytown, and died there at forty minutes past three o'clock the same afternoon.

In person he was somewhat above the medium height and well proportioned. He had a massive head and regular and strongly marked features. His white hair, which only partly covered his head, when brushed back, as he always wore it, showed a broad, full forehead. He wore a chin beard which, in his advanced years, was white. In disposition he was genial.

He left a wife and six children. He married Jennie Wilson, daughter of Jesse Wilson, of Albany, in 1858. His children were Captain Warren Beach, at present a member of General Hancock's staff; Judge Miles Beach, of the Court of Common Pleas in New York; John Beach, of Knoxville, Tenn.; Anna, wife of Walter S. Appleton, of the firm of D. Appleton & Co.; William, aged eleven years; and George, aged ten years.

J. MALCOLM SMITH.

The ancestors of Mr. Smith have been citizens of Westchester County for many generations past. His great grandfather, John Smith, was a tenant and afterward the owner of one of the farms of the Manor of Phillipsburg. This homestead, situated about two miles east of Sing Sing, he left by will to his son Caleb Smith, who died in 1832, at an advanced age. The latter married Elizabeth Sherwood, and they were the parents of a large family. One of their sons Isaac C. Smith, was born in 1797, and married Maria, daughter of George Titlar, who came when a child to this country from the north of Ireland, was a soldier during the Revolution, and one of the company who laid the great chain across the Hudson River at West Point. Mr. Smith died in 1877, leaving three children,—George T., Cornelia (wife of James T. Stratton, of Oakland, Cal., late United States Surveyor-General of that State), and J. Malcolm Smith, who was born in New York, March 11, 1823, while his parents were residing temporarily in that city, but removed with them to Sing Sing in early infancy. His father was desirous of giving him a collegiate education, and with that view he attended the preparatory school at Middletown, Conn., and subsequently entered the Wesleyan University. Here he continued till he passed the sophomore examination, when he was compelled to leave college on account of ill health, and was principally engaged in outdoor pursuits until past the age of thirty. During this time he studied law, was admitted to the bar and established his practice at Sing Sing, where he remained till 1868. While a resident Mr. Smith was elected one of the trustees of the village, and was also elected justice of the peace for three successive terms. He was for a number of years one of the loan commissioners for Westchester County, and for five years prior to 1867 clerk of the Board of Supervisors. At the general election in 1867 he was made county clerk of Westchester County and removed to White Plains in 1868. Finding the records and business of the important office, to which he had been chosen, in great confusion, as reported by a committee of the Board of Supervisors, he, upon taking possession of the office, at once devoted himself to the task of bringing order out of comparative chaos. So well did he perform his duties that at the expiration of his term he was re-elected, and in 1873 was chosen for a third term without opposition, his election being especially favored by the most prominent lawyers of the county without regard to party ties. Upon his retirement from office the following appeared in one of the leading newspapers of the county, reflecting, in substance, notices which appeared in nearly all the county papers:

"J. Malcolm Smith, Esq., whose third term of office as County Clerk of this County expired on the first of the present month, carries with him, in retiring from his official labors, the respect, good opinion and confidence of our entire community; and our Board of Supervisors, on the eve of his retiring from the office which he has so long and so ably filled, took occasion to give public and official certification to the correct and efficient manner in which he has discharged the various and important duties of the office during the past nine years, in the unanimous adoption of the Report of its Standing Committee on County Clerk."

The report of the Supervisors' Committee referred to closes as follows:

"Your Committee would report that at the request of J. Malcolm Smith, the present County Clerk, whose term of office is about to expire, they have made a thorough investigation as to the present condition of the books, papers and records of the office, and find the minutes of all the Courts duly recorded; the Registers of Actions and Special Proceedings written up to date and properly indexed; the Judgments docketed in the most plain and neat manner; the Lis Pendens, Sheriff's Certificates, Assignments, &c., all recorded and plainly indexed; and everything relating to the papers and records of the office showing that regularity and order prevail throughout, and that no unfinished business will be left to be performed by Mr. Smith's successor in office.

"Mr. Smith has always been a Democrat, and for twenty years prior to his retirement from office held a prominent position in the councils of his party."

Since his retirement he has been engaged in the practice of law in White Plains, devoting himself more especially to examination of titles and matters of law pertaining to real estate. He has been for forty years connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is well known as an active and influential member, largely aiding financially and by judicious counsel in the erection of churches, both in Sing Sing and White Plains. He has been an extensive traveler in various portions of the United States and few men in this county have a wider circle of acquaintance. He married Hannah, daughter of James McCord, of Sing Sing. They have one child,

L. Malcolm Smith

John B. Haskin

Ella, wife of Charles V. Moore, of the well-known insurance firm of W. M. Onderdonk & Co., of New York City.

A few words should be added concerning his father, Captain Isaac C. Smith. During his whole life Captain Smith was identified with the growth and business of Sing Sing. He was the builder of the steamboat "Mount Pleasant" in 1835 and the "Telegraph" in 1836, and was the projector of the morning steamboat line from Sing Sing to New York. He was the builder of more than one hundred vessels, from a small sloop to a ship of three thousand tons. During his life he bore a part in the erection of five churches, and was known as the "father of Sing Sing Methodism," being one of the original corporators of the first church of that denomination in the village, and the largest contributor towards its erection. After a life of active usefulness, he died while on a visit to his son in White Plains, having reached his eightieth year.

HON. JOHN B. HASKIN.

Among the political leaders of Westchester County a prominent place must be given to Hon. John B. Haskin, who is descended from a long line of true American ancestry. His grandfather, Benjamin F. Haskin, was a native of Sheffield, Massachusetts, where he was born in 1767, and removed when a young man to Poughkeepsie, where he entered a store as clerk, and became partner. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Gilbert Cornwell, who lived at Nine Partners, and removing to New York, became largely connected with shipping interests, and the owner of several vessels. His children were Henry R.; Benjamin F., a sea-captain who settled in Peru, where his descendants are still found; William E., of Davenport, Iowa, who died in 1884, Harriet, wife of —— Collins; Maria, wife of —— Graham; Jane, wife of Casper Trumpy, now living at Greenwich, Ct.; and Caroline, wife of William Brown, of Yonkers, who died in 1885.

Henry R. Haskin, the oldest son, was born October 27, 1794, and died January 24, 1848. He was educated at St. Mary's College, Maryland; was a midshipman in the War of 1812; was with Commodore Chauncey at the battle of Sackett's Harbor, and was wounded there. He was a man of good education and ability, and established business in a store on Varrick Street, New York. In 1816 he married Elizabeth, daughter of John Bussing, who lived near Williams' Bridge, and was a descendant of Aaron Bussing, who came from Holland, and settled at Harlem. He was the owner of a farm of four hundred acres in the Manor of Fordham, which he left to his two sons, Johannes and Petrus. It remained in the hands of their descendants for one hundred and fifty years, and a portion of it is now in Bedford Park. The children of this marriage were Henry R., who died in California; John B.; and William E., now treasurer of the Board of Excise in New York. After the death of Mrs. Haskin, Mr. Haskin was married a second time, to Ann, daughter of Benjamin F. Lowe, and they had two children—Harriet, wife of R. Ridgly Wheatly, of New York, and Benjamin F., a member of the Excise Board of New York, who died, greatly lamented by his many friends, March 1, 1884.

John B. Haskin, the second son, was born at the Mansion House, in Fordham, August 27, 1821, the place of his birth being now a portion of Woodlawn Cemetery. His mother, whose name he never fails to mention in terms of the utmost respect and affection, was a woman of great energy and determination, qualities which she transmitted to her son. His early education was received at the public school, and when fourteen years old he entered the law-office of George Wilson. His natural quickness and ability were such that in four years he was sufficiently expert to take charge of the law-office of John M. Bixby. From his earliest days he was brought in constant contact with politics and politicians, and having passed the requisite examination, he was admitted to the bar May 16, 1842, his certificate being signed by Hon. Samuel Nelson, Judge of the Supreme Court. Five years later he was elected to the office of civil justice, and held court at the corner of Bowery and Third Street, and continued in this position till 1849, when the office was abolished. He seemed naturally destined for active political life, and his influence and ability were soon felt in the councils of his party. Fortunately for himself and the public, he was not a man to be bound by party trammels, or to be the obsequious slave of party rule. He called himself a "National Conservative Democrat," and might almost be said to be his own party. In 1848 Mr. Haskin removed from New York and settled at Fordham, near the scenes of his early childhood. The Democracy of his native county had to some extent escaped the corrupting influences which had made the party in New York a disgrace to the city and the State. Here he came in contact with a class of politicians who were more able to appreciate his true position and ready to join their forces with his own. In 1850 he was elected supervisor, and was re-elected, and one of his many acts for public benefit was his successful effort to erect a free bridge over Harlem River.

In 1853 he was appointed corporation attorney and held office till 1856. In that year he was elected member of Congress for the Ninth District on the regular Democratic ticket. It was soon evident that he was not the man to sit on a back seat. His first speech attracted at once the attention of the House, being made in opposition to the attempt of Alexander H. Stephens to disgrace Admiral Hiram Paulding for causing the arrest of the noted filibuster, William H. Walker. This speech marked Mr. Haskin as one of the accomplished orators of the House. In the fierce political strife which followed the attempt to introduce slavery into the Territory of Kansas, he took at once a prominent position, and was one of the first to raise his voice against the Lecompton fraud, among the most active of the adherents of Senator Stephen A. Douglass, and an untiring organizer of the Democrats in the House against the administration. As a matter of course, a man who ventured to kick over the traces of party discipline was speedily denounced as a traitor to his party, but his opposition to Buchanan has been more than justified by the impartial verdict of history.

In 1858 Mr. Haskin was an Independent candidate for Congress, his opponent being Gouverneur Kemble, of Cold Spring. This was probably the most exciting political contest ever witnessed in the district, and resulted in the election of Mr. Haskin by a majority of thirteen votes. His nature showed itself when he stated from his seat in Congress, "I came here with no party collar on my neck." His independence was too plain to be misunderstood, and an attack upon him in the personal organ of President Buchanan was answered by him in an able speech on the floor of the House, in which his position and relation to the Democratic party were fully explained. "I am a Democrat,—a Democrat in essence, in substance, and not in mere form ; Democracy, according to my reading, is the rule of the people under the law." In the Thirty-sixth Congress he was chairman of the Committee on Public Expenditures, and member of the Committee on Public Printing, and organized the research into current corruption known as the "Covode Investigation." Among his most intimate friends was Senator Broderick, of California, who had been his early schoolmate, and the friendship then begun continued till the day when the Senator fell, the victim of a duel occasioned by political animosity. It devolved upon Mr. Haskin to deliver a fitting tribute to the memory of his friend, which was a masterpiece of pathetic eloquence.

His last speech in Congress was delivered February 23, 1861. It was a characteristically bold and clear review of the agitation which led to the great crisis in our history ; expressed his belief that the perilous condition of the country was directly traceable to the conduct of President Buchanan, and contained a scathing denunciation of the treasonable acts of his Cabinet.

During the course of the war a weaker man in his position would have been a Copperhead, but in Mr. Haskin the Union found a strong supporter. In 1863 he was elected supervisor of West Farms, and conducted with success the measures for raising troops and assisting the government in its efforts to subdue rebellion. Prominently identified with all local improvements, his most active efforts were devoted to the establishment of the public school in his district on a sure foundation. In the face of bitter opposition on the part of many of the wealthy men in the vicinity, he succeeded in procuring the erection of the present school building at Fordham, at a cost of seventy thousand dollars, which must ever remain a monument to his energy and public spirit.

Mr. Haskin married Jane, daughter of Peter Valentine, a representative of one of the oldest families in the county. Their children are Elizabeth, wife of E. V. Welsh ; Emma, wife of Colonel J. Milton Wyatt ; John B., Jr., Adele Douglass, wife of Joseph Murray, Jr.; and Mary.

The estate of Mr. Haskin, at Fordham, though now a part of the great city, has not yet lost its rural beauty. Here, surrounded by all that can make life enjoyable, he passes his days in the society of his family and friends. The visitor will find there as his host one who is thoroughly versed in the ways of the world, and whose intimate acquaintance with politics and politicians has made the name "Tuscarora Haskin" one of the best known in Westchester County.

As a politician Mr. Haskin has been remarkably successful, but the secret of his success and influence may be stated in a few words. Utterly fearless in the expression of his views, his friends know him as one upon whom they can depend, while his enemies find in him a man who can neither be frightened nor cajoled. A weak politician of an inferior grade will truckle to his adversaries and strive to conciliate by unworthy means. Mr. Haskin is the type of a politician who boldly defies his opponents and challenges them to a contest which they generally have the prudence to avoid. Among the notable instances of his traits may be mentioned his fearless letter to the authorities of the St. John's College, of Fordham, representatives of a power to which weaker politicians would have yielded with obsequious reverence, while his bold and scathing rebukes of many of the prominent politicians of the present time are too well known to require mention, and his firm self-reliance has shown by its success the truth of the saying, "They can conquer who believe they can."

MATHIAS BANTA.

Mr. Banta, who is among the best known jurists of Westchester County, and by his activity in the espousal of every just cause has brought himself prominently before its people, both in political and social life, was born in the city of New York, October 3, 1828. He was one of ten children and the only son of Solomon Banta, who married Maria Roome, of New Jersey.

While quite young his father sent him to Public School No. 3, in the Ninth Ward, New York City, from which he graduated. He then attended the private school of Mr. Starr, in Amos Street, leaving it at the age of sixteen to enter the University of the City of New York.

In 1848, after his graduation from college, he entered the law-office of David E. Wheeler as managing clerk, remaining in this position till the death of his employer, in 1869, when the business was divided, the real estate portion of it falling into his own hands.

Truly yours
Ernest Hall

Mr. Banta has since continued to manage the business. By his faithful attention to the interests of his clients and his skill in the management of the affairs which they have placed in his hands, he has accumulated for himself an extended and lucrative practice, which is continually increasing.

In 1870, after a long residence in New York, he removed to Mamaroneck, where he resides at present. From his arrival in Westchester County he has deeply interested himself in its politics. Being a Democrat, he immediately identified himself with his party in Mamaroneck, and was elected in 1877 supervisor of the town, an office he continues to hold. The liberal course pursued by him in the County Board so won the approval of his party that in 1885 he was made their nominee for surrogate, and received a large majority of the votes cast at the election. A previously rendered decision, however, to the effect that no vacancy existed, deprived him of the office.

In 1849 Mr. Banta married Miss Eliza Gedney. They have three children, —Hannah M., wife of William A. Turner; Everetta, wife of F. S. Sheldon; and Eloise J.

He is an attendant of the Methodist Church, of Mamaroneck, and is highly respected in the community as an honorable and useful citizen.

HON. ERNEST HALL.

Hon. Ernest Hall, prominent as a member of the bar, and a judge of the City Court of New York, was born in London, England, October 24, 1844. His father, Henry B. Hall, was a landscape and portrait engraver, came to America with his family in 1850 and settled at Woodstock, in Morrisania. He afterwards removed to George Street, near the Boston road, where he died in 1884.

Judge Hall attended the old Public School No. 3, on Fordham Avenue (now Third Avenue), near One Hundred and Sixty-ninth Street, from 1851 to 1858, when he graduated. He then obtained a position in the well-known publishing house of the Putnams, and remained until 1860. In the fall of that year he began the study of law in the office of Henry Spratley, of Morrisania. He continued there until 1861, when he entered the office of Carpentier & Beach, in New York, and remained until May, 1864. In 1863 he joined the Seventy-first Regiment New York Militia during the Gettysburg campaign, and returned at the close of the riots in New York. He resumed his law studies until August 24, 1864, when he joined the navy as a landsman, and was detailed as clerk on board the receiving ship in Brooklyn Navy-Yard. He was afterwards on the United States steamer "Mohican," commanded by Daniel Ammen, now rear admiral on the retired list, and was attached to the North Atlantic Squadron. While on this vessel he was clerk to the executive officer. He was engaged in both battles of Fort Fisher, N. C., in December, 1864, and January, 1865, spent the winter on the Ogeechee River, in Georgia, and assisted in the dismantling of Fort McAllister, which had previously been captured by Sherman's army. He came North in March, and received his discharge in Boston, May 24, 1865. He then entered the law school of the University of the City of New York in the senior class, graduated June 17, 1866, and was admitted to the bar. He established an office for the practice of law in Morrisania, which he continued till 1877, when he removed to New York, and was elected judge of the City Court November, 1881, a position which he still holds.

From 1869 to 1873 he was a member of the board of trustees of the town of Morrisania. In the latter year he was appointed counsel to the corporation, and served in that capacity until the time of the annexation to the city of New York. He was subsequently appointed by E. Delafield Smith, then corporation counsel of the city of New York, to attend to all suits then pending affecting the annexed district, and was continued in this position by William C. Whitney, the successor of Mr. Smith. He was also counsel of the Board of Excise, of the German Savings Bank and of the Fire Department of Morrisania. He is a member of Post Lafayette, of the Grand Army of the Republic, and assisted in its organization.

Judge Hall's brothers, as well as himself, were actively engaged in the late war. Henry B. Hall was major of the Sixth New York Artillery, fought at the battle of Bull Run, was wounded at Brandy Station in 1863, and was discharged from service upon recovering from his wound. Charles B. Hall was a member of the Seventy-first Regiment in 1861, and afterward joined the Ninety-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, and his brother Alfred was a member of the Seventy-first Regiment in 1862–63. Judge Hall has four sisters—Annie, wife of Edmund H. Knight (she died in 1858, leaving three children); Emily, wife of William Momberger; Alice and Eliza, both unmarried.

Judge Hall married Charita, daughter of Cyprian Tallient. Their children are Charita, Alma and Edna.

He is well known as an able and distinguished member of the bar, and is especially noted for the clearness and perspicuity with which he delivers his charges to the jury. Gifted with a voice of remarkable power, his enunciation and his reasoning are alike perfect. Every point of the subject is laid down in so careful a manner as to render it perfectly plain to the most common intellect, and with an impartiality which leaves no ground for the charge of intentional bias on either side of the case. As an active and energetic politician, he is one concerning whom it is safe to prophesy still higher positions in the future.

The brothers of Judge Hall constitute the well-known firm of H. B. Hall's Sons, steel engravers, and their name is known in connection with the finest specimens of that art to be found in this country.

HON. SAMUEL WILLIAM JOHNSON.

Mr. Johnson is a great-great-grandson of the distinguished American clergyman, Dr. Samuel Johnson, who was born in Guilford, Conn., October 14, 1696, and died at Stratford, in the same State, June 6, 1772.

His son, William Samuel Johnson, was first president of Columbia College, a member of the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States and the first delegate in the Senate of the United States from the State of Connecticut.[1]

A grandson of William Samuel Johnson, was a New York lawyer of prominence and was a member of the Senate of the State of New York. He married Miss Laura Wolsey, sister of President Wolsey, of Yale College. Their second child and oldest son, Samuel William, was born in the city of New York, October 27, 1828. After a preparatory course in private schools of the city he entered Princeton College, graduating in 1849. He then entered the Law School, Cambridge, Mass., and after a full course graduated in 1851. He afterward entered the law-office of District Attorney N. Bowditch Blunt, remaining till 1852, when he was admitted to the bar.

Immediately after admission Mr. Johnson removed to Cattaraugus County, N. Y., where he remained for thirteen years in charge of a large landed interest. In 1865 he retired from active life, removing at the same time to Rye Neck, where he has since resided. He has been active in the politics of the county ever since his arrival in it. He early connected himself with the Democratic party in the home of his choice and has held several important political positions.

In 1871 he was appointed by Governor John T. Hoffman commissioner-general and chief of ordnance for the State of New York. He has been nine times elected supervisor of the town of Rye and was for two years chairman of the board. For three years he was a member of Assembly from the Second District of Westchester County. It is a remarkable fact that he is the fourth member of the family in the direct line who has represented a constituency in State Legislatures. He also interested himself in military affairs. From 1853 to 1872 he held commissions from the State of New York, the last one being that of brigadier-general.

He has been prominent in club life and is at present a member of the Manhattan, University and St. Nicholas Clubs, of New York City. He is also a director in the North River Fire Insurance Company and a trustee of the Port Chester Savings Banks.

He married Miss Frances Ann Sanderson, of New York, who died at her home in Mamaroneck in 1879. Their only living child, William Samuel, is a member of the bar in New York City, and resides with his father.

Mr. Johnson is a highly respected and useful citizen and his liberal spirit and cordial disposition has made him many warm and lasting friendships.

HON. G. HILTON SCRIBNER.

The ancestors of the family of which Mr. Scribner is an honored representative were among the early settlers of Salisbury, N. H., and the name is frequently found in the annals of that town. That of Samuel Scribner occurs in 1754, and during the following year he, in company with one of his neighbors, was taken prisoner by the Indians and carried to Canada, where he was sold as a captive, but was subsequently ransomed by the colonial government. In 1756 he joined the regiment of Colonel Nathan Meserve, which was raised for the Crown Point expedition, and served from May to December of that year. In 1757 he was a soldier in the regiment of Colonel Thomas Tash, and in the following year appears as one of the regiment raised by Colonel John Hart. The Revolution found in him a man ready for the hour, and, though exempt by age, he was one of the first to enlist in the regiment commanded by Colonel John Stark, which took an active part in the battle of Bunker Hill. Among the list of soldiers in the town of Salisbury, May 27, 1776, are the names of Edward, Ebenezer, Benjamin and Jonathan Scribner.

G. Hilton Scribner

David Scribner, son of Ebenezer and grandson of Samuel, was born May 12, 1767, and was the father of thirteen children,—David, Hannah, Sarah, Eben, Sewall B., Silas, Ruth, Jacob D., Jonathan, Albert G., Hannah D., Alfred and Almira H.

Sewall B. Scribner was born March 12, 1793, and removed from his native place (Andover, N. H.) to Monroe County, N. Y., in 1816. At that time the present city of Rochester was a mere hamlet, and Mr Scribner was among the pioneers in what is now one of the most prosperous portions of the State.

In 1821 he married Clarissa De Wayne Hilton, daughter of David Hilton, who was descended from a noted line of English ancestry, whose family records are unbroken from June 23, 1295, to the present time. The children of this marriage were Gilbert Hilton Scribner, Alsada, Arveda (wife of William E. Stickland, of Rochester), Albert S. (who died in 1852), Mary (wife of Van Buren Denslow), Celesta (deceased) and Celia M.

Gilbert Hilton Scribner was born in Ogden, Monroe County, N. Y., June 23, 1831, and his early education was received in the common schools of his native place, which offered exceptional advantages. He subsequently became a student at the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, at Lima, N. Y., and, after remaining there two years, entered college at Oberlin, where he received the highest honors for his thoroughness and originality. At the close of his collegiate course, in 1853, he went to New York and began life in the great city without friends or acquaintance, and with little to encourage him, but an amount of determination and energy with which he could not fail to work his way. Commencing the study of law in the office of Hon. Daniel B. Taylor, who enjoyed a large practice and was the possessor of one of the largest law libraries in the city, the young student, by indefatigable labor, soon made himself useful in his chosen profession, and, in 1855, was admitted to the bar and soon after called to practice in the United States Courts as proctor, solicitor and advocate. Rising rapidly in his profession, his prudence and ability soon gained him a large and lucrative practice, and he was frequently retained as counsel for many monied corporations and large estates. In 1862 he was one of the organizers of the North America Life Insurance Company of New York, of which he became a director and counsel, and, after long and arduous labor in collating and analyzing facts and statistics in relation to travel and accidents, framed a bill, which was passed by the Legislature, allowing that company to insure against accidents to travelers. This was the first authority granted in this country for accident insurance.

Mr. Scribner came to Yonkers in 1858, and since that time his life and career have been identified with the history of Westchester County. Upon coming to Yonkers he built a house on Woodworth Avenue, near Locust Street, there being at that time very few dwellings in that vicinity. His home was surrounded by a beautiful locust grove. He subsequently moved to a residence at "Hillside," near the corner of Broadway and High Street. His present residence, "Inglehurst," was purchased in the spring of 1880, and from its elevated position commands one of the finest views of the Hudson River. It is also a landmark, being situated at the extreme north bounds of the "Lemuel Wells estate," which embraced the greater part of the thickly-settled portion of the city of Yonkers.

The first official position held by Mr. Scribner was that of village trustee, in 1863. At that time, with a few others, he organized a very thorough temperance reform. Born of Whig parentage, he early attached himself to that party, and remained a member while it had an existence. He attended the convention which nominated Fremont, in 1856, and since that time has been an able and earnest supporter of the Republican party. In 1863 he was made chairman of the County Committee. It was due to his ownership and efforts that the Statesman, the leading Republican paper in the county, was established. In addition to his extensive law practice, he was for a time the president of the Palisades Bank of Yonkers, and also a director of several large corporations.

In 1868 he retired from the practice of law and with his family made a long tour in Europe. He made a second trip in 1870, was present at the declaration of the Franco-Prussian War, and enjoyed special opportunities of visiting the armies of the contending powers.

Previous to his departure for Europe he had received and declined a nomination for State Senator, but upon his return, in the fall of 1870, was elected member of the Assembly by a very large majority, and was the first member other than a Democrat who had been elected from the district for over thirty years. The weight of his ability and influence was soon felt and he soon became a leader in the Legislature and in his party, devoting much of his time and effort to opposing the measures of the "Tweed Ring," then in the height of its power, but destined to a sudden and disastrous fall. In March, 1871, he was instrumental in organizing the Young Men's State Republican Association, the object of which was to unite discordant elements and end the strifes which had impaired the usefulness of the party. This organization very naturally chose Mr. Scribner for its president, and having shown himself a competent and faithful leader, he was nominated by acclamation at the State Convention in Syracuse, in 1871, for Secretary of State, a nomination which was signally confirmed at the succeeding election by a majority of over twenty thousand. Soon after the close of the Legislature of 1871 the representatives of the insurance, banking and other corporate interests of the State united in a complimentary tribute to Mr. Scribner for his intelligent, able and successful opposition to unjust legislation while a member of Assembly. The ceremony of the presentation of a service of silver plate took place in the chambers of the Board of Underwriters in New York, and an address engrossed on parchment, signed by and presented on behalf of the presidents of more than fifty of the monied institutions of New York, was not only a compliment to Mr. Scribner's character, but a certification that he had performed his public services in an acceptable manner.

Notwithstanding the engrossing cares of an active political and business life, he has never permitted his tastes for literature and art to become dull or enfeebled. Often organizing and always connected with one or more literary circles, he has not suffered his love of learning to be stifled by the cares and responsibilities of his profession or the routine of daily labor. To him is due the credit of establishing the Bancroft Society of New York, and also "The Society of Pundits," a literary circle, which for many years continued its meetings, and embraced in its membership some of the brightest men and women of the city which he had made his home. He was also for many years a trustee of the Bible Union and also of the Rochester Theological Seminary.

The profound problem of the origin of life upon our planet has engrossed the attention of the greatest minds in the world of science, but still remains a question to which there seems no reply. Next to this comes the inquiry as to the place of its first manifestation, the determination of which would appear equally hopeless. Devoting his leisure time and thought to this and kindred subjects, Mr. Scribner has embodied his theories and the results of his investigations in a monograph entitled "Where did Life Begin?" This work, which appeared in November, 1883, immediately attracted the attention of the investigating and scientific public. It is a carefully prepared and forcibly written treatise, having for its object the establishment of the theory that all life, both vegetable and animal, must have had its origin within the polar circles, and further, that by the cooling of the earth's substance, and the consequent lowering of surface temperature at the poles, all organic life has been gradually driven to the temperate and to the equatorial regions. To express an opinion as to the truth or fallacy of this theory would in this place be presumptuous, but it is sufficient to say that the hypothesis has not only been well received by the press and scholars, but has been the means of turning the attention of men of science to a closer consideration of the subject, and the discoveries that may follow may far exceed the most sanguine expectations of its author.

Upon his retirement from political life Mr. Scribner accepted the office of vice-president of the Belt Railroad (so-called) of New York, and retained that position until 1880, when he was chosen president, a position which he still holds. He is also connected with many associations of a social and charitable nature, being a member of the Union League Club, president of the Skin and Cancer Hospital of New York, an institution which has done much to relieve human suffering; a member of both the British and the American Associations for the Advancement of Science, and trustee of St. John's Hospital in Yonkers.

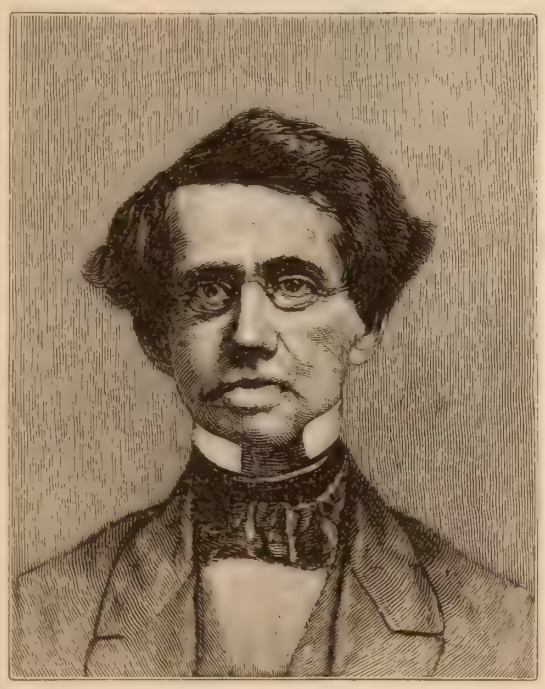
He married Sarah Woodbury, daughter of Hon. James Osgood Pettengill of Rochester, who, as a legislator, and as an officer and patron of the Rochester Theological Seminary and other institutions of learning, is well known in Western New York. His father, Captain James Pettengill, came from Salisbury, N. H., and settled at Ogden, Monroe County, in the early part of the present century. The ancestors of the various families of this name were four brothers, Matthew, David, Andrew and Benjamin, who came from Yorkshire, England, in 1640, and settled in Newburyport, Mass., whence they removed to Salisbury. The mother of Mrs. Scribner was Emeline, daughter of Manlius G. Woodbury, who was an early settler and was made alderman in the first charter election in the city of Rochester.

Mr. Scribner has six surviving children,—Gilbert Hilton, Jr., Howard, Florence, Marion, Marguerite and Osgood Pettengill.

CHAUNCEY SMITH.

Phillip Smith was born in Connecticut, March 15, 1774, and married Sally Smith November 23, 1799. She was a granddaughter of Benjamin Stebbins, who came from England and settled in Deerfield, Mass., and was probably the ancestor of the families of that name in this country. Phillip and Sally Smith located shortly after their marriage at Bedford, Westchester County, N. Y., and were members of the old Episcopal Church of that place. They were parents of eight children, of whom Chauncey Smith was the sixth and was born November 10, 1810.

Bedford was then the county-seat and a place of no small importance; in fact, the principal village of the county. Mr. Smith at an early age entered the High School and academy at Bedford, which was an institution of note, second to none in the State, and included among its pupils Hon. William H. Robertson, Hon. James W. Husted and many others of distinction. A short time after graduating he studied law, and was admitted to the bar January 7, 1851.



He married Hannah, daughter of John P. Horton, of New Castle, Westchester County, whose wife was Elizabeth Fowler, both descended from old Westchester County families.

Elizabeth was a first cousin of Isaac Van Wart, who was one of the captors of Major Andre. Mr. Smith moved to White Plains and was appointed deputy county clerk in 1847, and appointed county clerk the same year, to fill a vacancy.

In January, 1847 or 1848, he was appointed agent of Sing Sing State Prison, and after leaving Sing Sing practiced law in White Plains for several years.

He removed to Morrisania shortly after the settlement of the new village, about thirty years ago, and opened a law-office where he continued successfully the practice of his profession up to the winter of 1877, when he was compelled to give up business on account of a paralytic stroke. He was an old-school type of a Christian gentleman, highly respected in all the walks of life, and active in the true interests of the society and community in which he lived. He was intimately acquainted with, and highly respected by, the men who were first connected with the growth and prosperity of Morrisania, such as Nicholas McGraw, Jordan L. Mott, Gouverneur, Henry and William H. Morris, Robert H. Elton, Hon. Silas D. Gifford and many others and was well known throughout the county. He was naturally of a retiring disposition, and although often urged to accept public office, he refused. He continued an invalid from 1877 to his death, which occurred December 25, 1883, at the homestead in which he had resided for more than twenty-five years. He left two daughters and one son, W. Stebbins Smith, who is a member of the bar, in active practice, particularly in the counties of New York and Westchester. Mr. Smith studied law in the office of his father and attended the Columbia College Law School, from which institution he received his diploma, and was admitted to the bar June 12, 1871.

Chauncey Smith

EDWARD TRAFFORD LOVATT.

Mr. Lovatt was born May 22, 1850, at Newark, N. J. His father was John Lovatt and his mother Mary Ann Lovatt. He was the eldest of six children. Educated both in the ordinary English branches and in the classics in the public schools of that city, he graduated with high honors at the Public High School when he was but fifteen years old, receiving his diploma on July 21, 1865. He then went to the city of New York and began life as an errand boy in a wholesale fancy goods house, but his parents having removed, on May 23, 1866, to the village of North Tarrytown, in Westchester County, he entered his father's silk mills, in that village, to learn silk manufacture, and acquired a thorough knowledge of that industry.

On May 22, 1871, he married Miss Sarah Theodosia Tompkins, a descendant of one of the most respected families of Westchester County, she being a grandniece of the Hon. Daniel D. Tompkins, formerly Governor of New York and Vice-President of the United States.

For several years after marriage Mr. Lovatt remained at his trade, but it being distasteful to him he determined to become a lawyer, which had always been his great ambition. In order to do this, not having the means to attend college, he laid out the same course of reading as he would have been required to take if attending law school, and while busy in the mills during the day, pursued his studies at night and early in the morning, thus mastering the many thousands of pages of legal text works necessary to a thorough understanding of the principles of law. Entering a law-office in Tarrytown, he completed the three years' clerkship then necessary for a student's admission to practice. On February 14, 1878, he passed the prescribed examination, was sworn in as an attorney-at-law, and in May, 1878, was admitted as a Counsellor of the Supreme Court. His energy, perseverance and knowledge of the law soon gave him a leading place in his profession at the Westchester County bar.

He has been engaged in numerous cases of importance, both in the criminal and civil courts, many of which have been reported. He has been remarkably successful as an advocate. Among the many cases in the criminal courts in which he was counsel for the defense, some of the more prominent murder trials were those of William Newman, Fitzgerald, Brownlee, Coleman and Angelo Cornetti, the last-named being the first tried in this State under the amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure, by which all capital cases can be appealed and execution of sentence thereby stayed until the appeal can be heard.

He has also tried a great number of civil causes and has met with unusual success. He was one of the counsel in the famous "Anderson Will Case," in which a large sum of money was recovered for his clients,—two little girls, aged ten and twelve years, grandchildren of John Anderson.

He has built up an extensive and lucrative practice, has acquired property, and his pleasant and modest house on Beekman Avenue, North Tarrytown, is provided with all the surroundings and appointments necessary to make it, what it certainly is, a happy home.

No person in his neighborhood takes a deeper interest in educational matters. Being a firm believer in the public-school system of the State, he is one of its most active supporters and is now president of the Board of Education of the village.

Mr. Lovatt has always been an ardent Republican, and upon the principle that all good citizens should participate in the politics of the State and country, he has taken a very active part, having been a delegate to most of the conventions held by his party.

In March, 1883, although running against a highly respected citizen of his village, he was elected president, having received four-fifths of the ballots cast.

In November of the same year, in the Republican County Convention, he was unanimously nominated for district attorney of Westchester County.

He is a member of the Republican County Committee and enjoys the friendship and confidence of the other leaders of the party. He is of a genial and social disposition and has a large circle of warm friends. He is a member and trustee of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church of North Tarrytown.

He is an effective public speaker, easy in his manners, ready and fluent in speech, possessing a large fund of mother wit. His studious habits, quick perception, faculty of illustration, clear judgment and logical conclusions carry conviction with them.

CHAPTER XII.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

BY GEORGE JACKSON FISHER, M.D.,
Of Sing Sing.

EXCEPTING to gentlemen of the medical profession, there is nothing particularly interesting in the life of a physician or the transactions of a medical society. Each family, though familiar with its own medical adviser, seldom looks beyond its favorite to learn the traits of character, the extent of acquirements or the skill of others. The technical studies, and subtle researches of physicians, who strive to keep abreast with the rapid progress of the medical sciences, possess no interest or charm to the general public. It is only concerned with powers and results, and these only when disease interferes with the performance of the daily routine of business and pleasure, or when danger threatens life. So it becomes a difficult, perhaps a needless, and almost certainly a thankless task to attempt to write the sketch proposed.

On the 1st day of June, 1858, the writer of this chapter read the annual address, as president, before the Medical Society of the County of Westchester, taking for his theme "Biographical Sketches of the Deceased Physicians of Westchester County, N. Y.," which address was subsequently published in pamphlet form, "by order of the Society." (New York, 1861, 8vo., pp. 52.)

He must now go back seven and twenty years, and make extracts from that "plain, unvarnished tale of character, merits, traits and experience of those medical men who have previously been the incumbents of the field we now occupy," to which will be added brief sketches of several honored members of our beloved profession who have since been called from their labor—some at the full end of man's allotted time, and others abruptly, in the prime of man-hood's vigor, and in the midst of their greatest usefulness.[1]

Over twenty years ago, Dr. James Fountain gave the writer a little document that was previously supposed to be irrecoverably lost, which contains the original records of the first five meetings of the Medical Society of Westchester County. This book was restored to the society, by which it is now preserved. It begins thus,—

"At a respectable Meeting of Physicians of the County of Westchester on the 8th Day of May, 1797—at the House of William Barker in the White Plains—Present—

"Archibald McDonald.	Lyman Cook.
Charles McDonald.	David Rodgers.
John Ingersoll.	Matson Smith.
Elisha Bruister.	Elias Cornelius.

"That a due improvement and proper regulations may be maid in the Practice of Physic within the County of Westchester and for the Purpose of a necessary and immediate compliance with the Law of the Legislature passed the last Session. The Physicians afforesaid formed themselves into a Society to be known and called hereafter by the name and style of the Medical Society of the County of Westchester. Upon Motion Doct^{r}. A. McDonald, of the white plains, was Elected president of the Society Pro tempore, and upon said motion Doctr. Matson Smith, of New Rochelle, was Elected Secretary thereof.

"The Society, Pleased with the present progress and desireous that the Board shall hereafter exist upon the most fair and respectable terms: and that the Physicians of the County shall indiscriminately receive an invitation to unite with the present members and to encourage this Laudable dissign." (Here ends the first page.)

"Resolved upon motion that the following resolution be inserted in the Danbury Journal and Mount Pleasant Register:

"Resolved upon motion the Physicians of Westchester County be indiscriminately informed that it is the intention and hearty wish of the Members of the Society that there may be a perfect union of the Profes sion of Physic within the County for the purpose of establishing the Practice upon a liberal and satisfactory Plan, that there may be a due observance of the law passed at the last session of the Legislature of the State: And that an oppertunity may be given for such an union, the Society have proposed a meeting on the 13th Day of June next, at House of Maj^{r}. Jesse Hally, in Bedford, and hope this mode will be considered unequivically an invitation. Should any gentleman neglect the present season of uniting with the Society after the Meeting afforesaid, no gentleman can expect admission in the Society without a vote for the purpose.

"Upon motion resolved that Doct^{r}. A. McDonald, David Rodgers and Matson Smith be a Commit ee to propose a Constitution for this Society against the Meeting at Bedford, which Constitution shall be Subject to Amendment.

"The Board Adjourn'd to Meet at the House of Maj^{r} Jesse Hally, in Bedford, on the 13th Day of June next.

"Matson Smith,
"Secretary Pro. Tempore."

The second meeting took place, as proposed, at Major Holly's house, June 13, 1797, at which seventeen doctors were present. After the transaction of business it was "Unanimously resolved that the Revnd Robt. Z. Whitmore be invited to preach a Sermon before the Society at their next meeting. The board Adjourned to meet at the House of Mr. Sutton Craft, Near New Castle Church, on Tuesday, the 8th Day of August Next, at 10 o'clock A.M."

Only six members were present at the third meeting. No mention is made concerning the sermon, and we are left in doubt as to whether it was preached or not.

The fourth meeting occurred September 12, 1797, at Mr. Sutton Craft's, with eight members present. This is the first meeting at which it appears that anything strictly medical was proposed. "Doctor Ebenezer White was appointed to deliver a dissertation on the utility of a Medical Society," at the next meeting.

The fifth meeting took place at White Plains, "Tuesday the 31st day of October, A.D. 1797." Eight doctors were present. At this meeting the constitution was adopted. This is given in full in the minutes.

The sixth, and last meeting recorded in this little manuscript of thirteen pages was the annual meeting, which was held in Bedford on Tuesday, May 8, 1798, at which twelve members were present. Dr. Lemuel Mead "delivered a dissertation upon Physiology to the satisfaction of the Society."

The records of the society from this meeting to June, 1830, are, unfortunately, lost. The society, I believe, has never failed to convene, at least annually, since its organization. At the present time it holds four sessions a year, each of which is fairly well attended. It has served the general purposes for which it was founded, though it cannot boast of having made any considerable contributions to medical literature. Its publications consist of several editions of its constitution and bye-laws,—a "Fee Bill," 1868; "Proceedings of the Society at its annual meeting, held in the village of Sing Sing June 3, 1856," 8vo., pp. 50, Sing Sing, 1857; and two pamphlets of "Biographical Sketches of Deceased Physicians of Westchester County, N. Y.," 8vo., pp. 52, 1861; "In Memoriam," 8vo., pp. 41, 1875; and a "List of Registered Physicians," 1881.

The individual members of the society have made no insignificant additions to the literature of the profession. Appended will be found as nearly a complete list of the contributions as it has been possible to make at this time. By this it will be seen that more than a hundred articles, aggregating about twenty-two hundred pages of medical matter, have been put in print by our physicians during the past sixty years.

A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF THE CONTRIBUTIONS TO MEDICAL LITERATURE MADE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY, N. Y. [1825-1885].

This list must prove interesting, not only to the physicians of the present time, but to those who may follow us in the future. If each of the counties of our State has contributed as much as Westchester, the aggregate must amount to many volumes of no inconsiderable value.

Dr. Peter Hugeford, of Cortlandtown, was probably the first regular physician in the northwestern portion of Westchester County.

He was an Englishman by birth and education, an accomplished medical practitioner and a gentleman of the decided English stamp, as can be seen by his full-length portrait which now hangs in an ancient parlor of his granddaughter, Mrs. Betsey Field, a widow of over eighty years, residing near the village of Peekskill. He was a successful practitioner previous to the Revolution. Being a Royalist, he retired to the British army when war was declared. His fine farm of two hundred acres was confiscated, and subsequently given by government to John Paulding, for his service as one of the three captors of Major Andre.

He was probably the most accomplished physician of his day in this country.

Dr. Stanly, of Cortlandtown, was cotemporary with Dr. Hugeford. He emigrated from Connecticut, and settled in Cortlandtown, at precisely what date is not known. He was celebrated for his great caution; he carried with him his scale and weights, and at all times weighed carefully every dose of medicine he administered.

He had one son, whom he educated thoroughly to the medical profession. Young Dr. Stanly married the only child of Richard Currie, a wealthy farmer of this county. They united under the most auspicious and flattering circumstances. He died prematurely of brandy, his wife of opium, leaving a large family, most of them in indigent circumstances.

Dr. Elias Cornelius, of Somers, was a native of Long Island, and served as surgeon's mate in the Revolutionary army. After the close of the war he settled in the western part of Somers, where he practiced his profession over forty years with eminent success and credit. During the Revolution he contracted the habit of smoking, snuffing and tippling, but, contrary to the generally received opinion, was never intoxicated during his long and arduous life.

Dr. James Fountain says: "Dr. Cornelius was truly a pattern physician; with a very limited medical education, he commenced the active duties of his profession, but full of energy and ambition, he studied and practiced both by day and by night. He kept three good horses, and rode off rapidly, and on his arrival at home he gave his horse over to his groom, and went directly into his office, and there spent all his available time in the pursuit of knowledge or in the compounding of medicines. He availed himself of every means of information; he commenced taking the first medical periodical ever published in America, viz.: The Medical Repository, and ever since continued to read it. He had also all the principal authors of his day, and studied them thoroughly. Having been inspired by a genuine love, with the requisite enthusiasm, for his profession, he gave it his undivided attention, and the whole force of his energies and talents were made subservient to it. He died at the age of sixty-eight years, having been blessed with a large family, which were carefully and respectably bred. One of his sons, having been thoroughly educated, became one of the most celebrated and accomplished divines in the New England States."

He commenced life in extreme poverty, and left his heirs an estate of nearly fifty thousand dollars.

Dr. Lyman Cook, of Cortlandtown, was an eminent and successful physician. He was chosen the delegate of the Westchester County Society, which he represented by attending the first meeting of the State Medical Society in 1807.

He engaged somewhat in politics, and was once elected to the office of high sheriff of the county. He removed to one of the Western States, where he located as a physician.

Dr. Elias Quereau, of Yorktown, was born in the city of New York, and pursued his medical studies under Dr. Hugeford. Early in the Revolutionary War he married in the city of New York, where he engaged in practice for a short time.

Owing to the unsettled state of the country he frequently changed his residence and field of practice. Being a Royalist, he embarked for St. John's, with other refugees, but soon returned to his native State in consequence of the inclemency of the Canadian climate. He finally settled in Yorktown, in this county, which was the native place of his wife, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life.

In Yorktown he seems to have commenced anew. He joined the Baptist denomination and became an active member. With a few others he built a church, which, under the charge of Elder E. Fountain, was a prosperous society, was kept together forty years by their united aid, and continues to the present.

He was a modest, quiet and unassuming man, and a pious, consistent and benevolent Christian. His Sunday earnings he invariably set apart for the benefit of the church, believing that, as his duties on that sacred day were labors of love and necessity, he had no right to appropriate the avails thereof to the common purposes of life. He died in his eighty-sixth year, leaving several children and many friends to lament his loss.

Dr. Francis Fowler practiced in White Plains and vicinity about eighty or ninety years ago. He came from Newburgh, Orange County, N. Y., and soon after his arrival married a sister of ex-Sheriff Amos W. Hatfield, of White Plains. His talents and practice are said to have been respectable and gave promise of good success, but in a few years after settling in White Plains, he died, leaving a widow, but no children.

Dr. Brewster also practiced in White Plains previous to or about the time of Dr. Fowler, but nothing further is known of him.

Dr. William Baldwin, late of New York City, lies beneath a large, plain, but handsome monument, in the yard of the first, or old Methodist Church, of White Plains. He was born in Northford, Conn., commenced practice about 1800, and married Elizabeth, daughter of John Falconer, a prominent citizen of White Plains, where he practiced with considerable success for about fifteen years. He then removed to the city of New York and located himself in East Broadway; became a prominent and successful practitioner in that section of the city, and gained a more than ordinary practice and honorable position among his professional brethren. He left a widow, but no children.

Dr. Seth Miller, of Sing Sing, was born in April, 1766. He came from Lower Salem, and, after practicing several years at New Castle, settled at Sing Sing, before 1790, being the first physician to locate in the latter village. Mrs. John Miller, who, in 1858, was eighty-six years old, stated that Dr. Miller had attended her husband when he was suffering from the yellow fever. It was the first case of the disease known in Sing Sing, and did not spread, Mr. Miller being the solitary victim. He had contracted it during a visit to New York, where it was raging at the time.

Dr. Miller's eldest daughter married Dr. Kissam, of New York, and his second became the wife of Dr. Wallace, of Troy. She was extremely beautiful and highly accomplished, and is said to have been so well versed in medicine that she undertook to continue her husband's practice after his death. Her father is said to have been very skillful and enjoyed the confidence of a large circle of friends and patients. His health began to fail several years before his death, and he invited Dr. Jeremiah Drake Fowler to settle at Sing Sing and participate in and eventually succeed to his practice. He died November 23, 1808, in the forty-second year of his age, and was interred in the cemetery at Sparta, below Sing Sing.

Dr. Archibald Macdonald, of White Plains, was one of the most distinguished of the early physicians of the county and prominent among the founders of the Medical Society. He was a native of Inverness, Scotland, and came of the Glengarry branch of the Macdonalds. His father, in 1745, joined the forces of Charles Edward, the last of the Stuart pretenders who endeavored to regain by arms the British throne, and perished in battle when his son was but a few weeks old, so that the parent and his youngest child never saw each other. The embryotic physician was brought to this country about 1757, when he was twelve years old, by his brother, a British officer serving in Canada. He received his medical education in Philadelphia, at the charge of this brother, who may be supposed to have procured him the position which he subsequently held of surgeon in the King's army. After practicing in North Carolina, in 1787 he married in Dutchess County, N. Y., and in 1795 removed to White Plains, where he practiced until his death, December 21, 1813, in his sixty-ninth year. The genealogy of the family indicates that one of his ancestors married a daughter of Robert Bruce. Personally very popular, his practice was large and his professional reputation so high that he was often called long distances for consultations.

His son, James Macdonald, studied medicine with Dr. David Palmer, of White Plains, and Dr. David Hosack, of New York. As an investigator of insanity, in the treatment of which he became an expert, he visited the principal lunacy asylums of Europe; and, on his return to this country, was one of the founders and proprietors of the Sanford Hall Asylum, at Flushing, L. I. He died in 1849, leaving his brother, Allen Macdonald, in charge of that institution.

Dr. Stephen Fowler, a native of Orange County, N. Y., practiced in New Castle, Westchester County, eight years previous to his death, which occurred in 1814, when he was but thirty-five years of age. Despite his youth, he was quite successful, and accumulated in that short time a moderate fortune. He died from typhoid pneumonia, which was then epidemic in the neighborhood. Dr. Joshua W. Bowron was one of his students, and upon his death located in the immediate vicinity of his office.

Dr. Donal, of Colaburg (now Croton), on the Hudson, was a young man who began practice in 1814, during the prevalence of typhoid pneumonia, and won much praise for his successful treatment of the disease by the stimulating plan. He removed to New York and died there.

Dr. Clark Sanford resided at Greenwich, Conn., but for thirty years prior to his death, in 1820, when he was over sixty years old, had a wide professional connection in Westchester County. He was a native of Vermont, and the manufacturer of a superior article of pulverized Peruvian bark. His grinding-mills were at Byrom's Mills, now called Glenville; they were the first establishment of the kind in the United States, and his son John continued and enlarged the business with great profit. He is spoken of as "a bold practitioner of both medicine and surgery." He was a very eccentric man and an inveterate smoker, always carrying his pipe between his lips or in his boot leg. He could never endure the smell of ipecacuanha, which produced in him an asthmatic affection. He educated to the profession his son Josephus, who settled in the South and died there. Another son, Henry, became an apothecary in New York City.

Dr. William H. Sackett, born at Greenwich, Conn., in 1781, made his home at Bedford, Westchester County, about 1805, and married a daughter of Col. Jesse Holly some three years later. A man of splendid general culture, and a keen student of the new lights then being thrown upon the science of medicine by Cullen, Brown, Darwin and Rush, he was esteemed the most accomplished physician in the county. He had graduated at Yale and pursued his medical studies under Dr. Perry, at Ridgefield, Conn. Prompt in response to calls, he rode the country over on a fast gray mare which is still associated with his memory. To his excessively arduous labor is attributed his premature death, for he passed away December 29, 1820, in the thirty-ninth year of his age. He was the preceptor of Dr. Joseph Baily and Dr. Mead, of Tarrytown.

Dr. Ebenezer White, son of Rev. Ebenezer White, of Southampton, L. I., was born in the lower section of Westchester County, in 1744, located in Yorktown before the Revolution and was so ardent a patriot that the British made several attempts to capture him. Once a squadron of horse were sent to Crompond with orders to surround his house and take him prisoner, so that he might be exchanged for a British surgeon whom the Americans held. A friendly warning enabled him to escape, but they seized Dr. James Brewer, who resided in the neighborhood, and in a skirmish with a party of Americans who fired upon them as they were passing along Stoney Street, Dr. Brewer was mortally wounded. He expired the next morning, November 20, 1780, in the arms of Dr. White. He was a native of Massachusetts, but thirty-nine years old, and the husband of Hannah Brewer, by whom he had four sons and three daughters. Dr. James Brewer, of Peekskill, was his grandson. Dr. White was prominent in politics and the church. He was once elected to the New York State Senate, and died March 8, 1825, aged eighty-one.

Dr. Henry White, son of Dr. Ebenezer White, was born at Yorktown, August 31, 1781, and studied medicine under the tuition of his father. In 1802 he attended the medical lectures at Columbia College. In 1803 he was in partnership with Dr. Joshua Secor, in New York City, but in the same year returned to the place of his nativity. In 1804 he practiced at Hackensack, but once more came back to Yorktown in the same year. The Westchester County Medical Society, in 1809, elected him delegate to the State Society for four years. He was for several years surrogate of the county, and in 1823 became one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas. He continued the general practice of medicine until about 1840, after which he accepted no calls except as consulting physician. He died in November, 1857.

Dr. Elisha Belcher was born in Lebanon, Conn., in 1757, and became surgeon's mate and surgeon in the Revolutionary army. Stationed at Greenwich, Conn., he made that place his residence after peace had been declared, and extended his practice across the State line into Westchester County. He educated many young men in the profession, including his sons Dr. William N. Belcher, of Sing Sing, and Dr. Elisha R. Belcher, of New York City. Four of his seven daughters married physicians—the fourth becoming the wife of Dr. Stephen Fowler, of North Castle, and after his death the wife of Dr. Henry White, of Yorktown. Other daughters married Dr. Darius Mead, of Greenwich, Conn., Dr. David Palmer, of White Plains, and Dr. Bartow F. White, of Somers, son of Dr. Ebenezer White. Dr. Elisha Belcher died in December, 1825, as he was approaching his sixty-ninth year.

Dr. John Ingersoll, born about 1745; the place of his nativity is unknown; came from the vicinity of Horseneck prior to 1804, and settled three miles north of Yonkers, where he died of delirium tremens in August, 1827. Being the first physician about Yonkers, he had a practice which obliged him to ride from King's Bridge to the outskirts of White Plains, and he would encounter the darkest night and the most pitiless storm rather than neglect his duty at the bedside of a patient. Until inebriety conquered him he was fairly successful as a physician and was especially favored in obstetrical cases, but his surgery is recorded to have been very bungling—probably because of a lack of training in that department.

Dr. Samuel Adams, a Scotchman by birth and surgeon in the British army, went upon the medical staff of the American forces during the Revolution, and then bought a farm near Mount Pleasant, which for nearly fifty years he cultivated while practicing his profession. Uncouth in his manners and abrupt in speech, his surgical skill yet caused him to be employed in difficult cases in all parts of the county, and his services were in constant requisition. His energy and will were indomitable, his perseverance unflinching, and he was a tyrant over his professional associates and his patients. His operations were of the heroic kind, and their progress emphasized with profuse oaths, the expressions of his passionate temper. He seems to have lived and died an avowed atheist. He served a term in the State Legislature, and was over ninety years of age when he died, about 1828.

Dr. Jeremiah Drake Fowler, born December 28, 1785, at Peekskill, studied at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, where he received his degree, and located at Sing Sing. No medical man could have been more popular than he was in his day, and he earned his eminence legitimately by skill in his profssion. He was a prominent member of the Westchester County Medical Society, and several times its delegate to the State Society. In 1817–18–he was elected justice of the peace and was also a practical surveyor. Through going security for friends he nearly ruined himself financially, and died October 28, 1828.

Dr. Samuel Strang, of Peekskill, was a son of Major Joseph Strang, of Revolutionary fame. The family name of L'Estrange has been corrupted from the original French form. They were Huguenot emigrés and came to this country in 1686. Dr. Strang was born in Yorktown in 1766, studied with Dr. Ebenezer White, married his daughter and moved to Peekskill, where he died in December, 1831. He was the preceptor of his son, Dr. Eugene J. Strang, who died at the age of twenty-seven, after practicing one year.

Dr. William F. Arnold, born at Chatham, Rensselaer County, New York, June 1, 1809, learned the drug business in the store of Drs. Platt and Nelson, at Rhinebeck, and was aided by friends to attend a course of lectures at Rutgers Medical College. When he located at White Plains, about 1829, he was almost penniless, but his abilities soon procured him a remunerative practice. In May, 1832, he married Miss Williams, of Rhinebeck, and shortly afterward removed to New York City on account of his failing health, but within a brief period returned to White Plains, where he and his brother conducted a drug-store in connection with his office practice. In the autumn of 1843 he went to St. Thomas, W. I., for the improvement of his health and practiced dentistry there, but his disease gained on him so rapidly that in the course of a year or two he started to return home and died on the voyage.

Dr. Howard Lee, of Sing Sing, practiced there previous to 1838, but made no mark on cotemporary records.

Dr. David Rogers moved from Fairfield, Conn., to Rye, in 1810, where he spent the remainder of his days in retirement. His son, Dr. David Rogers, Jr., settled at Mamaroneck in 1800, and from 1817 to 1820 was president of the Westchester County Medical Society; moving to New York City, in 1820, he died there in 1843 or '44, aged nearly seventy. His sons, Dr. David L. and Dr. James Rogers, followed him in the profession in the city.

Dr. Matson Smith, of New Rochelle, was born in 1767, at Lyme, Conn., where he studied medicine with Dr. Samuel Mather, whose daughter became his first wife. In 1787 he came to New Rochelle, and, notwithstanding his youth, quickly established a remarkably large practice, which in time covered most of the southern towns of the county. A memoir of him, prepared by his son, Dr. Joseph Mather Smith, says: "Devoted to the practice of physic proper, obstetrics and surgery, it may, perhaps, be said, aside from some of the rarer and more delicate operations of surgery, which he referred to special experts, that he was equally skillful in these departments." He adopted vaccination at a very early date after its introduction into this country, and took great pains to remove the doubts of those whose minds wavered in relation to its value. He was a close student of the modifications of disease induced by atmospheric influences, and of rare and new forms of epidemic maladies. His "Account of a Malignant Epidemic which prevailed in the County of Westchester in the Summer of 1812" was a most important contribution to the history of the scourge of typhoid pneumonia, so fatal about that time in the Northern and Eastern States, and a valuable aid to the treatment of it. He was for several years president of the Westchester County Medical Society, and in 1830 received from the regents of the University of New York the honorary degree of Doctor of Medicine. He was a devout Christian and foremost in educational projects, as well as in advocating the temperance cause. He died March 17, 1845.

Dr. Joseph M. Scribner was born at Bedford, Westchester County, May 11, 1793, and was licensed by the Medical Society of the county in April, 1817, after having studied with Dr. William H. Sackett and attended lectures at the New York City Hospital and the Medical Institution of the State of New York. Opening an office two and a half miles southeast of Sing Sing, he remained there a year and spent the next year at Bedford. For the succeeding fifteen years he had his office within a mile and a half of Tarrytown; then moving, in 1835, into that village, he continued his practice up to his death, on December 27, 1847. He died of ship-fever, contracted while attending at the almshouse upon emigrants, among whom the disease had broken out at sea.

Dr. Joseph Roe, born near Flushing, L. I., in 1811, graduated at the College of Physicians, New York City, having previously been instructed by Dr. John Graham and Drs. Bedford, Pendleton and Bush. Locating at White Plains, he went into partnership with Dr. David Palmer, then the only physician in the place. He contracted ship-fever at the same time and under the same circumstances as Dr. Scribner; in attending upon the latter he sacrificed his own strength, and died January 11, 1848. For many years he availed himself of the practice of the county almshouse as a school of observation, and was exceedingly kind to the forlorn and helpless paupers. He was the inventor of an improvement on Amesbury's splint. His name was coupled with that of Dr. Scribner in resolutions of regret passed by the County Medical Society, June 6, 1848, for "the death of two of our most worthy and esteemed professional brethren."

Dr. Isaac Gilbert Graham, born at Woodbury, Conn., September 10, 1760, was a son of Dr. Andrew Graham, who fitted him for the profession. At a very early age he was appointed assistant surgeon in the American army, and at West Point came under the personal notice of Washington, who is said to have conceived a warm feeling for him, because of his medical knowledge and his sturdy patriotism. He was granted an annual pension of four hundred and forty dollars by the government for his services. In 1784 he settled at Unionville, Westchester County, and practiced for nearly half a century. He was considered very skillful in treating cases of small-pox, or "winter fever," as it was then called, by inoculation, and is alleged to have earned fourteen hundred dollars in one season by this branch of practice, although he devoted much time to the poor, from whom he never looked for any recompense. He died September 1, 1848.

Dr. Stephen Allen Hart, born June 11, 1820, at Shrub Oak, Weschester County, was a student under Dr. John Collett, and in the spring of 1846 obtained his diploma from the University Medical College, in New York City. His career was brief, as he died at Yorktown, where he had practiced, on February 22, 1849.

Dr. Nathaniel Drake, born in Yorktown, August 27, 1763, was a pupil of Dr. Peter Hugeford and Dr. Ebenezer White. He attended medical lectures and dissections in New York City, and was one of the students obliged to seek safety in flight from the mob which attacked the dissecting departments. Subsequently to practicing for a short time in the town of his birth, he changed his location to Peekskill, where he died February 1, 1850. With him perished the name of his family. While in his general practice he always had his fair proportion, it was in the obstetrical branch that he especially bore off the palm.

Dr. George C. Finch was born April 6, 1817, at Croton Falls, Westchester County, and had for his first preceptor in medicine Dr. Seth Shove. Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, granted him his degree as Doctor of Medicine in the spring of 1841. He employed the next term in the Medical Department of the University of the City of New York, and, after being associated with Dr. Shove, went to his native place to practice. So strong was his opposition to the followers of Hahnemann, that when invited to meet a distinguished member of that school in consultation, he replied: "I would be pleased to meet with Dr. J. as an old friend and preceptor, but not as a physician." For six years he was supervisor of North Salem; in 1853 represented his district in the Legislature, and at the time of his death, May 28, 1856, was one of the committee for erecting new public buildings for the county.

Steven Archer was the son of John Archer, of Tarrytown, where he was born September 9, 1803. He married Emeline Ascough, and after her death was married to Deborah Underhill. His children were Sarah, wife of William Macy, of New York; Isaac; and Emma, wife of Dr. Joseph Hasbrouck. He died December 16, 1877.

Dr. Joshua W. Bowron, born at Washington, Dutchess County, in April, 1788, a pupil of Dr. Stephen Fowler, graduated at the Barclay Street College of Medicine, New York City. He began practice near Sing Sing, but soon removed to New Castle to occupy the field vacated by the death of Dr. Fowler, which he, filled for nearly forty years. In 1848 and 1849 he was president of the Westchester County Medical Society. His labors were so enormous that when about sixty-two years old he broke down under an apoplectic stroke, and died February 20, 1857.

Dr. Benjamin Bassett, born at Derby, Conn., December 6, 1784, was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, practiced at Yorktown from 1826 to 1829, and then settled at Peekskill, where he died March 21, 1858. He was president of the Westchester County Medical Society in 1846 and 1847, and in the latter year delivered an address "On the laws of epidemics as exhibited in those that had prevailed in the county the preceding twenty years." In 1831 he wrote a valuable treatise on "Epidemic Dysentery and Intermittent Fever," published in the New York Medical Journal for May of that year. About the same time he prepared several articles on the effect of sulphate of quinine, but it is not known when they were published. He honored his profession except in placing too low an estimate on the value of his services; "his charges were so small that he was unable to live in the manner suitable to a man of his ability, skill and position."

Dr. James Fountain was spoken of in the biographical sketch prepared by Dr. James Hart Curry, at the request of the Westchester County Medical Society, as "one of the most remarkable men of his time, in the region round-about him." Born at Bedford, January 30, 1790, he began the study of medicine under Dr. Sackett, and was one of the first, if not the very first, student from Westchester County to matriculate in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York City, where he graduated March 16, 1812. Beginning practice in his native county, in a year he moved to Staten Island, but, at the solicitation of his father, soon returned to Jefferson Valley. He had become a member of the Westchester County Medical Society a year before his graduation, and when, fifty years afterward, he resigned, he said, in his characteristic letter:—

"I witnessed its (the Society's) gradual rise to distinction until, in the acme of its usefulness and glory it was crippled by an act of our ignorant legislature. To court popularity and to support a mistaken Democracy, they, in their zeal to level all distinctions among men, passed a law declaring the ignorant quack and the most learned physician on a perfect level and equally entitled to protection. Since then our authority to keep down quackery has ceased, so that now a large portion of our best practice is enjoyed by ignorant quacks under the cloak of homœopathy. The consequences to our society are almost ruinous. Shorn of its power, its members have become discouraged, and a few only of the most faithful are found attending its meetings. All our struggles must be laborious so long as ignorance of physiology prevails among the people, and that must continue a long time.

"I am now in my seventieth year. I consider myself professionally dead. It is my last prayer that you may persevere until the rays of knowledge shall illumine the eyes of the people and induce them to value the realities of knowledge over ignorance and regard our profession in its true light."

He was frequently a delegate to the New York State Medical Society, and at the session of 1846 was made a permanent member. His numerous contributions to the medical journals, as full a list of which as can be made is embodied in the foregoing schedule of professional writings by Westchester physicians, bear witness to his profound research as well as to his pugnacious disposition. Having been thrown in his early practice greatly upon his own resources for medical agents, no drug-stores being near him, he became, of necessity, conversant with our indigenous medical botany, and applied it with marked results, and often with great success. He boldly and continually, and without the aid of the chemist, prescribed such potences as lobelia, scutellaria, actia sanguinaria, ergot, juglans, Indian hemp and many of the vegetable acids. But he was by no means restricted to any set of drugs or stereotyped forms of practice. If heroic practice means anything, Dr. Fountain was a hero of the boldest stamp. Arsenic, strychnine, mercury, tartar emetic, the lancet and the blister were the great weapons of his warfare, and he was not afraid to use them. In his treatment there was no half and half—he gave disease no quarter—and it must be confessed that often, in drawing out the enemy, he shook the citadel terribly, but when he had slain the foe, if the patient survived, like a discriminating general, he was quick to take advantage of circumstances, stopping medication when he thought the case would warrant, or modifying it as the symptoms might demand. In his treatment of old diseases, especially those of the lungs, as in asthma of the aged, hydrothorax and bronchorrhœa, notwithstanding (or rather by the aid of) blood-letting, antimony, ptyalism and blistering, he was remarkably successful, often holding the disease in abeyance for many years after it had become apparently incurable.

Neither in auscultation or percussion, nor, in fact, in any of the more modern modes of physical explorations, did he ever make much proficiency, and he professed but little faith in them, believing, until his death, that the rational signs of disease would generally lead the rational practitioner to a correct diagnosis.

In surgery he was not a brilliant operator, although his isolated position and immense practice continually forced him to use the knife. It was his boast, and true, that during a practice of fifty years no irregular practitioner had been able to make any head in all his field of practice, and it must be added that during his prime it was a risky matter for any physician, regular or otherwise, to infringe upon his domain. His cultivated mind and vastly superior medical attainments made him the natural antagonist of empiricism, and his indomitable will, his consciousness of his own superiority, raised the hands of others against his. "In fact," his son, Hosea Fountain, wrote, "he was in hot water the most of the time. Of course such a man had bitter enemies and strong, warm-hearted friends." His field of labor extended from Fishkill to Tarrytown, and from the Hudson River to beyond the Connecticut line. "He kept the best horses and rode constantly in the saddle; he was very active, was up and away before we were up. Would ride all day, and then in hot weather I have known him to strip to the skin and help his man draw hay off by moonlight; then off in the morning again as usual." In 1862 he removed to Waverly, N. Y., to spend the remainder of his days with his son. He died May 19, 1869, during a visit to his old home in Jefferson Valley, and was buried in the Presbyterian grave-yard at Crompond.

Dr. Seth Stephen Lounsbery[1] was born at Bedford, Westchester County, September 11, 1837, and in 1861 received his diploma from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, having previously studied medicine under the direction of his uncle, Dr. William Minos. After a year of city practice he accepted, September 15, 1862, a commission as assistant surgeon of the One Hundred and Seventieth Regiment New York Volunteers, and on December 22, 1864, was promoted to the rank of surgeon of the One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Regiment. In these commands, notwithstanding his feeble constitution, he served in the field almost continuously until the close of the war. At Cold Harbor he narrowly escaped being taken prisoner, and he witnessed most of the movements of the army of the Potomac around Richmond and at the Weldon Railroad. In October, 1865, he was associated with Dr. William S. Stanley in his practice at Mamaroneck, where he continued for the remainder of his life. He died, April 25, 1872, at his father's home in Bedford. In 1866 he joined the Westchester County Medical Society, and was usually present at its meetings.

Dr. Caleb W. Haight[2] was born in New York City February 20, 1820; came with his family to Bedford when he was a very young child. In the spring of 1842 he entered the office of Dr. Shove as a student, and in March, 1846, graduated at the University of the City of New York, beginning practice in September at Chappaqua. Eighteen months, subsequently, he removed to Pleasantville, where he died March 5, 1873. In 1848 he became a member of the Westchester Medical Society, in which from time to time, he acceptably filled all its important offices. He was a constant attendant at its meetings, and contributed liberally to its transactions. In 1860 he was elected a member of the American Medical Association, and in 1861 of the New York State Medical Society.

Dr. Peter Moulton,[3] at his death the oldest member of the Westchester County Medical Society, and probably the oldest physician in active practice in the county, was born at Oxford, N. H., October 7, 1794. In May, 1816, he began to study medicine with Dr. Cyril Carpenter, of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and, as a student was successively under Dr. Daniel Ayers, of Openheim, N. Y., and Dr. Nathaniel Drake, of Peekskill. He completed his studies as the private pupil of Dr. Cyrus Perkins, professor of anatomy and surgery in Dartmouth College, where he attended lectures and fulfilled all requirements necessary for his degree as doctor of medicine, but could not obtain it because two conflicting boards of trustees claimed to control the affairs of the institution. He, however, on November 8, 1819, passed an examination before the censors of the medical society of the county of New York, who granted him a license to practice, which for the greater part of his professional life, was his only diploma. But on March 27, 1860, the regents of the State University, at the instance of the State Medical Society, conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of medicine, and in 1864 he was elected a permanent member of the State Society. In November, 1819, he established himself in East Chester, and his reputation for learning and skill soon spread throughout that part of Westchester County. His practice extended into the towns of White Plains, Scarsdale, Yonkers, Greenburgh, New Rochelle, Pelham, Mamaroneck and Rye. In 1835 or '36 he transferred his location to New Rochelle, where he practiced for nearly forty years.

About two years before his death, while walking upon the track of the New Haven Railroad, a short distance above New Rochelle, he was struck by an engine and he and his medicine chest thrown thirty feet forward and down an embankment twenty feet deep. Refusing to go into the train, he walked home with his precious chest under his arm. "On my entrance," says Dr. Pryer, "he called out, 'doctor, I have a broken arm.' Proceeding to examine the arm very tenderly, fearful of giving pain, I said, 'are you sure it is broken?' 'Oh, yes,' said he, 'see here,' and he shook the elbow to and fro again and again, until the broken bones grated against one another in a manner that produces a shudder to this day when the sensation comes back to me. The doctor's scientific interest in proving the fracture was so great that it overcame entirely all sense of pain."

As a surgeon Dr. Moulton was bold and skilful, but it was as an obstetrician that he most excelled, and he is said to have assisted at the birth of more children than any other physician in the county. He was an accomplished botanist and drew many of his medicines from native plants gathered in his daily walks. It is not known at what date he became a member of the Westchester Counter County Medical Society, but since 1831 he held the following offices:

Elected in 1831, censor; 1833–34, treasurer; 1838, vice-president; 1836–37, president; 1838, censor; 1841, essayist for fall meeting; 1842, committee to draft rate bill, serving with Drs. Livingstone Roe and Gates; 1851, reported a case of puerperal peritonitis, treated by "opium alone;" 1852, censor; 1853, vice-president and committee to report on "Ship Fever;" 1854, vice-president; 1855, committee on surgery; 1857, essayist, also committee on Indigenous Medical Botany and served on this committee six years; 1858, delegate to American Medical Association; 1863, vice-president and delegate to American Medical Association; 1866, delegate to American Medical Association.

On December 1, 1873, Dr. Moulton rose early, visited various patients, traveled to New York City and back on professional business, and in the evening made visits to the sick in East Chester, Cooper's Corners, Mamaroneck and Scarsdale, in the teeth of an easterly storm. When he reached home he was too feeble to ascend to his bed-room and remained in his office all night in his wet clothing. Pneumonia supervened and he died on December 7th. On the 9th a meeting of the citizens of New Rochelle, at the Town Hall, passed resolutions of respect to his memory, and similar action was taken by the Board of Education and the Huguenot Lyceum, of both of which he had been a member. He had been made an honorary member of the Westchester County Medical Society at its annual meeting in 1869, and at the meeting in 1872, at White Plains, he met his brother members for the last time. On the day of his funeral, business was suspended in New Rochelle, flags hung at half-mast from the public and many private buildings, the church, school and engine-house bells were tolled, the schools were dismissed and the scholars stood bareheaded in the street as the cortege passed. No such honors had ever been paid to any private citizen of the town.

Dr. Philander Stewart[1] was born in Danbury, Connecticut, June 20, 1820, and in 1840 began to study for the profession in Brookfield, the adjoining town. At the medical institution of Yale College he attended his first course of lectures and graduated at Jefferson College, Philadelphia, in 1844. After two years of practice in Roxbury, Connecticut, he came to Peekskill, and although in three years he had established remunerative professional connections there, he returned to Philadelphia to avail himself of another course of lectures and clinical observations under Prof. Pancoast. Then he resumed his field of labor at Peekskill and cultivated it for upwards of thirty years. In the year 1857 he made a trip to Europe and pursued his investigations for some time in the hospitals and medical schools of the United Kingdom and the Continent. He early attached himself to the Westchester County Medical Society, in which he held every office, many of them for successive terms, and was frequently its delegate to the State Society. For twenty years he was a member of the latter body, making it a point never to be absent from its meetings. He was also from the beginning a member of the American Medical Association, and made long and expensive journeys to meet its annual sessions. As an operating surgeon, for years he was among the first in all the region about him. His manipulations and operations for strangulated hernia were very frequent and successful, as was his management in all cases of difficult parturition. He performed many amputations. His hand was steady, his instruments many and various, his knives were sharp, his determination almost dogged, his judgment good and he was never taken by surprise. In auscultation and percussion he was far above the average, his touch being delicate and his ear acute. If his diagnosis was sometimes shaped too much by his preconceived notion of things, and hence may have missed the mark, it was no more so than is peculiar to independent minds. His prognosis was remarkably true; he had an almost intuitive knowledge of the end from the beginning.

By being thrown from his carriage on May 26, 1869, Dr. Stewart broke an arm and was stunned by a blow upon the head. Terrible paroxysms of pain in the head attacked him; in October, 1872, he began to lose memory of names and places, his penmanship became entirely changed and he wrote with difficulty. A consultation with Dr. Brown-Sequard on December 3, 1873, resulted in pronouncing his case hopeless. He visited patients the next day, but was at once prostrated mentally and physically, and after ten weeks of darkness of intellect he died February 11, 1874.

Dr. Havilah Mowry Sprague,[2] born at Scotland, Windham County, Conn., July 4, 1835, received his first tuition in medicine in the office of Dr. Hutchins, West Killingly, Conn., and in 1858 became a student under Professor A. C. Post, New York City. He attended the New York University Medical College, and received at the close of the session of 1859–60 the first prize for the best report of clinical cases—a post-mortem set of instruments, which were finally used at his own autopsy.

He graduated March 4, 1864, receiving also a "Certificate of Honor" for having pursued a more extended course of study than is required by law. In the competitive examination for the position of "Junior Walker" in the New York Hospital, he passed an examination of superior excellence and was appointed. While here he passed the United States Army Medical Examining Board, standing No. 2 in general merit out of one hundred and twenty-five candidates examined (it is said that No. 1 was the son of the president of the Examining Board). He was commissioned assistant surgeon United States army May 28, 1861, and ordered to New Mexico, but upon his arrival in Missouri was attached to the army of General Lyon, was present when he was killed at Springfield, and subsequently received the thanks of the commanding general for bravery and skill in attendance upon the wounded.

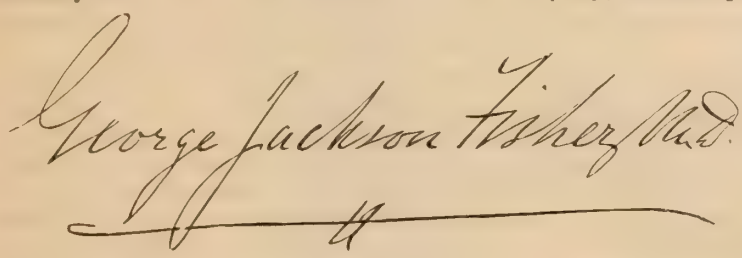
Dr. Sprague was transferred to Assistant Surgeon General Wood's office, in St. Louis, where he remained until early in 1863, when he was placed in command of the Eliot General Hospital, in St. Louis. That was shortly discontinued, and he took charge of the hospital steamer "City of Memphis," transporting the sick and wounded of Grant's army around Vicksburg to hospitals up the river. During the final days of the siege of Vicksburg he displayed exalted bravery and fidelity in attention to the men torn with shot and shell, sent to his steamer for such aid as the surgeons could render them. In November he was ordered on duty as secretary of the Army Medical Examining Board, in New York City, and then to command of the McDougall General Hospital, at Fort Schuyler, New York Harbor. Thence he was returned to the Examining Board, and in May, 1865, resigned from the army, his name standing high on the list for promotion. He began the practice of medicine at West Farms, and in 1868 moved to Fordham. He was appointed health officer of the town of West Farms, was the first physician to the "Home for Incurables," and first physician to the "House of Rest for Consumptives," at Tremont. He was a member of the Westchester County Medical Society, president of the Yonkers Medical Association, was elected a delegate to the American Medical Association for 1874 from the latter society, and was preparing to attend its meeting at Detroit, Mich., when he was arrested by death; was a corresponding member of the American Microscopic Society, and member of the New York Pathological Society. He was deeply learned in pathology, and marvelously skilled in the use of the microscope and the preparation of specimens. On May 30, 1874, he died at the "House of Rest," where he had been seized with a malarious attack during a visit on the previous day. An autopsy was made, and his brain was found to weigh sixty ounces.

John Foster Jenkins, A.M., M.D., was born at Falmouth, Mass., April 15, 1826. His preliminary course of medical reading was under Dr. Alexander M. Vedder, at Schenectady, N. Y., and in 1848 he received his degree from the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania. The next year he devoted to an extra course of didactic and clinical lectures at the Harvard Medical School, Boston. From May, 1849, to May, 1856, he practiced in the city of New York (except that from November, 1850, to July, 1851, he was in Europe, employing most of that time at the lectures and clinics and in the hospitals of Paris). In May, 1856, he located in Yonkers as a general practitioner of medicine, surgery and obstetrics. In August, 1861, he entered the service of the United States Sanitary Commission as hospital visitor and associate secretary, and in May, 1863, succeeded Frederick Law Olmsted as general secretary, an office which, in May, 1865, he was compelled to resign because of the failure of his health in the performance of its arduous obligations. He renewed his practice in Yonkers, and, in 1869, made a second voyage to Europe. On June 21, 1877, he was elected president of the Medical Society of the State of New York, but declined to accept because of his doubt as to the legality of the meeting at which he was chosen. Other offices which he held were as follows: Physician of the St. John's Riverside Hospital, at Yonkers; surgeon of the Yonkers Board of Police; senior warden of St. Paul's Parish, Yonkers; president of the Yonkers Medical Association (of which he was one of the founders); president of the Westchester County Medical Society; vice-president of the New York Obstetrical Society; permanent member of the American Medical Association; member of the American Public Health Association; corresponding Fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine; member of the American Social Science Association. In 1878 he spent six months at the sanitary resorts along the Mediterranean for the benefit of his health, and for nearly three years after his return kept steadily at his work. He died October 9, 1882, and, as an expression of the esteem in which he was held, the Yonkers Medical Association, at its next meeting, unanimously resolved to change its name to the "Jenkins Medical Association."

Dr. Jenkins was a student and an ardent lover of medical literature, both ancient and modern. He collected a large and valuable medical library. His contributions to the literature will be found in the list at the head of this chapter.

Dr. Henry L. Horton was born at Croton, Westchester County, December 6, 1826, and accumulated by manual labor the money which enabled him to enter the Albany Medical College, from where he graduated in 1858, but continued to serve some time afterward as house surgeon. In 1859 he removed to Morrisania and entered upon a large and successful practice. In 1879, and again in 1881, he visited Europe, but his health, which had greatly failed, was only partially restored, and on September 13, 1884, he again sailed. At Florence, Italy, a cold, which he caught while waiting outside the railway station, developed into p leurisy and ended fatally on February 24, 1885, at Rome. His remains were brought to his home and interred March 3d, at Sing Sing.



Dr. Platt Rogers Halsted Sawyer, born August 14, 1834, at Westport, N. Y., studied medicine with Dr. Bridges, at Ogdensburgh, N. Y., while engaged as principal of the High School of that town. After a course of lectures at the University of Vermont he entered the Albany Medical College, from which he graduated. At the opening of the Civil War he was commissioned assistant surgeon of the Forty-second Regiment, New York Volunteers, and was promoted to surgeon of the Ninety-sixth Regiment. After the muster out he practiced at Port Henry, N. Y., then at Gloversville, and in 1868 settled at Bedford, Westchester County, where he died March 31, 1885.

He was for two terms elected justice of the peace, and in 1881 was elected school commissioner and re-elected in 1884. He was a member, from its organization, of Stewart Hart Post, G. A. R., Mount Kisco, and its commander for one year; and an earnest and active member of Kisco Lodge, F. and A. M. Among other offices he had held were those of vice-president of the New York State Medical Society, president of the Westchester County Medical Society and for several years he was a trustee of the Bedford Academy.

BIOGRAPHY.

GEORGE JACKSON FISHER.

George Jackson Fisher, M.D., who has contributed more to the medical literature of Westchester County than any man either living or dead, was born in Westchester County, N. Y., November 27, 1825, and is a descendant of the early Dutch settlers, whose original name was Vischer. His father, who had been a merchant in the city of New York, removed to the central part of the State, and engaged in agricultural pursuits, when his son George was but eleven years of age. To his somewhat solitary life in the country the doctor attributes his fondness for Nature. To him she has always had "a voice of gladness, and a smile and eloquence of beauty," and much of his life has been spent in holding communion with her visible forms. This is the secret of his preference for rural and village life, instead of the allurements of a city practice. The principal portion of his office pupilage was under the direction of Dr. Nelson Nivison, then of Mecklenburgh, Tompkins County, N. Y., now professor of physiology and pathology in the Medical Department of the Syracuse University. Dr. Fisher attended his first courses of medical lectures at the Medical Department of the University of Buffalo, at which time Austin Flint, Sr., Frank Hastings Hamilton, James P. White and other celebrated professors gave character to this excellent school of medicine. He next attended the lectures and demonstrations at the Medical Department of the University of the City of New York, where Mott, Pattison and Draper were the great luminaries of science and practice. Here he graduated in the class of 1849. Immediately thereafter he entered into a copartnership with his preceptor. In 1851 he removed to Sing Sing, where he has continued his practice to the present time. In his time he has performed most of the important operations of surgery, including amputations, trephining, ovariotomy, the Cæsarean section, the removal of uterine fibroids, and, on two occasions, the ligation of the common carotid artery, with successful results. He has been the recipient of many honors, among which was the honorary degree of Master of Arts, in 1859, from Madison University; twice the presidency of the Medical Society of Westchester County; in 1864, vice-president of theMedical Society of the State of New York, and in 1874 president of the same; corresponding member of the Boston Gynæcological Society; Fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine; member of the New York Lyceum of Natural History; corresponding member of the New York Historical Society; permanent member of the Medical Society of the State of New York, and of the American Medical Association; delegate from the Medical Society of the State of New York to the International Medical Congress in Philadelphia, in 1876, etc. He has also held the office of president of the village of Sing Sing, and was for several years physician and surgeon of the State Prisons at Sing Sing, for both males and females. For twenty years he was brigade-surgeon, N. Y. S. M., and, for a like period, United States examining surgeon in the Pension Bureau.

On several occasions he served as a volunteer surgeon for the United States Sanitary Commission, after the great battles of the Rebellion, and also as medical director of a floating hospital.

His professional essays which have been thus far printed amount to not less than one thousand octavo pages. They embrace a variety of interesting topics; among them are the following titles: "Biographical Sketches of Deceased Physicians of Westchester County, N. Y." (1861); "On the Animal Substances employed as Medicines by the Ancients" (1862); "Diploteratology," or an essay on "Double-Monsters" (Trans. of the Med. Soc. of the State of N. Y., 1865–68); "A Brief History of the Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood" (Pop. Sci. Monthly, July, 1877); "Teratology" (Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia, vol. iv.); "Influence of the Maternal Mind in the Production of Malformations" (Amer. Journ. of Insanity, vol. xxvi. January, 1870); "Sketches of the Lives, Times and Works of some of the Old Masters of Anatomy, Surgery and Medicine" (consisting of twenty sketches, in Annals of Anatomy and Surgery, vols. ii.–viii., 1880–83); "History of Surgery" (International Encyclopædia of Surgery," vol. vi., N. Y., 1886). Several minor articles could be added to the above list.

Dr. Fisher has shown a profound interest in the literature of his profession, both ancient and modern. His library, which is quite well known to the medical scholars of the country, contains about four thousand volumes, including many of the rarest books now existing, in most of the departments of the healing art. There is, perhaps, no collection of the medical classics equal to his to be found in private hands in the United States. It includes large series of works illustrating the development of anatomy, surgery, materia medica and medicine, from the earliest periods to the present time. His collections of works pertaining to the history of medicine, and the biography of physicians and surgeons, are quite extensive.

The doctor has also been to great pains and cost in collecting the bibliography of teratology, a subject to which he has bestowed special attention. Mention should also be made of his collection of medals relating to the medical profession; and, also, of his collection of more than one thousand engraved portraits of celebrated physicians, surgeons, anatomists and medical authors. His library is enriched by a well-selected collection of medical essays, embracing about three thousand pamphlets, all carefully catalogued and indexed. His private museum contains collections of typical objects in conchology, palæontology, mineralogy and archæology. The latter department is quite rich in specimens of the stone implements of the American aborigines.

It is to Dr. Fisher that we are indebted for the history of the town of Ossining, which forms one of the chapters of this work.

THE JAY FAMILY.

The Jay family,[1] so well-known throughout Westchester County, and indeed throughout the whole country, trace their ancestry to Pierre Jay, who left France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

He was an active and opulant merchant, extensively and profitably engaged in commerce. He married Judith, a daughter of Mr. Francois, a merchant in Rochelle. One of her sisters married M. Mouchard, whose son was a director of the French East India Company. Pierre Jay had three sons and one daughter. The sons were Francis, who was the eldest; Augustus, born March 23, 1665 and Isaac. The daughter's name was Frances. Mr. Jay seems to have been solicitous to have one of his sons educated in England. He first sent his eldest, but he unfortunately died of sea-sickness on the passage. Notwithstanding this distressing event, he immediately sent over Augustus, who was then only twelve years old. In 1683, he recalled Augustus and sent him to Africa, but to what part or for what purpose is now unknown.

During the absence of Augustus, the persecution of the Protestants in France became severe; and Pierre Jay became one of its objects. Dragoons were quartered in his house, and his family were subjected to serious annoyance. He was imprisoned in the castle of Rochelle, but was released through the influence of some Roman Catholic connections. Having at the time several vessels out at sea which were expected soon in port, he desired a Protestant pilot in his employ to take the first of these vessels that should arrive to a place agreed upon the Island of Rhé. The ship that arrived first was one from Spain, of which he was the sole owner. The pilot was faithful to his trust, and in due time Mr. Jay reached England and rejoined his family, whom he had sent to England some time before, at Plymouth.

Augustus Jay returned to France from Africa, ignorant of these family changes. As it was unsafe to appear in Rochelle openly, he was secreted for some time by his aunt, Madame Mouchard, a Protestant, but whose husband was a Roman Catholic. With the help of his friends he escaped to the West Indies, and thence to Charleston, S. C. The climate proving unfavorable, he removed to Philadelphia and afterwards to Esopus on the Hudson River, where he entered into business; but ultimately settled in New York. He re-visited France and England in 1692, and saw his father and sister; his mother had lately died.

In 1697 he married, in New York Anna Maria, daughter of Balthazar Bayard, the descendant of a Protestant professor of theology at Paris in the reign of Louis XIII., who had been compelled to leave Paris and take refuge with his wife and children in Holland; whence several members of the family came to America. Mrs. Jay was a woman of eminent piety. It is mentioned that she died while on her knees in prayer.

Augustus Jay lived to the good old age of eighty-six, respected and esteemed by his fellow citizens, and died in New York where he had pursued his calling as a merchant with credit and success, March 10, 1751.

Peter Jay, only son of Augustus, married Mary, daughter of Jacobus VanCortlandt, January 20, 1728. Like his father, he was a merchant in the city of New York. Having earned a fortune which added to the property he had acquired by inheritance and marriage, he thought sufficient, he resolved when little more than forty years old, to retire into the country, and for this purpose purchased a farm at Rye, where he died April 17, 1782.

James Jay, third son of Peter, born October 16, 1732, became Sir James Jay, Kt.; he resided for some years in England, and returned after the Revolution to New York, where he lived until his death, October 20, 1815. On his return from England in 1784 or 1785, he brought propositions from the Countess of Huntington to some of the States of the Union, for establishing settlements of emigrants among the Indians, with a view to civilizing them, and converting them to Christianity. General Washington in a letter to him dated January 25, 1785, expresses his entire approval of the plan, and suggests that it should be brought before Congress.[1]

Peter, fourth son of Peter Jay, and brother of the former, was born December 19, 1734, and married in 1789, Mary Duyckinck. Though he had the misfortune of losing his eyesight in early life through an attack of small-pox, many interesting stories are related of his ingenuity and sagacity and he is said to have possessed a fine mind and an excellent character.

John Jay, sixth son of Peter, was born December 12, 1745. His boyhood was spent at Rye and New Rochelle. He was admitted to the bar in 1768. On April 28, 1774, he married Sarah, daughter of William Livingston, afterwards governor of New Jersey. He soon took a foremost position in the politics of the country, and was prominent in the debates of the first and the second Continental Congress. In 1777 he was appointed chief justice of the State of New York. In 1778 he was elected president of Congress. In 1779 he was sent as Minister to Spain, and from thence, in 1780, went to Paris as Commissioner to assist in the negotiation of a treaty of peace with Great Britain. He returned to New York in 1784, after an absence of five years, and was received with tokens of esteem and admiration. December 21, 1784, he was appointed by Congress, secretary for foreign affairs, and held the office for five years. He was one of the contributors to The Federalist. In 1789 he was appointed chief justice of the United States,—an office which he was the first to fill. In 1794 he was sent as special Minister to London, upon a delicate and most important mission, relating to difficulties growing out of unsettled boundaries and certain commercial complications. He discharged this duty with great ability, and upon his return to America, in 1795, was elected by a large majority Governor of the State of New York. At the end of three years he was re-elected, and at the expiration of a second term was solicited to become a candidate for election a third time. But he had determined to renounce public life, and though nominated again in 1800, to the office of chief justice of the United States, declined the honor, and retired to his paternal estate, at Bedford; a property—part of the Van Cortlandt estate—which his father had acquired by marriage with Mary, a daughter of Jacobus Van Cortlandt. There he lived for twenty-eight years a peaceful and honored life. In 1827 he was seized with severe illness, and after two years of weakness and suffering, was struck with palsy, May 14, 1829, and died three days after. He was buried in the family cemetery at Rye. His public reputation as a patriot and statesman of the Revolution was second only to that of Washington, and his private character as a man and a Christian is singularly free from stain or blemish.[2]

Peter Augustus, eldest son of John Jay, was born January 24, 1776. He graduated from Columbia College in 1794 and studied law under Peter J. Monroe. He married Mary Rutherford, daughter of General Matthew Clarkson, and became prominent in the legal profession and public affairs. He was a member of the State Assembly in 1816; recorder of New York in 1818; a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the State in 1821, and for many years president of the New York Historical Society, trustee of Columbia College, etc. He received the degree of LL.D. in 1831, from Harvard, and in 1835 from Columbia. He died February 20, 1843.

John Clarkson Jay, M.D., eldest son of Peter Augustus, was born September 11, 1808, and married Laura, daughter of Nathaniel Prime. He is the proprietor of the estate at Rye, and the present well-known representative of the family in Westchester County. After a thorough preparation in private schools, among which were those of the blind teacher, Mr. Nelson, and the McCulloch school at Morristown, N. Y., he entered Columbia College, from which he graduated, together, with the late Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish, and many other distinguished men in the class of 1827.[3] In 1831 he took his degree as M.D. He has been a deep student of natural history, especially of conchology, and the valuable collection of shells, formerly in his possession, and which is now in the New York Museum of Natural History, having been purchased by Miss Wolf and presented to that institution by her, in memory of her father, has the reputation of being the finest in the country. On this branch Dr. Jay has written several pamphlets, among which are the following: "Catalogue of Recent Shells, etc.," New York, 1835, 8vo, pp. 56; "Description of New and Rare Shells, with four plates," New York, 1836, 2d ed., pp. 78; "A Catalogue, &c., together with a description of new and Rare Species," New York, pp. 125, 4to., ten plates. The article on shells in the narrative of Commodore Perry's expedition to Japan, is also by him. He has been connected with many prominent literary and social organizations, both in Westchester County and in the city of New York, where he spends much of his time. He has been for many years a trustee of Columbia College, and has, at two different periods, served as trustee of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the City of New York. He was one of the founders and at one time recording secretary of the New York Yacht Club, the annals of which will show the lively interest which he took in its management and general affairs. The records of the New York Lyceum of Natural History, now known as the New York Academy of Natural Sciences, will exhibit the interest manifested by him in that most useful organization.

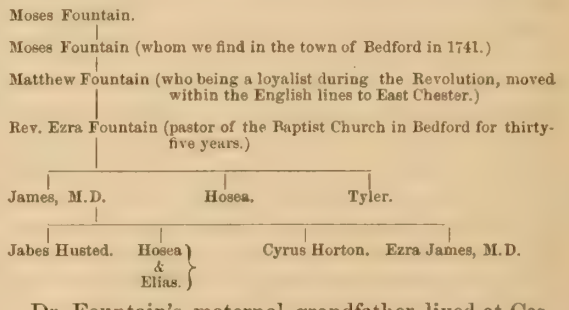
Dr. Jay is an Episcopalian and has been connected for many years with Christ Church, Rye, of which he is warden. He is well known throughout Westchester County, where he has long been greatly appreciated for his social and literary qualities.

These and many other illustrious names have adorned the history of the Jay family in America, the members of which have ever been faithful to their country, faithful to their religion and faithful to themselves. Their residence there has added lustre to Westchester County, and their noble influence will be remembered while American history continues to be read.

WILLIAM ANDERSON VARIAN.



William Anderson Varian, M.D., is descended from an old French family, who came to this country at an early date, the regular line of descent being as follows: First, Isaac, who was living in New York in 1720 and died about 1800; second, James, born January 10, 1734, died December 11, 1800; third, James, born November 22, 1765, died December 26, 1841; fourth, Dr. William A. Varian, who was born at Scarsdale January 23, 1820. His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of John Cornell, a member of the Society of Friends and of a family noted for patriotism and virtue. He attended school in his native place up to the age of sixteen, and then went to White Plains, where he was a student at the academy for three years. He then entered the office of Livingston Roe, M.D., and continued with him for the same period. The death of his father, which occurred about that time, rendered it necessary for him to labor for his own support, and for a while he was employed as a teacher in East Chester. He afterwards entered the office of Dr. James R. Wood, a prominent physician of New York, and remained under his instruction for three years, at the same time attending the lectures at the medical department of the University of the City of New York, where he graduated, with the degree of M.D., March 4, 1846. After practicing for one year in New York he removed to King's Bridge, which has ever since been his home, and has been constantly employed in the practice of his profession. In 1849 he purchased a portion of the old Macomb estate and erected his present residence. He married Frances Elizabeth, daughter of Francis Losee, September 11, 1845. Their children were Sarah (deceased), Pamelia (wife of Maynard L. Granger), James (of Neola, Iowa), George Dibble (deceased), Sarah and Alice (both deceased).

Dr. Varian is one of the oldest residents of King's Bridge and thoroughly acquainted with the history of the locality and its early families. When he commenced practice, the country round was thinly settled, and his rides to visit his patients extended from One Hundred and Tenth Street on one hand to Greenburgh on the other. He was also frequently called to the villages on the western bank of the Hudson, and on one occasion, while crossing during a cold winter night, his boat became fast in the floes of floating ice and drifted below Fort Washington; he and his two companions narrowly escaping a watery grave. He was present when ground was broken for the Hudson River Railroad and was surgeon for the company of contractors, they paying him at the rate of twenty-five cents a month for each man on the work.

In 1850 he made the acquaintance of Dr. Edwin N. Bibby, a prominent physician of New York, and this acquaintance ripened into a deep friendship, which lasted till the death of Dr. Bibby, in 1882. He was for many years his family physician, Dr. Bibby having retired from practice and spent the last years of his life on the Van Cortlandt Manor. During the late war Dr. Varian was a strong friend of the Union and plainly outspoken in his sentiments. During the riots in 1863 his life was repeatedly threatened, and for a while he made his professional visits armed with a double-barreled gun and a revolver, which he would have unhesitatingly used had occasion required. In politics and religion he maintains independent and liberal views, and the evening of his life is passed in the enjoyment of friends and home. He had for many years been one of the police surgeons of New York and commands the respect of his professional brethren.

HOSEA FOUNTAIN, M.D.

Hosea Fountain, M.D., the second son of James Fountain, M.D., was born at Jefferson Valley, a hamlet in the northern portion of Yorktown, July 24, 1817. His ancestry, both paternal and maternal, were English. The Fountain family, probably, were of Norman origin, and are supposed to be descended from Sir John Fountain, a monument to whom is found in a village church-yard in Devonshire, England. Moses Fountain emigrated from Bedfordshire, England, in 1650. The genealogy is as follows,—

Dr. Fountain's maternal grandfather lived at Coscob, Conn., prior to the Revolution, but being a loyalist his property was confiscated and he was obliged to accept a settlement at the hands of the British government at St. John, New Brunswick. Charlotte Husted was born there, but at the age of twelve or thirteen years, came to New York to reside with her aunt, who was a Van Guilder. Here, doubtless, Dr. James Fountain made her acquaintance.

Hosea Fountain received his English education in the district school of his native village, and at a school kept by a Rev. Mr. Patterson, in Patterson, Putnam County, N. Y. His professional studies were pursued at several schools. He attended the medical department of Fairfield College, Fairfield, N. Y., 1835–36; Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, Pa., 1836–37; College of Physicians and Surgeons New York, 1837–38, and would have graduated at the latter in March, 1838, if he had reached his majority. For this reason we find him in 1838–39 at the Medical Institution of Yale College, New Haven, Ct. He received his degree of M.D. March 26, 1839, from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, and spent six months in the New York Hospital. He practiced medicine with his father at Jefferson Valley for a time, and after his marriage with Mary Horton, daughter of Joel and Harriet Montrous Horton, in February 19, 1840, he settled at Peekskill. In 1843 he removed to Somers, and later in 1854 or 1855 he purchased the property on which he resided, until his death, August 28, 1885. Yorktown and the adjoining town of Somers were the field of his professional labors, until April, 1884, more than forty years. He was laid to rest September 1, 1885. The funeral took place in the Presbyterian Church, which was filled with those who, themselves or in their families, had had the benefit at one time or another of his professional services. June 20, 1872, he married, as his second wife, Mary Brett, daughter of James and Helen Ann Brett, of Fishkill and grand-daughter of Ebenezer White, M.D., of Somers. She survives him. The issue of the first marriage are Harriet Louise, Elias, Charlotte (now Mrs. Erskine Westervelt, of Hackensack, N. J.), and Mary Emma (now Mrs. Theodore F. Tompkins, of Yorktown.) Of the second, Grace, Elias Fountain (who was second lieutenant of the Sixth New York Heavy Artillery, and died from the effects of a wound received at Cedar Creek, Va., October 19, 1864), and his sister, Harriet Louise, who died ten days later from a gangrenous sore-throat, contracted from him while caring for him in his last illness.

THE HASBROUCK FAMILY.

The Hasbrouck family is of French Huguenot origin, and descended from Abraham Hasbroucq, who was a native of Calais. His father moved to the Palatinate, in Germany, with his two sons, Jean and Abraham, and a daughter. Here they lived for several years, and in 1675 Abraham Hasbroucq came to America "with several of his acquaintances, the descendants or followers of Peter Waldus." He landed at Boston, and in July, 1675, found his way to Esopus, Ulster County, N. Y., where he found his brother Jean, "who had come two years before." The next year he married Marie, daughter of Christian Duyou (Deyo), with whom he was acquainted in the Palatinate. She died March 27, 1741, at the age of eighty-eight. In 1677 he, with twelve others, obtained a patent from Governor Andross, for a large tract of land at New Paltz, in Ulster County, where he and his brother settled and "lived and died there." Abraham Hasbroucq was one of the founders of the Walloon Protestant Church, at New Paltz. He was a very prominent citizen, and for many years a member of the Provincial Assembly. On Sunday, March 17, 1717, he was struck with apoplexy, "whereof he died very suddenly at a very good old age, and rests in the Lord till his coming to judge both the quick and the dead." He left five children,—Joseph, Solomon (who died April 3, 1753), Daniel (died January 25th, 1759, aged sixty-seven), Benjamin and Rachel, (wife of Louis Dubois).

Joseph, the eldest son, married, in 1706, Elsie, daughter of Captain Joachim Schoonmaker, whose father, Hendrick Joakimse Schoonmaker, "was a native of Hanse Town, in Germany." Joseph Hasbrouck died January 28, 1723–24, age forty years and three months. His wife, Elsie, died July 27, 1764, aged seventy-eight years, eight months, three days, "and was buried at New Paltz by the side of her husband. She brought up all her children in honor and credit." They left "six sons and four daughters,"—Abraham; Isaac D.; Rachel, born 1715, died 1756, wife of Jan Eltinge; Mary, wife of Abraham Hardenberg, born January 10, 1714, died 1774; Sarah, wife of William Osterhoudt, born February 21, 1709, died 1780; Benjamin; Jacob, who married Mary Hoornbeck; and Colonel Jonathan.[1] The names of one son and one daughter do not appear. Abraham, the eldest son, was born on the old family homestead at Guilford, Ulster County, August 21, 1707. He married his first cousin, Catharine Bruyn, January 5, 1788–89. She was born June 24, 1720, and died August 10, 1793. She was a daughter of Jacobus Bruyn, and his wife, Tryntie, who was a daughter of Captain Joakim Schoonmaker, and died August 27, 1763, aged seventy-eight. The father of Jacobus Bruyn "was a native of Norway, and came here in the Dutch time, and married Gertruy Esselstein." Jacobus Bruyn lived at Bruynswyck, in Ulster County, and died November 21, 1744, aged sixty-four. He had a sister Esther, who married Zachariah Hoffman. Abraham Hasbrouck was one of the most prominent men of Ulster County, and was for thirty years a member of the Legislature. He settled in Kingston in 1735, and died there November 10, 1791, and "was buried the next day with the honors of war." He left eight children,—Elsie, wife of Abraham Salisbury; Catharine, wife of Abram Houghtaling; Mary, wife of David Bevier; Jonathan, who married Catharine, daughter of Cornelius and Catharine Wynkoop; Joseph, who married Elizabeth Bevier; Jacobus, who married Maria, daughter of Charles De Witt; and Daniel, who married Rachel, daughter of Colonel Jonathan Hasbrouck (his uncle), of Newburgh.

Isaac Hasbrouck, the second son of Joseph, was born March 12, 1712 (o.s.). In 1766 he married Antie Low, widow of John Van Gaasbeck. They had three children—Joseph, Elsie and Jane, wife of John Crispell. Isaac died April 6, 1778, "and was buried at the Shawangunk church-yard, near the burying-place of Jacobus Bruyn's family." His widow, Antie, died October 2, 1784.

Joseph Hasbrouck, the son of Isaac and Antie, married Cornelia, daughter of Edmond Schoonmaker, and they were the parents of nine children—Stephen; Sarah, wife of David Tuttle; Maria, wife of Thomas Ostrander; Jane, wife of Cornelius De Witt; Katy, wife of Samuel Johnson; Levi, George, Abel and Augustus.

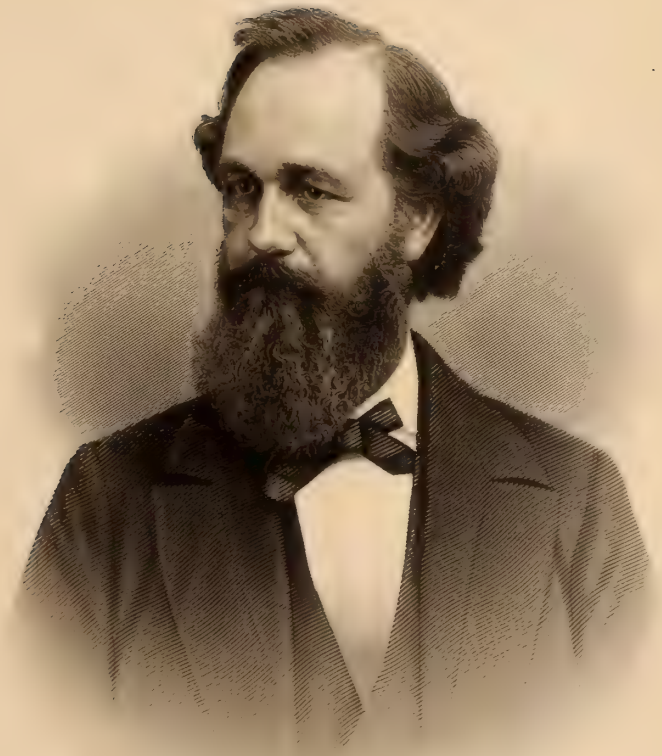
[1] Col. Jonathan Hasbrouck was the youngest child, and was born April 12, 1722. He married Tryntie, daughter of Cornelius Dubois, and settled in Newburgh. He died July 31, 1780, and "was buried on his own land by two of his sons, between his house and the North River." His homestead is the famous "Washington's Headquarters," at Newburgh, now owned by the State of New York. He left children—Cornelius, Isaac, Jonathan, Rachel and Mary. He was a very tall man, being six feet four inches in height.

Stephen Hasbrouck, M.D., son of Augustus Hasbrouck and Jane Elting, was born in Bergen County, N. J., January 29, 1842. His maternal grandfather was pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church at Paramus for thirty years. At the age of fourteen young Hasbrouck went to Great Falls, Mass., where he engaged as a clerk. He stayed three years, then returned home, and attended the Normal School at Trenton, and afterwards entered business as a commission merchant in New York. In 1862 he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and afterwards studied in the New York Homœopathic Medical College. At the close of the late war a colony from New Orleans, composed of persons who had been disloyal to the Union, resolved to seek a new home in Brazil. They numbered about three hundred souls, and engaged the services of Dr. Hasbrouck as surgeon to the expedition. The experience of a few years convinced most of them that they had not bettered their condition by leaving their native country, and, through the influence of Dr. Hasbrouck, the captains of some of the United States war vessels were induced to bring back the relics of the colony, who returned much better reconciled to the government and the starry flag than when they went away. While in Brazil he wrote a history of the practice of homœopathy in that country, which was published by the New England Medical Gazette. He was on the island of St. Thomas during the hurricane and earthquake which devastated it, and published the first description of the fearful scene of destruction. On his return he graduated from the New York Homœopathic Medical College, and settled at Dobbs Ferry, where he remained three years in the practice of his profession. In 1874 he removed to New York, where he stayed till 1881, when he made a very extensive tour in Europe and the East, visiting Egypt and Palestine and most of the countries of the Old World. Returning from his travels in 1883, he settled in Yonkers, which has since been his home.



He married Anna M., daughter of Captain John Stillwell, of New York, and has two children—Augustus and Mabel. He holds a good position among the members of the homœopathic medical profession, and is esteemed as a useful and worthy citizen.

Dr. Hasbrouck's maternal grandfather, Wilhelmus Elting, was of Huguenot origin, and his ancestry could be traced back to Henry IV. of France. Dr. Hasbrouck was a surgeon in the Brazilian army during the war with Paraguay, and, while in South America, passed through several epidemics of small-pox and cholera. He was in St. Thomas during a violent epidemic of yellow fever, and the good results that followed his methods of treatment proved their efficacy.

Joseph Hasbrouck, M.D., was born in Bergen County, New Jersey, March 20, 1839, and remained in his native village till the age of fifteen, when he commenced teaching school, in which he was engaged for two years.

At the establishment of the New Jersey Normal School he entered that institution, and graduated in due time. He then engaged in teaching until he reached the age of twenty-nine. During the latter part of this period he pursued the study of medicine, and in 1869 graduated from the Medical Department of the University of the City of New York. He immediately investigated the system of homœopathy, and has since practiced it. His first year of practice was at Goshen, Orange County, N. Y. From thence he removed to Newton, Sussex County, N. J., and was the first to practice homœopathy in that county. In 1875 he removed to Dobbs Ferry, which has since been his place of residence. He is a member of the Westchester County Homœopathic Medical Society, and was its president for two years. He has been four times married. His wives were Sarah and Anna D., both daughters of Elias Dayton, of New Jersey, and cousins of Hon. Wm. L. Dayton; Emma, daughter of Steven Archer; and Ellen M., daughter of Rev. D. L. Marks, of the New York Conference. Of the children of Dr. Hasbrouck, his eldest son, Dayton, who died January 13, 1885, at the age of twenty four, was at the time of his death a member of the senior class of the New York Homœopathic College. His surviving children are Edith S. and Mabel E., twin daughters, and an infant son, David Marks.

Although not a professional politician, he has always taken a deep interest in political affairs, and is especially interested in all that pertains to the welfare of the locality in which he lives. He has been for several years a member of the Board of Education of Dobbs Ferry, and is its present president. He is also health officer of the village, and president of the savings bank. He has been connected with the Republican party since its organization, and has always taken a deep interest in its success.

His residence is one of the historical land marks of Westchester County. It is the old Livingston mansion, formerly the residence of Van Brugh Livingston. It was at this house that General Washington, Governor Clinton and General Sir Guy Tarleton met on the suspension of hostilities, May 3, 1783, to arrange for the evacuation of New York. The mansion, which is a well-preserved relic of olden times, stands on the east side of the old Albany post road, a short distance below Livingston Avenue. The place was sold by Van Brugh Livingston to Steven Archer in 1836, and was his residence till the time of his death, which occurred in 1877, and was purchased from his heirs by Dr. Hasbrouck in 1882.

Dr. Levi Wells Flagg was born in West Hartford, Conn., February 14, 1817. After receiving a thorough primary education, he became a student of Yale College, where he graduated in 1839. Among his classmates were Charles Astor Bristed and John Sherwood, of New York, Rev. Francis Wharton, joint author of "Wharton and Stille's Medical Jurisprudence," and Hon. H. L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, ex-Governor Hall of Missouri, Prof. J. D. Whitney, of California, the eminent chemist and geologist, and others who have become distinguished.

After graduating he went south and spent three years in teaching in St. Francisville, Louisiana. Returning to his native place in 1842, he studied medicine for a year with Dr. Pinckney W. Ellsworth. At the expiration of that time removing to New York City, he entered the office of Prof. Willard Parker, with whom he remained two years. In 1847 he graduated at the College of Physicians and Surgeons (old Crosby Street school), and in the following year established himself in Yonkers as an allopathic physician. Shortly afterward he was induced to investigate homœopathy, the result being a conviction as he said of its superiority over the old system of practice. He at once became its strong advocate and the pioneer practitioner in the county. His success in introducing the new system was most marked; he grew rapidly in favor with the community, acquiring wealth and a pre-eminent position among the physicians of the locality.

Notwithstanding his change of faith, the relations between himself and his old teacher, Professor Parker, greatly to the honor of the latter ever continued of the most friendly character.

Dr. Flagg avoided politics entirely, and never held any public office of a political character. He always devoted himself wholly to his profession, in which he was a zealous and untiring worker; a portion of a year spent in Europe and a short time in Mexico, being almost the only relaxation he allowed himself between the commencement of his practice and his death on May 15, 1884.

When, in 1865, the Westchester County Homœopathic Medical Society was organized, he was elected its president and held that office for three years. He was also a member of the American Institute of Homœopathy.

He married on May 17, 1848, Charlotte Whitman, of Hartford, Conn., and had eight children, five of whom are still living. Their names are Howard W., Marietta W., Lucy W., George A. and Robert N. Flagg, M. D., who succeeds to the practice of his father.[1]

It is with pleasure that we present our readers with the above brief outline sketch of one of the most popular and successful physicians as well as most useful and upright citizens that it has ever been the good fortune of Westchester County to possess. Dr. Flagg came to Yonkers when the village was in its infancy and for thirty-six years watched its development and growth. No one was or could be better known than he. By his steadfast integrity, his professional ability and his genial and winning manner he won for himself the respect of the business community, an extensive and lucrative practice and a high social standing. His death not only creates a vacancy beside the family hearth, but is also a loss to the city and county in which he lived, which is irreparable.

ADRIAN K. HOFFMAN.

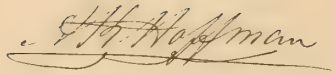
Dr. Adrian K. Hoffman, who is remembered as one of the most distinguished physicians of Westchester County, was born at the Manor of Livingston, in Columbia County, March 26, 1797. Entering the profession of medicine at an early age, his first experience was on a three years' cruise as surgeon's mate on board the United States man-of-war "Franklin," commanded by Commodore (afterwards Admiral) Charles Stewart. After his return Dr. Hoffman settled at Sing Sing, and for nearly half a century practiced his profession with great success. His reputation was widely extended, and he was justly esteemed by his fellow-citizens as a wise and skillful physician and a prudent and able man of business. He was chosen several times as president of the village of Sing Sing by unanimous elections.

He married Jane, daughter of Dr. John Thompson, of Saratoga County, with whom he had studied medicine. The issue of this marriage were Cornelia, who married Alfred Buckhout, and died in January, 1866; John Thompson, who became in succession twice recorder, twice mayor of the city of New York and twice Governor of the State, and who married Ella, daughter of Henry Starkweather, of New York; Mary E., wife of Colonel Charles O. Joline; Emma Kissam, who married Rev. M. M. Wells, and occupies the homestead at Sing Sing; and Katharine, who first married Captain Charles C. Hyatt, United States Army, and, after his decease, married General William H. Morris.

After a long life of active usefulness Dr. Hoffman died May 6, 1871, universally beloved and mourned by all his neighbors. On the day of his funeral the houses and places of business were draped in mourning and all business was suspended. He is spoken of with loving respect by those who knew him and yet survive, and by the children of others, with whom his name is a household word.

HENRY ERNEST SCHMID, M.D.

Henry Ernest Schmid, M.D., who is a well-known member of the medical profession, was born in Saxony, Prussia, May 1, 1824. His father, who was a publisher and connected with the famous family of Tauchnitz, intended him to follow his profession. After receiving his early education at the great Latin school at Halle, Dr. Schmid commenced a higher literary course for that purpose. His father, unfortunately, incurred the censure of the government, and this changed the whole tenor of the son's life. The latter emigrated to this country in 1853, and soon after his arrival went to Virginia, and having an early predilection for the study of medicine, pursued that branch of science at Winchester and at the University of Virginia. For a while he was connected with a newspaper in Richmond, and in 1859 was sent, under the auspices of the Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions, as medical missionary to Japan. While in that country he organized a hospital and his practice increased to an enormous extent among the natives, who were quick to learn the superiority of foreign practitioners. Owing to the failure of his health he obtained a position on board the flag-ship of an English surveying fleet as interpreter. In this capacity he visited Corea and northern China, Borneo, Java and Sumatra. The ship, having narrowly escaped destruction in a typhoon, went to Cape Town for repairs, and Dr. Schmid embraced the opportunity to make an extensive tour in southern Africa. He afterwards went to St. Helena and the Azores, and thence to England, returning to this country in 1862.



He came to White Plains, Westchester County, in 1859, when he made a short visit. Upon his return from England he settled in this place, and has been engaged in the practice of his profession to the present time. With a devoted love of science, Dr. Schmid, while in Japan, made many valuable collections for the Smithsonian Institution, which led to his being made a member of the Oriental Society, and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

In his profession he has enjoyed a very extensive practice, and is justly considered one of the leading physicians of the county. He is a member of the American Medical Association, the State Medical Society and the Westchester County Medical Society. As a prominent citizen of the village he is president of the Board of Health, and of the Board of Education, and is a member of the vestry of Grace Episcopal Church. He is also the physician in charge of St. Vincent Retreat for the Insane. He married Eugenia, daughter of Eugene T. Prudhomme, of White Plains, and they have three children—Theodora, Gertrude and Permetta.

CHARLES J. NORDQUIST.

The father of Charles J. Nordquist, M.D., the well-known physician, was Lars Peter Nordquist, who was born at Sounerly, in Sweden, March 29, 1781. He was a surgeon in the Swedish army, which he entered April 22, 1802, remaining in the employ of the government till his decease, in 1824. He was an eminent physician and was the recipient of many high appointments both in military and civil life. On the 16th and 17th of March, 1809, he accompanied the Royal Mounted Life Guards in their retreat upon the ice over the Gulf of Bothnia, and afterward became surgeon to Bernadoth, King of Sweden. On January 3, 1812, he married Sophia Christina Weugren (daughter of Ivan Weugren and Sophia Christina Habicht) who was born December 18, 1782, and died June 10, 1830.

Charles J., their son, was born at Jousered, near Gottenberg, Sweden, on the 16th of July, 1821. He was left at three years of age in the care of his father's cousin, Lars Peter Afzelius, dean of Alingsas, who sent him at the age of nine to the high school in that place. Here he remained for eight years, when he removed to Stockholm for the purpose of acquainting himself with the drug trade. After three years of practical experience as a pharmacist, he entered the Carlingasta Institute, where he studied medicine, graduating in 1842. A year spent in traveling through Europe followed his graduation, after which he sailed for the United States, arriving at New York in 1843. He engaged first as a drug clerk, but in 1848, having meanwhile mastered the English language, he established a store of his own on the corner of Broome and Mulberry Streets, New York.

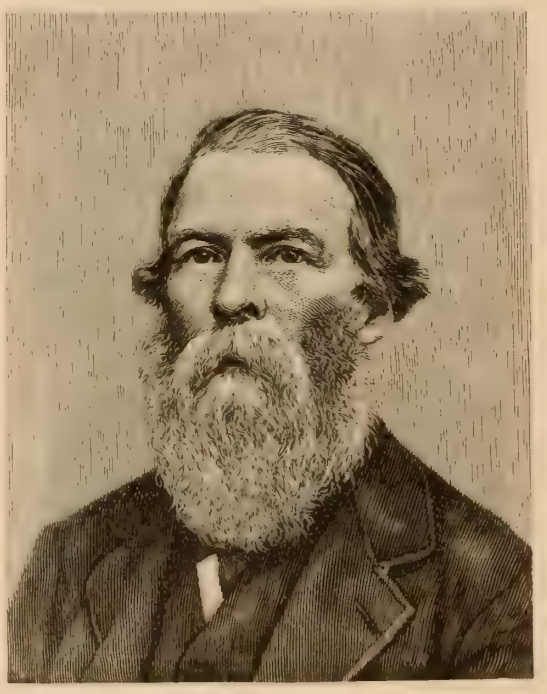
Chs F. Nordquist M.D.

Disposing of this at a profit to himself, he engaged until 1854 in the fitting out and selling of drug-stores. He then entered the University Medical College of the city of New York, from which he graduated in 1856. After practicing two years in New York City, he removed to Tuckahoe, N.Y. In 1861 he joined the Ninth Regiment as surgeon, and like his father's, his army life was an eventful one. From the time he was commissioned, he rose rapidly in favor with his superiors and received one mark of respect after another with enviable rapidity. He was appointed chief surgeon of the Third Brigade, medical director of the Second Division, and finally medical inspector of the First Army Corps.

On February 1, 1864, he received a note of thanks from the commanding general for the efficient manner in which he had performed his duties; and two years after the departure of the Ninth Regiment from New York, he was presented by its non-commissioned officers and privates with a handsome gold watch and chain as a token of their respect and esteem.

Unlike some of the officers of the late war, Dr. Nordquist did not make use of his official power to shirk his duty in the hour of danger, but was present and actively engaged at every battle, in which his division participated. On the fields of Harper's Ferry, Cedar Mountain, Rappahannock Station, Thoroughfare Gap, Second Bull Run, Chantilly, South Mountain, Antietam, First Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, The Wilderness, Laurel Hill, Spottsylvania and Coal Harbor he was present in person, administering the comforts of his profession to the sick and dying soldiery. As a surgeon, he was most successful, and several of his cases are mentioned in the surgical history of the war of the Rebellion.

At the battle of Gettysburg, on the 1st of July, 1863, he was taken prisoner by the Confederates and was held for three days and nights upon one pint of flour without the means of preparing it for food. Being placed by his captors in one of the churches of the town, he escaped by crawling into the steeple and remaining concealed till the advance of the Union troops. On June 23, 1864, he closed his career in the army and sought again the quiet of his home in Tuckahoe. Here he has since remained, honored and respected among his associates in the profession and looked up to with pleasure by the many friends who surround the home of his adoption.



He is a Republican in politics, and held the office of coroner for four years. He is a member of the Lutheran Church, and is well-known for his liberality. He married on April 28, 1846, Harriet Louise Goodwin, and has had three children, all daughters, of whom one died in early youth and two still survive and are married.

D. JEROME SANDS.

To chronicle within the limits of this work, all that is either important or interesting in the record of a family prominent in English and American history for a period of more than eight hundred years would be impossible, and but a brief outline of it can be given here.

The first trace of the family is found in the reign of Edward the Confessor (son of Ethelred and Emma) before the conquest, 1042 to 1066, when Ulnod dwelt in the Isle of Wight, in the County of Hampshire, at a place called Sandes. From this the surname (at the time of the Holy Wars) of Sandes, Sandis, Sandys, Sands is derived. Sir John Sandys of Hampshire was a knight-baronet, in the reign of Richard II., 1377–1399. John Sands, born in 1485 at Horborm, Straffordshire, died in 1625 at the age of one hundred and forty. His wife lived to be one hundred and twenty years old. Sir William Sandys was the first baron of the name. By his eminent services to the Kings Henry VII. and VIII., he advanced his family to wealth and honor. He was prominent in the suppression of the Cornish Rebellion, and was created Lord Sandys in 1524 by Henry VIII., who appointed him Lord Chamberlain in 1526. The same king made him a Knight of the Garter and employed him in the wars with France, after which he was created Baron.

Sir William, Lord Sandys, his grandson, was a member of Parliament, and one of the commissioners appointed by Queen Elizabeth for the trial of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, January 16, 1571; also for that of Mary Queen of Scots, October 12, 1586, and Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, April 18, 1589. He was imprisoned for a short time in 1600 for joining with Robert, Earl of Sussex, in an insurrection in London. His princely mansion at Basingstoke, called the Vine, was famous as the reception place of the State embassy sent by King Henry IV. of France to Queen Elizabeth in 1601.

Edwin Sandys, D. D., was an eminent Prelate of England. He was born in 1519, became Master of St. Catherine College in 1547, Prebendary of Peterboro in 1549 and of Carlisle in 1552. He was Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University in 1553, and a strong advocate of the reformation. He preached a sermon in favor of the royal claims of Lady Jane Grey, and refused to proclaim Mary Queen of Scots, for which he was deprived of his honors, sent to the Tower and afterward to Marshalsea, where he was imprisoned for seven months.

Pursued by the persecution of his enemies, he escaped from England in May 1554. In 1558, after the coronation of Elizabeth, he returned to England. Under her, he held many important positions. He was one of the nine Protestants sent to dispute with nine Catholics before Parliament, and in 1559 became Bishop of Worcester. He was appointed by Queen Elizabeth one of a commission under Bishop Parker to prepare a new translation of the Bible, known as the Bishops' Bible. In 1570 he became Bishop of London, and in 1576 Archbishop of York. He died at the Archiepiscopal palace of Southwell, July 10, 1588, and his alabaster tomb and effigy are looked upon by visitors to this day with peculiar interest.

[1] Sir Edwin Sandys, son of the preceding, born in Worcester, 1561, was an English statesman of great ability. He traveled extensively on the continent, after which he published "Europæ Speculum, or a Survey of the State of Religion in the Western part of the World." He was knighted by James I. in 1603, and became an influential member of the Second London Company for Virginia, into which he introduced the vote by ballot. He was the treasurer or chief officer of the company, and was indefatigable in promoting public prosperity and security. In 1620, Spanish influence having been exerted against him, King James, in violation of the charter, forbade his re-election. [2] George, a brother of Sir Edwin, was a famous English poet. He was educated at Oxford, and published "A Relation of a Journey Begun A.D. 1610, in Four Books, Containing a Description of the Turkish Empire, of Egypt, of the Holy Land and of the Remote Parts of Italy and Adjoining Islands;" also a "Translation of Ovid's 'Metamorphoses.'" In 1621 he became colonial treasurer of Virginia, where he distinguished himself by his public zeal. He executed all orders concerning staple commodities; to him is due the building of the first water mill; he promoted the establishment of iron works in 1621, and in the following year introduced ship building. While in Virginia he translated the last ten books of the "Metamorphoses," and, after returning to England, in 1626, he published the translation of the whole. He also wrote poetical versions of the Psalms, of the Book of Job, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, etc., and of the Song of Solomon. His life, by the Rev. J. H. Todd, is prefixed to "Selections from Sandy's Metrical Paraphrases." (London, 1839.) Samuel Sandys, who, in 1741, accused Sir Robert Walpole of fraud and corruption, was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1742; created Lord Sandys by George II., 1743; was First Commissioner of the Board of Trade, 1761; and died 1770. These and many other gentlemen whose names are conspicuous in English history, were members of the family in the direct line. Though many of their descendants have also been prominent in this country, the family is still influential in England. Its present representative there is Baron Augustus Frederick Arthur Sandys, born March 1, 1840; married, August 3, 1872, Augustus Ann, second daughter of the late Charles Des Voeux, Bart. His seat is at Ombersley Court, Droitwich. The first known member of the American family was Henry Sandy, who came to Boston, Mass., and established himself as a merchant. He was prominent as a religious worker, and upon one occasion, when he, with others, was in the act of starting a new church at Rowley, a clerk called him Sands, which was the origin of the present spelling.

D. Jerome Sands, M.D., president of the village of Port Chester, and one of the first physicians in Westchester County, is one of his direct descendants. In his qualities of perseverance and persistency in support of principle, Dr. Sands strongly resembles his illustrious ancestry. He was born November 26, 1814, and was the second child of David Sands and Elizabeth Brady, of New Castle, N. Y. His father, who was a farmer and civil engineer, early sent him to the school at his native place, after which he also attended a higher academy at Sing Sing, N. Y. After leaving Sing Sing he spent a year or two in farming and study together. At the close of this time he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the city of New York, graduating in 1840. Shortly after this he began the long and successful professional career, in Port Chester, which has ended not only in the possession of an extended and lucrative practice, but in winning a host of warm and steadfast friends.

Dr. Sands has given much of his time to outside work. He is at present a director of the First National Bank of Port Chester. For over ten years he was trustee of the village, and is now its president. He is also health officer of the town and a member of the County Medical Society. He married, on the 27th of April, 1842, Miss Ann Maria Green, of Port Chester, and has had three children,—one daughter, who died in childhood, and two sons, who are still living. Morton J. Sands, M.D., the oldest, practices with his father, and Purdy G., the youngest, who holds the position of town clerk, is a civil engineer at Port Chester. Dr. Sands has also a grandchild,—Benjamin J., a son of Morton J.

NORMAN K. FREEMAN.

Norman K. Freeman, M.D., who is the oldest physician in the southern portion of Westchester County, was born in Warren, Herkimer County, N. Y., May 3, 1814. The ancestors of the family were three brothers who came from the north of England, where the home is still found, in the latter part of the seventeenth century. They landed in Philadelphia, but one of them went to Massachusetts, and has many descendants in that portion of the country and in the northern part of this State. Another of the brothers was drowned in the Delaware River, and his widow, with the surviving brother, made their home at Woodbridge, N. J., where four generations of their descendants are interred in the old burying-ground.

Thomas Freeman, one of the descendants, was a soldier of the Revolution and a prisoner in the Sugar-House in New York, and on board a prison ship, from which he escaped by swimming. He married Sallie Moore, of Scotch descent. Their children were John, Smith, Ariel, Thomas, Linus, Moores, Rachel (wife of Moses Freeman, her cousin), Polly (wife of Thomas Edgar) and Henry. Of these children, Henry Freeman was born June 21, 1789. In his early manhood he learned the trade of a carpenter and subsequently went to Warren, where his uncle Isaac resided, and was the builder of the first mill in that place. He remained there till 1822, when he removed to Richfield, Otsego County, and purchased a farm on the west side of Canaderago Lake, which he made his home until his death, in 1869. He married, in 1813, Mercy, daughter of Holden and Rhoda Sweet, of Berlin, Rensselaer County, N. Y. Their children were Norman K.; George S., born August 25, 1815, and died unmarried Jan. 30, 1840; Emily, born Oct. 21, 1816 (wife of Borelli Ingalls); and Delos, born April 22, 1819. He died August 8, 1843, without descendants.

Dr. Norman K. Freeman remained on his father's farm, attended the district school, then taught school and worked by the month for the neighboring farmers, giving half his wages to his father and educating himself with the remainder. At the age of twenty-one he went to New York and served, until 1837, as a clerk in a store on Maiden Lane. In 1838 he returned to Richfield, and studied medicine with Dr. Alonzo Churchill. Two years later he went to Geneva and continued his studies under the instruction of Dr. Thomas Spencer, who was then president of the Geneva Medical College. He graduated February 8, 1842, and his diligence and skill were so well known to Dr. Spencer that he was received by him as a partner. In the fall of that year he was compelled, by the failing health of his brother Delos, to accompany him on a trip to the South, and after his death occurred, in 1843, he came to Westchester and began practice with Dr. Wm. Bayard, a physician of great local prominence. He remained with Dr. Bayard till June, 1845, and then established a practice on his own account, which he has continued with unabated zeal to the present. He was the physician of St. John's College, at Fordham, from 1845 till 1850, when the failure of his health compelled him to retire to his farm in Richfield. He remained there till 1852, and then returned and resumed his practice, and purchased a homestead of William Simpson, on the west bank of Bronx River, which he has since made his residence. Under the administration of President Fillmore, he was for three years postmaster at West Farms, and was assistant inspector of the Metropolitan Board of Health while it continued to have an existence. Dr. Freeman was married, October 17, 1837, to Ann Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel W. Lowerre, of New York City, by whom he had four sons. Only two are now living,—Norman, who is a broker in New York, and Wm. Francis, who is in business in the city of Albany. Both are married and have children.

It is safe to say that there is no man to whom West Farms is more indebted for its present efficient Union schools than to Doctor Freeman. His exertions in this respect were crowned with well-merited success, though his efforts met with the most determined opposition from many who might have been expected to show better judgment.

The Union school established by his active zeal and determination was the first organized in the State under the act of 1853. For twenty-one years he was a member of the Board of Education, and for twenty years of that time clerk of the board. He was one of the first to anticipate the time when the sparsely settled districts of Morrisania and West Farms would become thickly populated portions of New York City, and he was among the foremost in promoting the cause of annexation.

In all his views he has ever been greatly in advance of his times, and has had the satisfaction of seeing them in course of time adopted by the community, which at first opposed them. A strong advocate of temperance, his practical devotion to the cause has been a prominent feature of his life, and the reward of his temperance is found in the fact, that at the age of seventy-two, and after a life of constant and severe labor, he is to-day as hale and hardy as a man of fifty. During his professional career his practice embraced a very large portion of the county, and there is no one who is a better representative of its local practitioners.

DR. JAMES BATHGATE.

The parents of Dr. James Bathgate, who is well known as the oldest resident physician in Morrisania, were Charles and Margaret Bathgate, who came from Scotland, and settled at West Farms. Their children were Charles and John (both deceased), Dr. James Alexander (now living in Morrisania), Jane, the wife of William J. Beck (deceased), of West Farms, and Margaret Ann. The father of this family was a skillful agriculturist, and noted for his superior horses and cattle, which he raised on his farm. He removed from West Farms to Morrisania, where the younger children were born. James first attended school at Harlem, from whence he went to Mount Pleasant Academy, at Sing Sing. He was subsequently a student in the University of the City of New York, and studied medicine with Professor Joseph M. Smith, one of the professors of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and graduated from that institution in 1847. He was for three years assistant and resident physician in the Medical Department of the New York Hospital, and subsequently physician in the New York Dispensary, but his health failing, he removed from New York and settled at Morrisania upon a farm which was purchased from Gouverneur Morris. From that time to the present Dr. Bathgate has devoted his time and attention to the practice of his profession. He is a member of the State Medical Association, and takes an active interest in all that tends to advance its interests, and he enjoys a very extensive practice in Morrisania and the surrounding country. During his long practice at Morrisania he has never failed to command the confidence and respect of the community, in which his professional services have been uniformly successful. In political affairs he is a strong supporter of the principles of the Republican party, but without being a politician in the common acceptation of the term. The Bathgate estate, in Morrisania, which is now rendered extremely valuable by the advancement of New York City, is a farm purchased from Gouverneur Morris. The estate is bounded on the east by the old Patent Line, which separates Morrisania from the patent of West Farms. It is bounded on the west by the Mill Brook, and extends south to the tract which was bought by Jordan L. Mott and others, who founded the new village of Morrisania, the south line being near One Hundred and Seventieth Street, and the north line a short distance south of One Hundred and Seventy-fifth Street.

The residence of Dr. Bathgate is very pleasantly situated on the west side of Third Avenue, and still retains much of the rural beauty that once distinguished it, and here he enjoys a quiet home in the company of his brother and sister, who are, like himself, unmarried. St. Paul's Church, of Morrisania, is on the south side of the estate, and the church lot was presented to the congregation by this family.

JAMES W. SCRIBNER.

Dr. James W. Scribner was born at Tarrytown, January 17, 1820. His grandfather, Enoch Scribner, was a resident of Bedford, Westchester County, to which place he is supposed to have moved from Connecticut, and died July 18, 1848, at the age of eighty. He married Mary Miller, and they were the parents

James Bathgate, M.D.

James N. Scribner of two sons, Joseph M. and James W. The former was born May 11, 1793, and was a prominent physician. He married Rebecca, daughter of Thomas Ward, of Sing Sing, of a family long known in this county, and died December 28, 1847, leaving four children,—Dr. James W., John C., Mary (wife of Robert Jameson) and Philip W. His son, James W., attended the public schools until he was fifteen years old, when he was transferred to the collegiate school of Bedford, of which Samuel Holmes was principal. Having acquired a good classical education, he commenced the study of medicine with his father, who was then, and had been for many years, one of the physicians in charge of the Westchester County almshouse, where the son had ample opportunity of seeing much practice while yet a student. After attending three courses of lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, he graduated as "M.D." in 1847.

The next year he began practice in his native town, and continued it until the close of his life, being invariably favored with a large, remunerative and responsible practice. He became his father's successor in the profession, and was appointed to fill his place at the Almshouse.

During his entire life Dr. Scribner held a high position among his professional brethren in the county. So acute were his perceptions, so widely read was he in his profession, and so skillful in applying his acquirements to practical use, that if he had made a specialty of any one department of medicine, he would have become renowned as a leader in it. But he devoted himself to general practice, and was satisfied to gain a local reputation as a skillful physician, surgeon and obstetrician. It is seldom that any one becomes as accomplished in all these divisions of practical medicine as was Dr. Scribner. His counsel was frequently sought by physicians at a distance, and in his own neighborhood he was the one always sent for when consultation was required in cases of prolonged illness or in emergencies. He was devoted to his profession and to the friends he had acquired in following it, and could seldom be induced to withdraw himself from his work for relaxation or amusement. During the last year of his life, while suffering from the acute pains of a malignant disease and from the depression naturally arising from it, he attended regularly to business day and night, without murmur or complaint, ministering unto hundreds who were far less in need of help than he was himself, until his force was all expended, and he laid down his labor and his life together. In all his professional relations he was pre-eminently a silent man, never gossiping about his cases in the sick room, and seldom indulging in conversation, even upon topics of general interest. Though dignified and courteously reserved in his intercourse with the world, among his friends he was always cheerful and fully enjoyed light amusements and harmless jokes.

Dr. Scribner's professional silence grew out of his hatred for shams of all kinds. His profession was to cure, not to amuse, and he never sought to win success by any means outside of his skillful treatment of cases. Operations of a complicated nature and requiring the highest skill were performed by him; but his modesty kept him from reporting the cases, and they remain unknown to all except the ones who were directly benefited by his art.

It is needless to say that his moral and professional worth were alike appreciated by the entire community. For several years he was elected president of the village, held the highest offices in the Westchester County Medical Society, and was a delegate to the National Medical Association in 1871. He was also a member of the New York State Medical Society and of the American Medical Association, and an honorary member of the California State Medical Society. For several terms he was chosen president and director of the Westchester County Agricultural Society, and was an able and efficient member of the Board of Education of Tarrytown.

He married Margaret E. Miller, and left two daughters,—Josie and Ella. By his death, which occurred January 28, 1880, the community suffered an irreparable loss; all classes mourned him as a friend, and it was with feelings of no common veneration that his friends and neighbors bore to their final home the remains of one who had been in all the relations of life a useful and honored man.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

Samuel Swift, M.D., is descended from an old English family who came to New England at an early date. His immediate ancestors were residents of Dorchester, Mass. He was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., August 5, 1849, his father, Samuel Swift, being then a prosperous merchant in New York. His mother was Mary, daughter of Samuel Phelps, of West Hampton, Mass., of a family well known in the history of that portion of the country. Dr. Swift resided in Brooklyn till 1858, when he went to Massachusetts and entered Williston Seminary. In 1865 he entered Yale College, and graduated in 1868 with the degree of Ph.B. In the fall of 1869 he joined the Medical Department of Cambridge University, where he remained one year. He then entered the Medical Department of Columbia College, and was also a private pupil of Dr. T. M. Markoe. In 1872 he graduated and received the diploma of M.D., and was the valedictorian of his class. After completing his studies he made a short tour to Europe, where he spent six months, principally in Germany. Previous to his trip he had been appointed resident physician at the "Nursery and Child's Hospital," in New York, obtaining this position by a successful competitive examination; after completing his services there he was for a time connected with the Northeastern Dispensary.

In the fall of 1873 he came to Yonkers, where he has since resided. Here he entered into a business partnership with Dr. J. Foster Jenkins, a physician of great skill and reputation, and this connection continued till the death of Dr. Jenkins, in 1882. In his profession Dr. Swift has attained an enviable and well-merited reputation. He is a member of the Medical Society of the State of New York, of the New York Academy of Medicine, of the Westchester Medical Society, the Jenkins Medical Society of Yonkers and the Boylston Medical Society of Boston, Mass. He has always been identified with the Democratic party, and in 1882 was elected mayor of the city of Yonkers. He has also been president of the Board of Education, and is justly recognized as a prominent and useful citizen and a skillful medical practitioner.

He married Lucy, daughter of Hon. Henry E. Davis, late judge of the Court of Appeals of New York, and has one child, Martha. He is a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, where he has served as vestryman since 1877, and is at present junior warden of the church.

AUGUSTUS VAN CORTLANDT.

Dr. Augustus Van Cortlandt was born August 31, 1826, and died December 24, 1884. He was the son of Frederick Augustus Van Cortlandt and Harriet, daughter of Peter Jay Munro, of Mamaroneck. His paternal grandfather was James Morris, of Morrisania, and his grandmother Helen Van Cortlandt. His father took the name of Van Cortlandt to inherit an estate at Lower Yonkers, now called King's Bridge. The house in which Dr. Van Cortlandt was born was afterwards purchased, with a small portion of the property, by Hon. Waldo Hutchings.

Dr. Van Cortlandt was sent at an early age to a school at White Plains. He had a wonderful memory and learned very rapidly. When the California fever broke out he went to California, and upon his return to New York began the study of medicine. When the war opened he joined the Ninth New York Regiment and went to Washington. With a number of others, he shortly left the Ninth and joined the Twelfth. On the return of his regiment he went out with the Seventh. On returning home he was sent to David's Island as physician. Subsequently he commenced the practice of medicine in New Rochelle, which he continued until his death.

His practice was never very remunerative, being principally among the poor, by whom he seemed to be much beloved.

PIERRE CORTLANDT VAN WYCK.

Pierre Cortlandt Van Wyck, M.D., was born at the old Van Cortlandt Manor-house, on the banks of the Croton River, September 24, 1824.

His father, Philip Gilbert Van Wyck, was the nephew and adopted son of General Philip Van Cortlandt, who died a bachlor and left his large estate, including the Van Cortlandt Manor, to be divided between his two nephews, Pierre Van Cortlandt and Philip G. Van Wyck.

Dr. Van Wyck's mother was Mary Smith Gardiner, daughter of Colonel Abraham Gardiner, who was one of the lineal descendants of Lion Gardiner, of Gardiner's Island.

Coming of a race of those who had from the earliest history of the country been foremost in patriotism, generosity and the development of all the nobler traits of human nature, descended from the Van Cortlandts, Van Rensselaers, Gardiners and Van Wycks, whose names are so intimately interwoven with the early history of our own country, he never forgot the traditions of his ancestry, but was always the genial, high-toned, honorable gentleman.

Beginning life under these favorable auspices, he entered Princeton College and graduated with the class of 1845.

He began the study of medicine under the care of Dr. Adrian K. Hoffman. He was afterwards a student at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, where he enjoyed the benefit of the instructions of the celebrated Dr. Willard Parker.

He graduated in 1849, and was afterwards appointed by President Taylor, United States inspector of drugs, at the port of New York.

While holding this position he became interested in the firm of Radway & Co., in which he still held an interest at the time of his death.

In 1862 he was appointed by President Lincoln assessor of internal revenue for the Fourth District of New York.

He organized the district and continued to administer it ably and efficiently until it was consolidated in 1871. In January, 1882, President Arthur appointed him superintendent of the United States Assay Office in New York, to succeed Mr. Thomas C. Acton, who was made Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

In politics he was a Whig until 1856, when he joined the Republican party during the Fremont campaign. He had always been prominent in the councils of his party and was many times sent as a delegate to State and National Conventions, and was one of the famous three hundred and six who voted so persistently for General Grant at Chicago in 1880.

When the nomination of General Garfield was announced, Governor Dennison of Ohio, came to the New York delegation and said that any candidate they named for Vice-President would be nominated. Dr. Van Wyck proposed the name of Chester A. Arthur, which was unanimously indorsed.

Dr. Van Wyck had been the personal friend of President Arthur for twenty years, and was with him on that memorable night of September 19, 1881, Samuel Swift Jr.

Pierre C. Van Wyck

when the sad news came that President Garfield had passed away, and he was one of the nine persons present when the oath of office was administered by Judge Brady to the new President during the silence and solemnity of the midnight hour.

Dr. Van Wyck had a brilliant mind, cultivated by deep study and extensive foreign travel, combined with refined and artistic tastes. He lived and died a bachelor. He was a man of domestic habits, and devoted himself to the care and comfort of his sisters, Miss Joanna L. Van Wyck and Mrs. Annie V. R. Wells, who resided with him at the Van Wyck mansion, Grove Hill, in the village of Sing Sing. This had always been the seat of generous and refined hospitality, and it was at this home that he died suddenly, of pneumonia, on the 23d day of April, 1883.

The funeral was largely attended, not only by his associates and friends in his own circle of life, but by all his numerous tenantry and the poor of the surrounding country, who found him always a friend and brother to each and all, irrespective of race or creed.

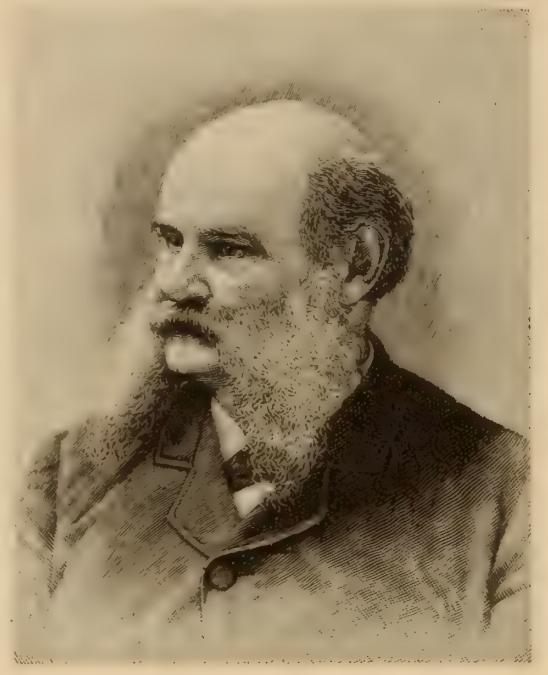
Of him it may well be said: "Write me as one that loves his fellowmen."

The interment took place in the family burial ground at Croton, where repose the remains of those sterling Revolutionary patriots, Lieutenant Governor Pierre Van Cortlandt and his sons, General Philip and General Pierre, and of his grandsons, General Philip G. Van Wyck and Recorder Pierre C. Van Wyck and numerous other members of the Van Cortlandt and Van Wyck families.

Of the ancestry of Dr. Van Wyck a few words may be added.

Cornelius Barentse Van Wyck came to America in 1660, from Wyck, a town on the river Teck in Holland. He married Anna Polhemus; their son Theodorus who was born September 17, 1668, and died December 4, 1753, married Margaretta Brinckehoff, February 3, 1685. They were the parents of eight children, one of whom, Abraham, who was born November 7, 1695, married Catherine Provost in 1717. Of their nine children, the eldest, Theodorus, born November 30, 1718, married Helena Sanford, August 2, 1740, and they were the parents of twelve children; one of their sons, Abraham, was born in 1748, and married Catherine, daughter of Lieut. Gov. Pierre Van Cortlandt, January 7, 1776. Their children were Theodorus, Pierre Cortlandt, Van Wyck (who was for many years Recorder for the City of New York) and Philip Gilbert Van Wyck, who was born June 4, 1786, and married Mary Smith, daughter of Col Abraham Gardiner, and granddaughter of David Gardiner, fourth proprietor of Gardiner's Island. Their children were Joanna Livingston Van Wyck, now residing at Sing Sing; Catherine, wife of Stephen H. Battin; Philip Van Cortlandt, who died unmarried, January 12, 1842; Eliza, wife of William Van Ness Livingston, who died December 9, 1865; Gardiner, who died unmarried, April 7, 1860; Annie Van Rensselaer, who married the late Hon. Alexander Wells, of the Supreme Bench of California, and whose only child, Gertrude Van Cortlandt, married Schuyler Hamilton, Jr., great-grandson of Alexander Hamilton; David Gardiner, who died unmarried, December 16, 1848, and Dr. Pierre Cortlandt Van Wyck, the subject of this article.

The Van Wycks of Holland, are an aristocratic and wealthy family, and continue to bear the same coat of arms as those brought by the Van Wycks to this country upwards of two centuries ago.



H. K. Huntington M.D.

HENRY K. HUNTINGTON.

The first known ancestor of Henry K. Huntington, M. D., in America, was one to whom tradition has assigned the name of Simon. He was an Englishman, and in 1633 started with his wife and family for this country. His death occurred during the voyage, and his son Christopher, who succeeded to the paternal cares, brought the family first to Norwich, Conn., and finally to Windham, in the same State, where a permanent settlement was effected. The branch of the family from which Dr. Huntington is descended has apparently remained within a short distance of the original homestead, for we find by an examination of the records that Samuel Howard Huntington, his father, who was born December 14, 1793, was married in Hartford October 19, 1835, the lady being his second wife. Her name was Sarah Blair Watkinson, and she was a daughter of Robert Watkinson, a merchant residing in Hartford.

Henry K., their son, was born at Hartford March 27, 1845. He remained in his native town till 1862, in which year, having meanwhile graduated from the Hartford public school, he entered Trinity College. In 1867, after graduating there, he made a first attempt at self-support. Proceeding as far west as Racine, Wis., he engaged as a tutor in the college there. A year's experience as an instructor, however, convinced him that teaching was not his forte, and at the end of the first term he resigned his position at Racine, with the intention of studying medicine.

Maximilian J. Reinfelder

Retracing his steps, he came eastward, and in 1868 entered the University (medical college) of the city of New York, from which he graduated in 1871. The success which has attended him as a physician, has convinced him, as well as his many friends, that he made no mistake in his second choice of a profession. Immediately following his graduation, he devoted sixteen months to service in the Charity Hospital on Blackwell's Island. As a reward for the proficiency with which he had performed his duties there, he was commissioned in 1872 with the re-organization of the Convalescent Hospital on Hart's Island, and to him is due the credit of originating what is now known as the Hart's Island Hospital.

On the 23d of September, 1873, he removed to New Rochelle, where he still resides. By careful attention to the needs of his patients and faithfulness in the performance of his professional duties, he has won for himself not only a large and extended practice, but also the esteem of his fellow-townsmen

He is a member of Trinity Episcopal Church, was formerly a trustee of the public schools and is connected with the County and State Medical Associations. He is at present physician to the Board of Health of the town of New Rochelle.

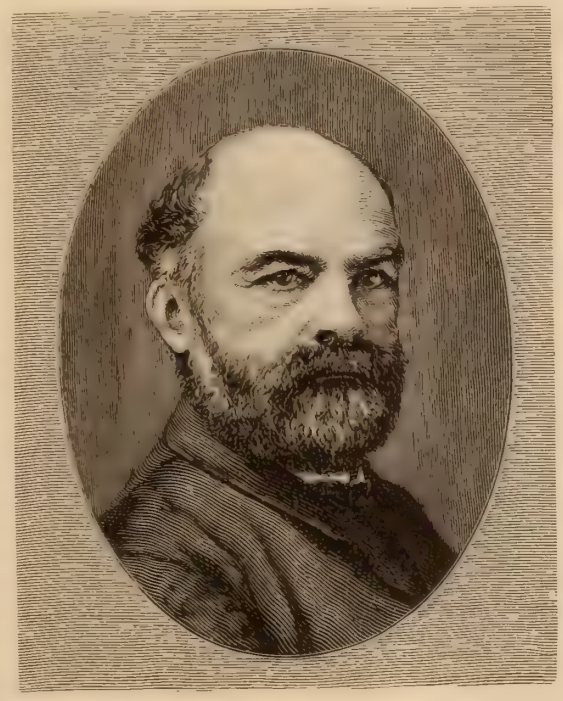
Dr. Huntington married Sept. 23, 1873, Miss Moruca Frances De Figaniere, and has no children. He is one of the most successful physicians in the county.

MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH REINFELDER.

Maximilian Joseph Reinfelder, M.D., was born in Munich, Kingdom of Bavaria, March 4, 1821. His father, Ferdinand Reinfelder, was a surgeon in the military academy of that capital, where he was in active service thirty-three years. From his fourteenth year Dr. Reinfelder paid great attention to the study of the natural sciences, especially chemistry, in which he graduated from the University of Munich in 1844. From 1847 to 1850 he pursued his medical studies there.

Attracted by the large field of usefulness which America affords to scientific men as medical practitioners, as well as by his natural and unconquerable predilection for this country almost from his childhood, he came to the United States in 1854.

Notwithstanding the thoroughness of his European medical education, he matriculated at the University Medical College, in New York City. His object in doing this was to familiarize himself with American medical authorities, and identify himself with American interests; also to observe and study the great changes which took place during twenty years in all branches of medical science. Having finished the courses prescribed in the school of medicine, he was graduated in 1869, receiving, beside his regular diploma, a certificate of honor, as an evidence of having pursued a fuller course of medical instruction than that usually followed by students. He continued the practice of medicine in Yonkers, where he has been located for the last thirty-one years. He is a man of acknowledged reputation in the profession, and is at present consulting physician to St. John's Riverside Hospital. He is a Fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, and also a member of the Westchester Medical Society.



He was married, in 1854, to Miss A. Merz, of Lindau, Lake Constance, Bavaria, and has one daughter, Armina J., who resides with him at the present time.

He is now a gentleman of advanced years. By careful attention to the wants of his patients, and strict economy in the management of his private affairs, he has accumulated for himself an extensive practice and a moderate fortune. He is greatly respected in the city of his adoption both as a private citizen and an influential physician.

RALPH BARNARD GRISWOLD.

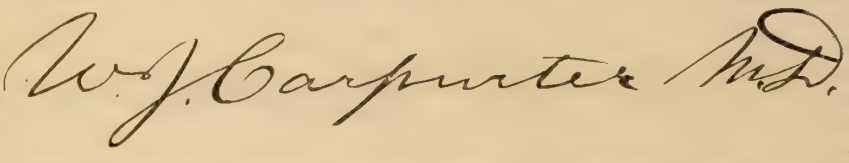
The family of Ralph Barnard Griswold, M.D., was originally English. The first ancestor in this country was Roger Griswold, who came to New London, Conn., before the Revolution, and it is supposed that Fort Griswold, near that city, was named after some of the members of the family.

Ralph Barnard Griswold, M.D., son of Lucius and Julia Elizabeth (Barnard) Griswold, was born at Colebrook, Litchfield County, Conn., January 18, 1835. His parents moved to the thriving village of Winsted in 1848, where he attended the district school, after which he became a pupil of St. James' School, taught by Revs. Jonathan and James R. Coe. He taught school in the academy at Winchester Centre and also nine months at Stroudsburg, Pa. His success was so great there that he was urged to tarry longer. For years, however, it had been his desire to become a physician, and while yet engaged as a teacher in Stroudsburg, he fully decided to execute this purpose. He read medicine with H. B. Steele, M.D., of Winsted, Conn., and attended his first course of lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, and a full course at the Eclectic Medical Institute of Cincinnati, O., where he graduated in Feb 1857.

Ralph B. Griswold M.D.

It had been his father's wish that he should spend some time in Europe to further advance his medical education, but being of an ambitious turn of mind, and having confidence in his own ability, he decided not to accept the kind offer thus made. In April, 1857, he came to North Castle, where he immediately began the practice of medicine and has succeeded in building up a business second to none in this part of the county. He is now called to Stanwich, Round Hill, Armonk, Bedford, New Castle and Long Ridge, and is the leading physician in North Castle, his post-office address being Banksville, Fairfield County, Conn. He is town physician and is also health officer of the Board of Health.

He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at Winsted, Conn., in his seventeenth year, and in 1857 brought his letter from this church to the Middle Patent Methodist Church, where he has been an acceptable member for twenty-eight years, holding the offices of trustee, steward and chorister from the time of his arrival to the present. He has been since his earliest recollection connected with Sabbath-schools, either as a pupil, superintendent or teacher. For fifteen years Dr. Griswold has managed the financial matters of the church of which he is a member, and has rendered valuable service in the collection of funds necessary for its support.



May 1, 1858, he married Mary Jane Early. Four children were born to them, of whom William L. Griswold, Ph.B., M.D., now practicing medicine in Greenwich, Conn., and Julia Alice Griswold are still living. He has held the office of commissioner of highways of his town for five consecutive terms of three years each, and still holds the position. He has also been tendered the nomination for supervisor, but owing to pressure of professional business, has been obliged to decline the honor. He has always been a temperance man, and became especially active in that work in 1870, when he assisted in organizing the Middle Patent Division of the Sons of Temperance. He was made its first Worthy Patriarch, and some three years afterward was elected Grand Worthy Patriarch of the Grand Division "Sons of Temperance" of Eastern New York, embracing in its jurisdiction some thirteen counties of the State. He is also an ex-officio member of the National Division of the same association. He has always been a consistent Republican, not having missed either a town or State election in over twenty-eight years. He has identified himself, irrespective of party, church or state, with any and every cause which he thought was for the benefit of the community, being always ready to lend a helping hand. He has often, after a day of toil or a thirty or forty-mile ride, driven away again some five miles to drill or take charge of a company of singers in giving a concert or entertainment for some weak society. His liberal tendencies, together with his cordial disposition and the valuable services which he has in times past and still contines to render the community in which he lives, have endeared him to its people and made his name an honor to the county of his adoption.

WALTON JAY CARPENTER.

Walton Jay Carpenter, M.D., is descended from an English family who came to New England during the seventeenth century. From thence a branch removed to the town of Purchase, in Westchester County, where they took up land and engaged in farming. Charles B. Carpenter, father of Walton Jay, was of this line. He married Rachel White, and of their five children, Dr. Carpenter was the oldest. He was born in Duanesburgh, Schenectady County, N. Y., September 11, 1852, and removed with his family when but four years of age to Illinois. After a stay of two years in the West the family returned to Duanesburgh where the youth attended the public school, leaving at the age of fifteen for the Delaware Literary Institute, where he passed two winters. A period of three years, divided between teaching and study followed; then a two years' course of select studies at Union College and a term of medical preparation under the celebrated professor, Dr. Alfred Loomis, of New York. In the fall of 1875 he entered the medical department of the University of the City of New York, and finally finished his course in the spring of 1877, when he graduated.

He first settled at Round Hill, Connecticut, where he practiced for a few months, in connection with his uncle, J. C. White, M.D.; but this town not offering the advantages which he craved, he returned to New York City and entered upon a post-graduate course at the University, after completing which in 1878 he removed to Katonah, where he still resides.

He has by care and industry succeeded in building up for himself an extensive practice, and has during his residence in Katonah effected many cures which will render his reputation permanent and his presence in the place a continual agency for good. He is a member of the Methodist Church of Katonah, and also a member of the following Masonic organizations: Kisco Lodge, No. 708; Croton Chapter, No. 202; and Crusade Commandery, No. 56.

He married April 30, 1884, Miss Anna L. Green, daughter of Alsoph Green, of Katonah.

Dr. Carpenter is connected with the Westchester Medical Society, among the members of which he is widely known and as widely respected.

CHAPTER XIII.

LITERATURE AND LITERARY MEN, OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY.

BY

J. THOS. SCHARF, A.M., LL.D

WESTCHESTER COUNTY has good reason to pride herself on her contributions to the literature of the country. Few, if any, counties in the Union, can show an equally brilliant record. She has given birth to many noted writers and has nurtured many more. The greatest literary genius, probably, that our country has produced, the weird, uncanny Poe, found inspiration within her borders, on the banks of the lordly Hudson, and that sunny, facile intellect which dwelt in the pure and lofty brow of Washington Irving found equal delight in exploring the mystic nooks and windings of its "Sleepy Hollows." Fenimore Cooper, the great pioneer of American fiction, roamed over its rugged hills and through its pleasant meadows, and treading close upon his heels came James Kirke Paulding, Irving's friend and collaborateur, whose strong Americanism was quite as pure and unadulterated as was that of the patriotic Cooper. Among political writers, Westchester presents the great names of Hamilton, Tom Paine, Seabury, Wilkins, the Jays, Gouverneur Morris, Daniel

D. Tompkins, John Bigelow, Horace Greeley, James Watson Webb, besides a host of lesser celebrities.

George Washington, though not, properly speaking, a literary character, deserves to be included among those who have transmitted noble thoughts as well as noble deeds to his countrymen. His association with the people of Westchester County during the Revolutionary era is fully set forth elsewhere in this work. Among his writings are to be found vivid bits of description of Westchester localities, with which he became familiarized in passing through the county. The Sparks collection of Washington's writings fills twelve large octavo volumes. His first appearance as an author was in the publication, in 1754, at Williamsburg, Va., and in London, of his journal of his proceedings "To and from the French of the Ohio," a brief tract written hastily from the rough notes taken on his expedition. His State papers, correspondence and "Farewell Address" are too well known to need description here. Major John Andre, whose mournful fate is indissolubly linked with the glorious deeds of Washington, spent the closing days of his career in Westchester. He was a poet as well as a soldier and an accomplished man of letters.

Daniel D. Tompkins, Vice-President of the United States, belongs to the political, rather than to the literary history of Westchester County, although his talents as a speaker and writer, entitle him to recognition as a man of letters. He was a native of Scarsdale.

Samuel J. Tilden may be included in the same category, and can be claimed as one of the celebrities of Westchester County, where, at his beautiful estate "Greystone," he spends much of his time in elegant and scholarly retirement.

General John C. Fremont, the soldier, explorer, author and politician, resided at one time at Mount Pleasant, in the house built by General James Watson Webb. His wife, who is the daughter of Senator Benton, of Missouri, is a woman of great accomplishments and decided literary tastes. General Fremont, who was born at Savannah, Ga., January 21, 1813, is known to literature by his graphic reports, which were published by the federal government, of his Western explorations. Devoting himself in early life to civil engineering, he obtained an appointment in the government expedition for the survey of the headwaters of the Mississippi, and was afterwards employed at Washington preparing maps of the country explored. In 1842, at the head of a small force, he crossed the Rocky Mountains and opened to commerce and emigration the Great South Pass. His report of his adventures was so interesting that it was reprinted by publishers in this country and in England and was translated into various foreign languages. He next accomplished an expedition to Oregon, and, striking southward and westward, after incredible hardships, succeeded in exploring the region of Alta California, including the Sierra Nevada, the valleys of San Joaquin and Sacramento and the gold region. Returning to Washington in 1844, he published another report, and upon its completion set out on another expedition to the Pacific, the result of which was the acquisition of California by the United States. He was sent to Washington in 1850 as the first United States Senator from California. In 1856 he was the Republican candidate for President of the United States and during the Civil War held a commission as major-general in the Union army. A superb edition of his reports, entitled "Fremont's Explorations," was published in 1859.

Among other names associated with the history of Westchester County which have attained to distinction in literature are those of J. Rodman Drake, John Savage, William Leggett, Robert Rogers, David Humphreys, Gulian C. Verplanck, Ann Eliza Bleecker, Mrs. Haven, James Parton, Rev. Thomas Allen, a chaplain of the Revolutionary army at White Plains, who took an active part in the political discussions of the time; Charles Tafin Armand, the Marquis de la Rouarie, an eloquent and persuasive speaker and writer, who, in 1778, was actively engaged in Westchester County in opposing Simcoe, Emmerick and Baremore, the Loyalist, whom he captured near King's Bridge November 8, 1779; Aaron Burr, who was stationed in Westchester County in the winter of 1778-79, and whose duel with Hamilton took place at Weehawken; Nathaniel Chipman, LL.D., the Vermont jurist, who participated in the battle of White Plains; Joel Barlow, the author of the "Columbiad," and Rev. William Crosswell, D.D., clergyman and scholar, born at Hudson, November 7, 1804, and died at Boston November 9, 1851; James De Lancey, the jurist, born in 1703 and died in 1760; General Oliver De Lancey, of the British army, who fought at White Plains; Horace Green, M.D., LL.D., the distinguished physician and medical writer, who died at Greenmount, Sing Sing, N. Y., December 24, 1802; Rev. Freeborn Garretson Hibbard, D.D., at one time editor of the Northern Christian Advocate and author of several books, born at New Rochelle, February 22, 1811; James Macdonald, M.D., author of valuable papers on the treatment of insanity, born at White Plains, July 18, 1803, died at Flushing, Long Island, May 5, 1849; Alexander Slidell Mackenzie, the noted naval officer and author of the lives of Paul Jones, O. H. Perry, Stephen Decatur and many other works, born in New York, April 6, 1803, lived in Mount Pleasant, on the Sing Sing road, and died at Tarrytown, September 13, 1848; Benjamin Moore Norman, the author of interesting books of travel, born at Hudson, December 22, 1809, died near Summit, Miss., February 1, 1860; Rear Admiral Hiram Paulding, son of John Paulding, one of Andre's captors, and a distinguished naval officer and author of a "Journal of a Cruise Among the Islands of the Pacific," born in Westchester County, December 11, 1797; Calvin W. Philleo, the novelist, born at Vernon, July 14, 1822, died at Suffield, Conn., June 30, 1858; Winthrop Sargent, the soldier, statesman and writer, who fought at White Plains; Joseph Mather Smith, M.D., the eminent physician and medical writer, who was a native of New Rochelle; John Savage, the editor and poet, who lives at Fordham; John Canfield Spencer, LL.D., lawyer and politician, a native of Hudson, who is known to the literary world for having edited the first American edition of De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America," with an original preface and notes; William Leete Stone, the noted journalist, who, in 1813, edited the Herkimer American and afterwards a political paper at Hudson, becoming finally one of the proprietors of the New York Commercial Advertiser; Peter Van Schaack, LL.D., jurist, loyalist in the Revolutionary War and author, born at Kinderhook, where he died, September 27, 1832; Aaron Ward, lawyer, politician and author, born at Sing Sing, July 5, 1790; Robert Watts, M.D., physician and medical writer, born at Fordham in 1812; and Thurlow Weed, the journalist and politician, born at Cairo, N. Y., November 15, 1797, and whose early life was passed as a cabin boy on the Hudson.

Of contemporary writers, the following have been more or less identified with Westchester County:

General Adam Badeau, author of the "History of General U. S. Grant," etc., who lived in North Tarrytown, Mount Pleasant, from boyhood until about 1856; Clarence Cook, the art critic, who attended school at Irving Institute, Tarrytown, and lived at Irvington; A. C. Wheeler ("Nym Crinkle"), poet and critic, who also attended school at Irving Institute and lived at North Tarrytown; Charles A. Brace, author and philanthropist, who lived at Hastings; Frank Vincent, Jr., author and traveler, who wrote "The Land of the White Elephant," "Through and Through the Tropics" and "Norsk, Lapp and Finn," and whose home is in Tarrytown; Rev. William C. Wilkinson, D.D., formerly professor in Rochester Theological Seminary, who has written a critique on Arnold's "Light of Asia," etc., and who resides at Tarrytown; Stephen H. Thayer, the poet, who wrote "Songs of Sleepy Hollow," and lives in North Tarrytown; Latham C. Strong, poet and journalist, who wrote "Castle Windows," "Poke O'Moonshine," etc., and was a resident of North Tarrytown until his death; Hamilton Mabie, editor of The Christian Union, who lived in North Tarrytown; Marshall H. Bright, editor of The Christian at Work, who lives in Tarrytown; Rev. Pharcellus Church, D.D., the author of a number of books, reviews, etc., and a resident of Tarrytown; Rev. Jacob Dutcher, author of "The Old Home by the River," who was born in Greenburgh; Minna Irving, poetess, a contributor to The Century, whose full name is Minna Irving Odell, and who lives in Greenburgh; Henry Drisler, scholar, author and professor, who lived in Greenburgh; Rev. John A. Paine, professor in Robert College, Constantinople, archæologist to the Palestine Exploring Expedition, and author of a work on that subject, whose home is in Tarrytown; Colonel Church, editor of The Army and Navy Journal; E. Z. C. Judson ("Ned Buntline"), who lived at Chappaqua; Dr. Edward Bright, editor of The Examiner, who lives at Yonkers; and Robert B. Coffin ("Barry Gray"), who lives at Katonah.

In music and the fine arts Westchester is also not without distinction. Among composers may be mentioned George F. Bristow and Francis H. Nash, both residents of Morrisania; and among painters, Albert Bierstadt, the famous landscape painter, who lived within the corporate limits of Tarrytown, and whose residence was destroyed by fire; Francis W. Edmonds, Edward W. Nichols, Tait, Gustave M. Arnolt, the young German painter of animals, and Samuel Fanshaw and Robert Hite, both of them eminent painters on ivory. Robert Walter Weir, the distinguished painter, who succeeded C. R. Leslie as instructor in drawing at West Point, was born at New Rochelle on June 18, 1803.

The earliest of the Westchester County literati was Adrian Van der Donck, a graduate of the University of Leyden, who was appointed by the patroon of Rensselaerwick sheriff of his colony, and came to New Netherland in 1642. In 1648 he was granted a tract of land at Yonkers. In the deed he was spoken of as Yonker Van der Donck, Yonker being the usual title of gentleman. His name appears among the signers of a tract, published at the Hague in 1650, describing the New Netherland. It has been translated by Mr. Henry C. Murphy for the New York Historical Society, and published by them, and also by James Lenox, of New York. Owing to its attacks on the government of Kieft and Stuyvesant, Van der Donck was denied access to the colonial records during the preparation of his "Description of New Netherland," which has been translated and occupies one hundred and six pages of the "New York Historical Society's Collections," 1841. It describes the rural products, animals and inhabitants of the colony. The date of the first edition is unknown. The second was published at Amsterdam, in 1656, by Ebert Nieuwenhof, who introduced the work with a poetical preface.

Right Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, may be classed among the literary men of Westchester, from the fact that, while in charge of St. Peter's Church, Westchester, he wrote and published, anonymously, during the Revolutionary period, a series of pamphlets in defense of the crown, under the signature, it is said, of "A. W. Farmer." He was the son of Rev. Samuel Seabury, missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, at New London, Conn., and was born at Croton, November 30, 1729, and graduated at Yale in 1748. He then went to Scotland to study medicine, but while in that country also devoted his attention to theology, and was ordained by the Bishop of London in 1753, and, on his return, settled at New Brunswick, N. J., as a missionary of the Propagation Society. In 1757 he removed to Jamaica, and from thence, in 1766, to Westchester, where, in addition to his church, he had charge of a school. The authorship of the "Farmer" pamphlets, which were commonly attributed to him, caused him to be seized by the Whigs, in 1775, and carried to New Haven, where he was imprisoned. As the fact of the authorship could not be established by legal proof, he was suffered to return to Westches er, where he renewed his efforts in behalf of the Loyalist cause. Upon the Declaration of American Independence he removed to New York City. Here he remained until the close of the war, officiating part of the time as chaplain to the King's American Regiment, and practicing medicine. In 1783, having been elected bishop of the diocese of Connecticut, he sailed for England and applied for consecration to the Archbishop of York, the See of Canterbury being vacant. His application was refused, in consequence of the inability of the English bishops to dispense with the oath of allegiance to the crown. In August, 1784, he made a similar application to the bishops of the Scottish Church, by whom he was consecrated, at Aberdeen, November 14, 1784. In the spring of the following year he returned to America and began the discharge of his duties as bishop. He displayed considerable ability and force as a writer on a variety of topics, and rendered important services to his church in the arrangement of the Liturgy and other matters. He died February 25, 1796, at New London, Conn., where he had filled his father's place as rector of the church, besides discharging his episcopal duties. The "Farmer" pamphlets have been attributed to Isaac Wilkins, and also to Dr. Chandler, Dr. Inglis and Dr. Myles Cooper, but it is believed they were written by Seabury. The strongest evidence is found in the draft of a document in Seabury's own writing, in which he states that he was the author of a pamplet, entitled "Free Thoughts on the Proceedings of the Congress at Philadelphia," which was published shortly after the first Congress broke up, and other publications which followed, all of them signed "A. W. Farmer." He also states that on the 19th of November, 1775, an armed force of one hundred horsemen came from Connecticut to his house, and, not finding him at home, beat his children to compel them to tell where their father was, "which, not succeeding, they searched the neighborhood and took him from his school, and, with much abusive language, carried him in great triumph to New Haven, seventy miles distant, where he was paraded through most of the streets, and their success celebrated by firing cannon, &c." At this time, according to his own statement, Dr. Seabury "lived at Westchester, in the then province of New York, and was, though not wealthy, yet in easy circumstances, and supported a large family—viz., a wife and six children—comfortably and decently; that his income was at least £200 Sterl. p^{r} a^{nn}, arising from his Parish, Glebe & from a grammar School, in which he had more than 20 young Gentlemen, when the Rebellion began." The "Free Thoughts" of Seabury, we are told, excited the bitterest feeling. It was reprinted in London, in 1775, "for Richardson & Urquhart, at the Royal Exchange." Mr. Trumbull says that "when copies of these pamphlets fell into the hands of the Whigs, they were disposed of in such a manner as most emphatically to express detestation of the anonymous authors and their sentiments. Sometimes they were publicly burned, with imposing formality; sometimes decorated with tar and feathers [from the Turkey-buzzard, as 'the fittest emblem of the author's odiousness'], and nailed to the whipping-post." Rev. Jonathan Boucher, writing of Seabury's authorship of the pamphlets, states that, "being attributed to another gentleman, he alone derived any advantage from them, for to him the British government granted a handsome pension, whilst the real author [Seabury] never received a farthing." Who the spurious pensioner was, Mr. Boucher does not state. Bishop Seabury received the degree of A.M. from Columbia (then King's) College, N. Y., in 1761, and that of D.D. from the University of Oxford, England. His son Charles, a distinguished clergyman and father of Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., of New York, was born at Westchester, May 20, 1770.

REV. ISAAC WILKINS, D.D.

Isaac Wilkins, D.D., was born at Withywood in the Island of Jamaica, December 17, 1742, and was the son of Martin Wilkins, an eminent lawyer and judge, who came to New York in order to educate his son. His parents died when he was a child and his care and education devolved on his aunt, Mrs. Mary Macey, his mother's sister. He graduated at King's College in 1760, and was married, November 7, 1762, to Isabella, daughter of Hon. Lewis Morris. They resided at Morrisania for a year or two, when Mr. Wilkins purchased an estate known as Castle Hill Neck, in Westchester County. In 1772 he was sent to the Colonial Legislature from the borough of Westchester and took an active part in its proceedings until April, 1775, on the side of the Loyalists. As the reputed author of the "Westchester Farmer" pamphlets, he became obnoxious to the Whigs and was forced to leave for England, where he remained about a year, making every effort to reconcile the dispute between the colonies and the mother country. He then returned to his family, whom he removed from Castle Hill, which had been laid waste and made desolate, to Long Island, where, at Newtown and Flatbush, he resided until the peace. He sold his farm in 1784 and took his family to Nova Scotia, where he purchased a farm and returned to his agricultural pursuits. He was sent to the Assembly of the province, and soon after placed at the head of a committee for the distribution of lands to the American refugee Loyalists. In 1798 he returned to New York, and while preparing for the ministry was called to the partial rectorship of St. Peter's, Westchester. As soon as he was ordained deacon he entered upon the discharge of his duties. He was ordained a priest by Bishop Provoost, January 14, 1801. He was now in the enjoyment of a pension from the British government of one hundred and twenty pounds per annum. In 1811 the degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by King's College. He died at the rectory in Westchester February 5, 1830, in his eighty-ninth year.

Right Rev. William Heathcote De Lancey, D.D., D.C.L., Protestant Episcopal bishop of Western New York, was one of Westchester's most distinguished sons. He was born at Mamaroneck October 8, 1797, and died at Geneva, N. Y., April 5, 1865. He graduated at Yale in 1817, studied theology under Bishop Hobart, was ordained deacon in 1819 and priest in 1822, and soon after became assistant to Bishop White in Philadelphia. He was annually chosen secretary of the Diocesan Convention of Pennsylvania from 1825 to 1830, and was secretary of the House of Bishops from 1823 to 1829. He was provost of the University of Pennsylvania from 1828 to 1833; traveled in Europe in 1835 and on his return, after the death of Bishop White, succeeded to the rectorship of St. Peter's, Philadelphia. In 1838 he was chosen first bishop of the diocese of Western New York, and was consecrated May 9, 1839. The Hobart Free College at Geneva was chiefly indebted to his efforts for its maintenance. In 1852 he was a delegate to England from the Episcopal bishops of the United States, and was one of the recognized leaders of the High Church party. He received the degree of D.C.L. from the Oxford University in 1852; D.D. from Yale in 1828 and LL.D. from Union College in 1847.

Thomas Paine, the noted political and atheistic writer, is identified with Westchester County by the fact that for his Revolutionary services the State of New York granted him five hundred acres of land in New Rochelle, where he resided part of the time after his return to the United States, in 1802. Paine was a native of Thetford, Norfolk, England, born January 29, 1737; died in New York City, June 8, 1809. His parentage was humble and his educational opportunities limited. For a time he preached occasionally as a dissenting minister, and in 1774, at the suggestion of Franklin, came to America. He soon became known as a writer of uncommon force and logic and an opponent of slavery. His celebrated pamphlet, "Common Sense," in which he advocated the independence of the colonies, was published in January, 1776, and had an extraordinary influence in disseminating republican ideas. His subsequent publications were of inestimable benefit to the patriotic cause. He was outlawed in England for his celebrated "Rights of Man," which appeared in 1791, in answer to Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution," and in September, 1792, was elected a member of the French National Convention. In consequence of his outspoken opposition to the execution of Louis XVI., he narrowly escaped being put to death during the Reign of Terror. His remains were taken to England in 1819 by William Cobbett. A monument was erected to his memory in 1839, near his original burial-place in New Rochelle.

The literary reputation of John Jay is chiefly that which attaches to his political character, but he is pre-eminently worthy of being ranked among the literary men whom old Westchester has either produced or nurtured. Of Huguenot descent and a native of New York City, born December 12, 1745, he graduated at Columbia College and was a delegate to the First Revolutionary Congress at the age of twenty-eight, three years later chief justice of his State, and subsequently minister to Spain and negotiator of the peace with Great Britain, Secretary of State, Chief Justice of the United States and Governor of New York. Notwithstanding these various trusts, he was enabled to spend nearly thirty years of retirement in pleasant country life at Bedford, Westchester County, where he died on the 17th of May, 1829, at the age of eighty-four. His life has been written by his son, William Jay. His national state papers, written when a member of the Continental Congress, and his contributions to the Federalist, were powerful aids to the patriot cause. His "Address to the People of Great Britain," in 1774, called forth expressions of admiration from Jefferson. He was also the author of a number of other political treatises of great clearness and vigor.

William Jay, second son of Chief Justice Jay, was also a person of decided literary talent. He was born June 16, 1789, graduated at Yale, and studied law at Albany under John B. Henry, until, compelled to abandon study by an affection of the eyes, he retired to his father's country-seat at Bedford. In 1812 he married the daughter of John McVickar, a New York merchant. He was appointed first judge of the county of Westchester by Governor Tompkins and was successively reappointed by Clinton, Marcy and Van Buren. Throughout his life he was a prominent opponent of slavery and in this connection published many addresses and pamphlets, which were collected by him in his "Miscellaneous Writings on Slavery," published at Boston in 1854. In 1832 he published "The Life and Writings of John Jay." He died at his residence in Bedford, October 14, 1858.

John Jay, son of William Jay, born June 23, 1817, and a graduate of Columbia College in 1836, is also the author of several pamphlets on the slavery question, together with many other papers on topics of public interest. He studied law in the city of New York and was admitted to the bar in 1839. His residence of late years has been the old homestead at Bedford. In April, 1869, he was appointed minister to Austria and represented this country with distinction at the Court of Vienna.

Gouverneur Morris, the noted statesman and writer, was a native of Morrisania. The first of his ancestors who emigrated to America was Richard Morris, who is said to have been an officer in Cromwell's army. He came to New York after a short residence in the West Indies and purchased an estate at Harlem, which was invested by the Governor with manorial rights. His son Lewis succeeded to the estate and during the last eight years of his life was Governor of New Jersey. His eldest son, Lewis, became a member of the New York Legislature. The second Lewis had four sons, of whom the youngest was Gouverneur, who was born January 31, 1752. At an early age he was placed in the family of M. Tetar, at New Rochelle, where he acquired a thorough knowledge of the French language. At the age of sixteen he graduated at King's College, distinguishing himself by a florid address on "Wit and Beauty." He then studied law in the office of William Smith, colonial historian of New York, and at the age of eighteen began the publication of a series of anonymous newspaper articles against a proposition in the Assembly for raising money by emitting bills of credit. In 1775 he was elected a member of the Provincial Congress, in which he soon attracted attention by a speech on the mode of issuing a paper currency by the Continental Congress. Its chief suggestions were afterwards adopted by that body. In 1777 he was elected a member of the Continental Congress and the following winter was one of the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the army, then stationed at Valley Forge. He was also chairman of the committee appointed in 1779 to consider the dispatches from the American commissioners in Europe, which were the basis of the subsequent treaty of peace. In the discussion of the question as to the jurisdiction of the State of New York over the New Hampshire grants, now the State of Vermont, Morris was supposed to be in favor of the independence of that region and consequently lost his election by the Legislature to Congress. He continued to reside in Philadelphia and engaged in the practice of his profession. In the early part of 1780 he commenced the publication of a series of essays on the state of the national finances, which were then in a desperate condition. He attacked with great ability the laws making the receipt of paper money at a fixed value compulsory, and also those regulating the prices of commodities. In May, 1780, Morris was seriously hurt by being thrown from his carriage and it was necessary to amputate one of his legs. In 1781 he was appointed by Robert Morris, who had been placed at the head of the national finances, his assistant. He performed the duties of this position for three years and a half. In 1786 his mother died. Her life interest in the estate at Morrisania thus terminated, and the property passed into the possession of the second son, Staats Long Morris, a general in the British army, the eldest son, Lewis, having received his portion during his father's life-time. Gouverneur purchased the estate from his brother. In 1787 he took his seat as delegate from Pennsylvania in the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. President Madison bears testimony to his exertions for the promotion of harmony, and states that the draft of the Constitution was placed in his hands to receive its finished form. In 1788 he sailed for France and in January, 1791, visited London by appointment of President Washington as a private agent to the British government to settle unfulfilled articles of the treaty of peace. During his stay in London he received his appointment as minister to France. During the troubled times of the Directory in Paris he conducted the affairs of his office with great tact and prudence. In August, 1794, he was succeeded by Monroe, his recall having been asked by the French government after the recall of Citizen Genet at the request of the United States. He next made a tour of Europe, and while in Vienna endeavored to secure the release of Lafayette from Olmütz. In October, 1798, he returned home. In 1799 he was chosen United States Senator from New York. He sided in the Senate and for the remainder of his life with the Federalists. His term closed in March, 1803, after which he resided at Morrisania. On Christmas day, 1809, he married Miss Anne Carey Randolph, of Virginia. Mr. Morris delivered funeral orations on Washington, Hamilton and Governor George Clinton and an inaugural discourse before the New York Historical Society on his election as president, and contributed frequently in the later years of his life to the New York Evening Post, the Examiner and the United States Gazette. He was an early advocate of the Erie Canal and chairman of the canal commissioners from their first appointment, in March, 1810, to the time of his death, which occurred November 6, 1816. His life, with selections from his correspondence and papers, by Jared Sparks, was published in 1822. In person he so closely resembled Washington that he stood as a model of his figure for Houdon, the sculptor.

The association of Alexander Hamilton with the history of Westchester County is of a tragic character, for it was at Weehawken that he lost his life in the duel with Burr, July 12, 1804. One of his best known productions—his description of the fate of Major Andre—also links him with the literary chronicles of the county, and one of his strongest, political papers was his reply to Dr. Seabury's supposed "Westchester Farmer" pamphlets. Of Andre he wrote, "Never, perhaps, did any man suffer death with more justice or deserve it less." Of the famous Federalist, papers, Hamilton wrote fifty-one out of eighty-five numbers. His life and public services are too well known to require consideration here. His fame will chiefly rest upon his able adminstration of the Treasury Department. In the eloquent language of Webster, "he smote the rock of the national resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of the public credit and it sprung upon its feet."

James A. Hamilton, son of Alexander Hamilton, lived in Greenburgh, north of Dobbs Ferry, from 1835 until his death. He was the author of an interesting volume entitled "Reminiscences of Men and Events at Home and Abroad During Three-Quarters of a Century," published by Charles Scribner & Co., New York, 1869.

General Alexander Hamilton, grandson of Alexander Hamilton, lives in Tarrytown, Greenburgh. He has written tragedies, poems, prose, etc., and is a highly cultivated and accomplished litterateur.

David Humphreys, the soldier poet of the Revolution, composed his "Address to the Armies of the United States of America" in 1782, while encamped at Peekskill, the foe being in possession of New York and Charleston. He was the son of a Congregational clergyman, Rev. Daniel Humphreys, and was born in Derby, Connecticut, in 1753. He was educated at Yale, where he formed a personal and literary friendship with Dwight and Trumbull. He entered the Revolutionary army, and became a member of Washington's military family, with the rank of colonel. He wrote a life of General Putnam, and a number of poems and plays. After the war he resided with Washington at Mount Vernon, and when he became President, traveled with him to New York. Among his poetical productions is "Washington's Farewell to the Army," in verse. He held the diplomatic post of ambassador to Lisbon, 1794–1797, and minister to Spain, 1797–1802. He died at New Haven, February 21, 1818.

Robert Rogers, the noted ranger and writer, narrowly escaped being captured by Lord Stirling's troops at Mamaroneck, so that his associations connected with Westchester County were not, perhaps, of the pleasantest character. He was then a colonel in the British service, commanding the Queen's Rangers. After the incident at Mamaroneck he went to England, and was succeeded in his command by Colonel Simcoe. He was a native of Dunbarton, New Hampshire, and early achieved reputation as commander of a company of Rangers during the French War. His name is perpetuated by "Rogers' Slide" on Lake George, so-called from the daring act of Rogers in escaping from the Indians by sliding down the steep face of the mountain to the shore of the lake. After many romantic adventures in this country and in Europe, he figured in 1775 as an ardent patriot. Washington, however, suspected him, and in June 1776, ordered his arrest. He professed to be on his way to offer his services to Congress, which body ordered his return to New Hampshire. He soon after openly espoused the cause of the King. He was proscribed and banished by his native State, and his subsequent history is unknown. Rogers published in 1765, his "Journals," a spirited account of his early adventures as a ranger, and in the same year, "A Concise Account of North America." In the following year, he published a tragedy, "Ponteach," founded on scenes of frontier life.

Rev. Nathaniel Scudder Prime, D.D., author of a "Treatise on Baptism" and the "History of Long Island," died at Mamaroneck, March 27, 1856. He was born at Huntington, L. I., April 21, 1785; graduated in 1804 at Princeton College, from which, in 1848, he received the degree of D.D., and was ordained a Presbyterian minister October 24, 1809.

In the spring of 1830 the Rev. Dr. Prime came to Sing Sing with his family from Cambridge, Washington County, N. Y. He had been invited by the trustees of the Mount Pleasant Academy, in Sing Sing, to be its principal and had accepted the appointment. Having been the principal of the academy in Cambridge, he brought several pupils with him, and a high reputation as a scholar and teacher.

Dr. Prime was a very remarkable man. His father and grandfather were men of learning, and he himself had made great attainments in the ancient languages, philosophy and mathematics. There was probably no superior to him as a teacher in this country at that time. His two eldest sons, Alanson Jermain and Samuel Irenæus, were associated with him in the work of instruction.

The Female Seminary in Sing Sing, then under the care of Miss Dawson, was soon purchased by Dr. Prime, and his daughters, Miss Maria M. Prime and Miss Cornelia Prime, conducted the school with great success.

The academy flourished and attracted students from distant parts of the country.

The Presbyterian congregation of the village invited Dr. Prime to take charge of the pulpit, and he preached in it as stated supply about three years. He identified himself with the improvement of the place, taking an active part in all public movements of a philanthropic and moral character. In addition to the sons and daughters already named, two sons more were trained in the academy, Edward D. G. Prime and William C. Prime, the first-named graduating at Union College and the other at Princeton. The oldest son, A. J. Prime, pursued the study of medicine with Dr. A. K. Hoffman, and was for many years a successful physician at White Plains, where he died April 3, 1864, aged fifty-three years.

During the time of Dr. Prime's principalship of the academy, and almost entirely through his perseverance and enterprise, the large and handsome stone building now occupied by the institution was built, and it stands as a monument to his memory.

In the year 1835 Dr. Prime and his family removed to Newburgh, N. Y., where they conducted a female seminary and also the Newburgh Academy.

His son, Rev. Samuel Irenæus Prime, D.D., who died in 1885, was for many years the editor of the New York Observer, and known throughout the country as a graceful writer of travels and religious works, as well as for his able editorial management of the Observer. He was born at Ballston, N. Y., November 4, 1812, graduated at Williams College in 1829, was ordained a Presbyterian minister and received the degree of D.D. from Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia. His brother, E. D. Prime, also of the Observer, and W. C. Prime, formerly of the New York Journal of Commerce, were also residents of Sing Sing in early life.

John Swinburne, A.M., the distinguished scholar and teacher, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., August 11, 1803. His father was a native of England, and came to this country when a young man. His mother was a native of Ireland, and was brought to the United States by her parents in early childhood. After their marriage his parents settled in Brooklyn, where they had three children,—two sons and one daughter. John was the eldest of the three. When twelve years of age he lost his father by death. His education, from its earliest stages until he entered on the duties of active life, was directed by an English gentleman of rare attainments as a scholar and eminent skill as a teacher, and the successful results of his training were finely illustrated in the subsequent career of his gifted pupil. After leaving school he turned his attention for a short time to mercantile pursuits, and was engaged as book-keeper by a large commercial house in North Carolina. Not finding this sphere of effort congenial to his taste, he returned, after a year and a half, to Brooklyn, where he established, and successfully conducted for ten years, a select school. On October 5, 1825, he was married to Mary W., daughter of Isaac Searles, of Brooklyn. A few years afterward he accepted an invitation to the position of principal of White Plains Academy, an incorporated literary institution under the care of the regents of the State. This position he filled with the highest credit to his ability as an educator of youth. While principal of this academy he received, as an entirely voluntary tribute to his learning and skill, the honorary degree of Master of Arts from the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn. The president, Rev. Wilbur Fiske, D.D., LL.D., in presenting this degree, said, in his letter to Professor Swinburne: "This honor is regarded by our Faculty and Board of Trustees as justly due to your superior scholarship, as proved by the fact that your scholars, who enter our Institution, are the best fitted of any we receive."

In 1841, Professor Swinburne, who desired a school which should be subject to his sole authority, and in which he might carry out practically and fully his views of the proper education of boys, established "The White Plains Institute," a boarding-school for boys. The reputation of its proprietor and principal, as an accomplished instructor and as a Christian gentleman of the highest qualities, was so extensively known and fully established, that from its opening applicants for admission to the institute were more numerous than could be received. He now found himself in just the sphere of educational effort which he had long wished. His school was his own, was admirably located, liberally furnished in every department, and would rise or fall as his long-cherished ideal of such a school should find practical realization from his efforts. To say that his success was pre-eminent is only to state a fact testified to by all who know the history of the school. The prominent characteristic of its instruction throughout was thoroughness. Mastery of the study pursued, at every step of progress made, was the end aimed at and required; and in this feature it strikingly resembled the celebrated Rugby School of Dr. Arnold in England. His scholars who left the school to enter upon a collegiate course uniformly took a high rank, and often the highest rank, in scholarship in the institutions they joined; and those who pursued a course preparatory to a business life have almost invariably been found among the most successful and honored in the circles of mercantile and commercial enterprise. The advanced years of the professor are often gladdened now by visits from his former pupils,—generally gray-headed men and distinguished in their several spheres of life, who approach their venerable teacher and friend with strong and often touching expressions of respect, gratitude and affection. The lapse of years and the changes of more than a generation seem only to have strengthened and made more tender the ties which were created by the relation that once existed. From his early youth the professor evinced a remarkable genius for mathematics. While yet a young man he was a contributor to some of the ablest mathematical periodicals of the country. Even now, when more than eighty years of age, he is often found engaged in mathematical investigations, as a mere pastime. This natural capacity for and pleasure in this science, connected with a peculiar facility in simplifying to young minds its rules and processes, enabled the professor to awaken in his school that fondness for mathematical studies, and secure that unusual advancement in them, which was one of the marked results of his teaching.

With the literature of ancient Greece and Rome he has rare familiarity. Many of the most elegant of the classic authors of antiquity in their original languages are to him as hand-books, and his translations of a number of them into our vernacular tongue are among the permanent and most valuable fruits of his scholarly labors. He is now just finishing a translation of the works of Horace, which, in fidelity to the original text, and in perspicuity and elegance of expression, will, in the opinion of classical scholars who have had the privilege of examining his work, be superior to any we now have. It is earnestly desired that he will give these translations to the world through the press, and that his health and strength will be continued, that he may personally superintend their publication.

Among the sciences to which he has successfully given his attention is mineralogy, and through more than half a century he has been engaged in collecting specimens from different parts of the world, till he has now a choice and valuable cabinet.

In 1853 Professor Swinburne met with an irreparable loss in the death of his wife. This most estimable lady, naturally active and energetic, possessed of superior practical wisdom and endowed with great tenderness of affection, had rendered invaluable aid in the administration of a school whose government was peculiarly parental. Even after the lapse of more than thirty years, the testimony borne to her watchful care and maternal kindness, by those once pupils of the school, is a most touching tribute to her memory, and furnishes pathetic proof of the great loss sustained by the school in her decease. The uninterrupted prosperity of the institute had secured to its proprietor a handsome competency; and having no longer the important aid of his wife, he decided to retire from the school to whose interests he had given the best years of his life. In the sphere of a teacher of youth for thirty years, Professor Swinburne had earned and received its highest honors, and he could now lay aside its labors in the gratifying consciousness that to the advancement of the cause of education, second in importance to none that can employ the human mind, he had given his best powers and most devoted efforts.

Since his retirement from teaching, he has continued his residence in White Plains, and has often been honored by his fellow-citizens with positions of responsibility and trust. On the organization of the fire department of the town, he was made its first president, and continued such for a number of years. When the village was incorporated, he was elected its first president, and re-elected for several successive terms. He was made the first president of the White Plains Savings Bank, and president and treasurer of the Board of Commissioners of Westchester Avenue. At the opening of the War of the Rebellion, and through its whole progress, his influence was powerfully felt in support of the cause of the Union. In his eloquent appeals at public gatherings to the patriotism of those who could take the field, as well as by his liberal contributions of money to aid in the raising and equipment of military organizations and to meet the wants of the families of soldiers who were absent at the seat of war, he rendered most valuable aid and inspired hearts in many an anxious home with gladness and hope. Professor Swinburne is a firm believer in the Christian faith. For more than forty years he has been in communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church and a liberal supporter of its worship at home and of its benevolent efforts through the land. Although eighty-three years of age and laboring under the physical infirmities incident to his years, his mental faculties continue unimpaired, and he enjoys his literary labors as highly, and enters into the current affairs of the day as earnestly and welcomes the society of his friends as cordially, as when in the prime of life. The circle of his friends is almost unlimited, and rarely has a man lived who could boast of those more devoted.

Robert Havell, an eminent English engraver and publisher, resided for many years in Sing Sing. Mr. Havell distinguished himself as the publisher, as well as the chief engraver, of that world-renowned and supremely sumptuous work, Audubon's "Birds of America." This work appeared in ten magnificent volumes, so large as to occasion the invention of the term elephant folio. They contained over five hundred plates, colored to the life, each bird being shown in life size, even to the extent of a large specimen of the wild turkey. The subscription price was one thousand dollars per copy. Mr. Havell spent fourteen long years in engraving, with his own hands, the most difficult portions of this work. He also employed a full force of assistants. Besides this work, Mr. Havell also published the grand work of Lord Kingsborough on the "Antiquities of Mexico," in nine quarto volumes, richly illustrated. The subscription price of this work was one hundred and seventy-five pounds per copy. To the above must be added Donnovan's "Insects of India" and "Insects of China," two exceedingly beautiful illustrated works in quarto, and a superb folio on "Lilies and Amaryllas." After the completion of "The Birds of America," Audubon induced Mr. Havell to accompany him to this country. He came to Sing Sing, one day, to enjoy the scenery, and while there made a bid on a parcel of land then being sold at auction, and had it struck off to him. This surprised him, as he had made his bid more in jest than in earnest. However, he accepted the bargain, and subsequently built a house on the grounds and occupied it as his residence for many years. He eventually removed to Tarrytown, where he died a few years since. The Havell mansion was situated on the high grounds nearly opposite the grand gateway of Dale Cemetery. The little avenue leading to these places still bears his name.

That distinguished English writer on mental disorders, the late Dr. Forbes Winslow, resided in Sing Sing for several years during his boyhood. His mother, who was then a widow, and her two sons, Forbes and Octavius, both of whom subsequently became celebrated, one as a physician, the other as a divine, resided for several years in a house that then stood where the present mansion of Mr. Frank Larkin now stands.

Rev. Robert Bolton, author of Bolton's "History of Westchester County," was born in the city of Bath, England, April 17, 1814. He was the eldest of the fourteen children of the Rev. Robert Bolton and Anne, daughter of the distinguished Rev. William Jay, of Bath.

The Bolton family is of ancient British stock, their genealogy being traced up to the time of the Conquest; resident, anciently, at Bolton and Blackburn, in Lancashire, and Wales, in Yorkshire. In the long line of the Bolton ancestry the name of Robert is rarely without a bearer. A number of these were distinguished for their learning and piety. A Robert, born in 1572, was noted at Lincoln and Brazen Nose Colleges, Oxford, for his varied accomplishments, and afterward as a divine. A Robert, born in England in 1688, became a prominent merchant in Philadelphia. His son Robert, born in 1722, was a merchant in Savannah, Georgia. His son Robert, born in 1757, became a very prominent merchant of Savannah, and the owner of much valuable real estate. His son Robert, born in 1788, in Savannah, became a merchant in Liverpool, England, afterward the rector of Christ Church, Pelham, Westchester County, and subsequently chaplain to the Earl of Ducie, at Tortworth, in Gloucestershire. His son Robert is the subject of this sketch.

Mr. Bolton and his four brothers became clergymen in the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was ordained a deacon in October, 1868, and a presbyter in June, 1869. He was rector of St. John's Church, South Salem, at the time of his death.

His brother, William Jay, at the time of his death, was rector of St. James', Bath, England, and an author of note; John is rector of Trinity Church, Westchester, Pa.; Cornelius Winter is rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Pelhamville, Westchester County; and James was the incumbent of St. Paul's Chapel, Kilburn, London. All of Mr. Bolton's sisters who survived youth achieved distinction in teaching, in literature or in art.

Robert Bolton was educated in England, and studied medicine there, but never practiced it as a profession. He came to this country in 1836, and settled at Bronxville, in East Chester, becoming a farmer. From there he removed to New Rochelle and published his first book, "The Guide to New Rochelle." He then removed to Tarrytown and engaged in teaching, an occupation to which he gave attention for the remainder of his life. He there became principal of the Irving Institute, and enjoyed intimate relations with Washington Irving, who had long been a close friend of his father. He next removed to Bedford, taking charge of the Female Institute there, and afterward founded a school in Lewisboro.

While preparing the "Guide to New Rochelle" he became interested in Westchester County history, and at once began the collection of the materials which he published in two volumes in 1848. The labor involved in this work, in the searching of collections of documents, the examination of papers and the personal visitation of every spot of interest and nearly every person of advanced age, was very great. His knowledge of the history of county localities was remarkable. He was actively engaged in the revision of his history at the time of his death. He was also the author of the "History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Westchester County," and of the "Memoirs of the Bolton Family."

In 1838 he married Elizabeth Rebecca, daughter of James Brenton, of Newport, R. I.; she died in 1852. In 1854 he married Josephine, daughter of Brewster Woodhull, of Patchogue, L. I., by whom he had eleven children.

Mr. Bolton's father founded the celebrated Bolton Priory, at Pelham, with which the family name has been so prominently connected. He purchased this estate, charmingly situated upon the shore of Long Island Sound, in 1837, and erected thereon a handsome stone edifice for a residence, and laid out the grounds with surpassing taste. This was afterward used for a young ladies' school, and under the management of Miss Nanetta Bolton, became justly famous. Here Robert Bolton, the historian, died October 11, 1877.

Beside being a laborious, painstaking historian, a diligent teacher and an earnest minister, Mr. Bolton was accomplished in many ways. He was dexterous in wood-carving, apt with his pencil and skillful in painting. He had a passion for the antique, and was a man of peculiarly fine and cultivated tastes.

Rev. Cornelius Winter Bolton, brother of Robert Bolton, the historian, was born in Bath, England, June 3, 1819. He came to this country and studied divinity at the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va.; was admitted to deacon's orders in 1847, and was ordained priest in 1848. In 1850 he became assistant minister of Christ Church, Baltimore, and in 1855 rector of Christ Church, Pelham. In 1858 he was rector of South Yonkers Church, and he then became minister of St. George's Chapel, in New York City. He became rector of St. Mark's Church, New Castle, in 1867, and then of St. Stephen's, North Castle,and at present is rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Pelhamville.

In 1856 he married Cornelia, daughter of Cornelius Glen Van Rensselaer, Esq., of Greenbush, Rensselaer County, N. Y.

Mr. C. W. Bolton is the author of "The Shepherd's Call," the "Sunday-school Prayer-Book" and other publications. In 1854 he edited Jay's "Female Scripture Characters" and Jay's "Autobiography and Reminiscences." In 1881 he edited and published his brother Robert's "History of Westchester County."

Edmund March Blunt, the nautical writer, was for many years a resident of Sing Sing. He was born at Portsmouth, N. H., June 20, 1770, and died at Sing Sing, January 5, 1862, in the ninety-third year of his age. He was the publisher of the Newburyport Herald, and in 1796 he published his first "Coast Pilot," which is still in use, and which has been translated into most of the languages of Europe. He also published "Strangers' Guide to New York City" in 1817, and numerous nautical books and charts. He lived about forty years in the house in State Street, Sing Sing, now owned and occupied by Dr. Wm. H. Helm.

Mrs. Ann Eliza Bleecker, the poetess, was at one time a resident of Westchester County, having lived at Poughkeepsie a year or two just after her marriage. Mrs. Bleecker was the youngest daughter of Brandt Schuyler, and was born in the city of New York in October, 1752. In 1769 she married Mr. John J. Bleecker, of New Rochelle, and removed with him to Poughkeepsie. After leaving Poughkeepsie, Mr. and Mrs. Bleecker settled at Tomhanick, a beautiful little village about eighteen miles above Albany. She died there November 23, 1783. Her poems were written without a view to publication, but several of them were printed in the earlier numbers of the New York Magazine. A collection of her poems and stories was published in 1793, under the supervision of her daughter, Margaretta, who added a number of verses and essays from her own pen.

Gulian C. Verplanck belongs to the literary characters of Westchester County by right of residence, for many years dividing his time between the city of New York and the Verplanck homestead at Fishkill Landing, on the Hudson, a well-preserved old mansion, in which the Society of the Cincinnati was founded. A graduate of Columbia College, he studied law, was admitted to the bar and after spending several years in Europe returned to New York, and was elected a member of the Legislature. In 1818 he delivered the first of the series of public addresses on which his literary reputation mainly rests. About 1820 he was appointed professor of the Evidences of Christianity in the General Protestant Episcopal Seminary, and in 1824 published a volume of essays on this subject. In 1825 he was elected a member of Congress from New York City and remained in the House eight years. He was especially prominent in advocacy of the bill extending the term of copyright from twenty-eight to forty-two years. For several years he was a member of the New York Senate. In 1827 Verplanck, Sands and Bryant united in the production of an annual called The Talisman. Mr. Verplanck also wrote a number of essays on a variety of subjects and published an edition of Shakespeare's plays, with notes from various sources, including some from his own pen. Mr. Verplanck, who was born in New York City August 6, 1786, died there March 18, 1870. His private life, says Bryant, "was as beautiful as his public life was useful and beneficent."

James Fenimore Cooper is another distinguished name which may be included among the literati of Westchester County, for his first novel was written while he resided at Mamaroneck. Cooper was born at Burlington, N. J., September 15, 1789. His father, Judge William Cooper, removed the following year to the neighborhood of Otsego Lake, N. Y., where he had purchased a large tract of land on which he established a settlement, to which he gave the name of Cooperstown. In this frontier home, in the midst of a population of settlers, trappers and Indians, young Cooper imbibed that knowledge of backwoods life and of the habits of the aborigines which afterwards served him so well in the construction of his romances. At the age of thirteen he entered Yale College, and after remaining there three years received an appointment as midshipman in the United States Navy. In the latter he obtained, during the six years of his service, a familiarity with nautical life which he utilized with splendid results in his famous sea-stories.

In 1811 Cooper resigned his commission in the navy and married Miss De Lancey, a member of the well-known New York family of that name and sister of the bishop of Western New York. They settled in the village of Mamaroneck, in Westchester County, and not long after Cooper's mind was accidentally turned to the field of fiction. One day, after reading an English novel, he remarked to his wife that he believed he could write a better story himself. To test the matter he wrote "Precaution." He had not intended to publish the novel, but was induced to do so by his wife and his friend, Charles Wilkes. The descriptions of English life and scenery gave it great popularity in England where it was re-published. The "Spy," which followed, was as thoroughly American, and obtained great success, not only in this country, but abroad. It was almost immediately re-published in all parts of Europe. "The Pioneers" was the first of the series of frontier and Indian stories, on which the novelist's reputation chiefly rests. It was followed by "The Pilot," the first of his sea-stories. Other novels followed in quick succession, and Cooper's reputation grew apace. He was also sharply criticised and became involved in various controversies, which culminated finally in a series of libel suits against his detractors in the newspapers. In 1826 he visited Europe, and upon his return to this country made his home at Cooperstown, N. Y. During his residence abroad (1826–33) he was everywhere received with marked attention. His literary activity was unchecked by his wanderings, and during his stay in Europe he wrote a number of novels. After his return to this country he wrote the "Naval History of the United States," which excited an acrimonious discussion as to the correctness of his account of the battle of Lake Erie. In one of his libel suits Cooper defended, in person, the accuracy of his version of the battle. A lawyer, who was an auditor of the closing sentences of his argument, remarked, "I have heard nothing like it since the days of Emmet." Cooper continued to write with amazing fertility and vigor almost to the close of his life, which was terminated by dropsy, September 14, 1851. Notwithstanding his defects of style, his romances are conceded to be among the most vivid and original of all American works of fiction. He was the first of his countrymen who obtained a wide recognition in other portions of the world. His works were translated into many languages, and the Indian tales especially were universal favorites in Europe. The great French novelist, Balzac, said of him, "With, what amazing power has he painted nature! How all his pages glow with creative fire! Who is there writing English among our contemporaries, if not of him, of whom it can be said that he has a genius of the first order?" "The empire of the sea," says the Edinburgh Review, "has been conceded to him by acclamation;" and the same journal adds, "In the lonely desert or untrodden prairie, among the savage Indians, or scarcely less savage settlers, all equally acknowledge his dominion."

Of all the writers who have in any way been associated with the history of Westchester County, Washington Irving is perhaps the most illustrious. Born in New York City, his whole life, with brief intervals, was spent within the borders of the county, and some of his very best work bears the impress of local influences. On the "lordly Hudson" Irving "chose and built the home where he lived for many years, and in which he did much of his life's best work, and here he died."[1]

"Westchester," said another eulogist of Irving, "has a claim peculiarly her own, for, while we are joint-heirs with others of his fame, Irving was here honored during his life for other qualities besides those of the gifted author, as he was here also known as the good citizen, the genial neighbor and the Christian gentleman."[2]

Irving first came to know Tarrytown and Sleepy Hollow when a lad of fourteen or fifteen. He spent some of his holidays here, and formed an attachment for the spot which never left him. Irving was born on the 3d of April, 1783, in a house which stood on William Street, New York City, next to the corner of Fulton. He was the youngest son of William Irving, a merchant and native of Scotland, who had married an English lady. He had an ordinary school education, but early developed a taste for literature. At the age of sixteen he began the study of law. His brother, Dr. Peter Irving, edited the Morning Chronicle, and for this paper Washington Irving wrote a series of essays on the theatres, manners of the town and kindred topics, with the signature of Jonathan Oldstyle. In 1804 for the benefit of his health he visited the south of Europe, returning by way of Switzerland to France and proceeding thence after a sojourn of a few months in Paris to England via Flanders and Holland. While at Rome he formed the acquaintance of Washington Allston, the artist, with whom he studied painting for a time with the idea of himself becoming a painter. After an absence of two years, however, he returned to New York, in March, 1806, and again took up the study of law. He was admitted to the bar, but never practiced. About this time he wrote and published his portion of the "Salmagundi" papers, which appeared as a serial. Paulding wrote a portion of the work, William Irving the poetry and Washington Irving the remainder. In December, 1809, he published "Knickerbocker's History of New York," an extravagant burlesque, which excited general laughter, although it was gravely held up to reprehension in an address before the Historical Society of New York. Its grotesque descriptions of Dutch manners and customs in the colony of New Netherlands are full of humor. After the publication of this work Irving engaged as silent partner with two of his brothers in mercantile business. The second war with Great Britain breaking out, he joined the military staff of Governor Tompkins, with the rank of colonel. After the war he paid a visit to the British Islands, and intended to make a tour of the Continent, but business reverses involving the ruin of his firm compelled him to abandon his purpose. Irving now turned to literature for support, and through the friendly aid of Sir Walter Scott, secured the publication of the "Sketch Book" by Murray, the great English publisher, who bought the copyright for two hundred pounds, which he subsequently increased to four hundred pounds.

In 1820 Irving took up his residence in Paris, where he formed the acquaintance of Tom Moore. While in Paris he wrote "Bracebridge Hall." The winter of 1822 was spent in Dresden. Returning to Paris in 1823 he published, in December of the following year, his "Tales of a Traveller," for which he received from Murray the sum of £1500. In 1826, after spending a winter in the south of France, he went to Madrid, where he wrote his "Life of Columbus," the English edition of which brought him 3000 guineas. His "Conquest of Granada" and "Alhambra" followed. In July, 1829, having been appointed Secretary of Legation, at London, he left Spain for England. In 1831 he received, from the University of Oxford the degree of LL.D. After an absence of seventeen years he returned to America, in May, 1832. His arrival was commemorated by a public dinner in New York City, at which Chancellor Kent presided. A few months later he made a journey west of the Mississippi, which he described in his "Tour of the Prairies." In 1836 he published "Astoria" and subsequently the "Adventures of Captain Bonnevill." From 1839 for two years he contributed a series of papers to the Knickerbocker Magazine. A number of these papers, together with others, were published in 1855, in a volume which received the title "Woolfert's Roost."

In 1842 Irving was appointed Minister to Spain, an office which he retained for the next four years. He then returned home and for the rest of his life resided at his cottage residence "Sunnyside," near Tarrytown, the spot which he had described years before in the "Legend of Sleepy Hollow" as the castle of the Herr Van Tassel, and of which he wrote—"If ever I should wish for a retreat whither I might steal from the world and its distractions, and dream quietly away the remainder of a troubled life, I know of none more promising than this little valley." Here in this retreat he lived in the midst of a family circle composed of his brother and his nieces, hospitably entertaining his friends and engaged in writing his biographies of Goldsmith and Mahomet and his "Life of Washington."

His life at "Sunnyside" was simple, kindly and affectionate. He was a good friend and neighbor and a devout communicant at Christ Episcopal Church in Tarrytown. For many years he was a vestryman and warden, and it was his practice during the greater part of this time to take up the collection at the Sunday services. He never married, having lost by death his betrothed wife, Matilda Hoffman, a beautiful young girl. His death occurred at Tarrytown, November 28, 1859, and he was buried in the beautiful cemetery of Sleepy Hollow. The ivy upon the tower of Christ Church was taken from "Sunnyside" and planted by Irving himself. It was originally brought from Melrose Abbey. His pew in the church is marked with his name and was set apart years ago by the vestry for the use of any members of the Irving family who might wish to worship there. As near the pew as it could be placed is a mural tablet erected by the vestry to his memory. In the centre is the Irving coat of arms and on the stone the following inscription:

Washington Irving,

Born in the City of New York, April 3, 1783.

For many years a communicant and warden of this church,

And

Repeatedly one of its delegates to the Convention

Of the Diocese.

Loved, Honored, Revered.

He fell asleep in Jesus,

November 28th, 1859.

Irving died at "Sunnyside," having just taken leave of the family-circle. Three days later he was buried in the old Dutch Church cemetery, where he had some time before selected the spot for his grave, and where the remains of the brothers and sisters who had died before him were buried. An account of the funeral says: "It was a remarkable assemblage from the city, of men of worth and eminence, the friends of his youth and middle-life, and universally of the population of the town and adjacent country, where he was beloved by all. The area of Christ Church, Tarrytown, where the funeral services of the Episcopal Church, of which he had been a member, were performed, was much too limited to contain the numbers which thronged to the simple ceremony. The neighboring hillside was covered, and the road to the cemetery lined with spectators, villagers and others, clad in their Sunday attire. The shops of Tarrytown were all closed. Thus was borne to the grave with simple but heartfelt honors all that was mortal of Washington Irving. Eulogies, resolutions and addresses from civic, religious, literary and other societies followed his death. The city government of New York, the Athenæum Club, the New York Historical Society, the Massachusetts Historical Society, heaped these honors on his tomb, while personal tributes in sermons, editorial articles and various reminiscences were called forth in great number."

"By his will, says the same account, "which made ample provision to continue the home at 'Sunnyside' to the brother and nieces by whom Mr. Irving had been surrounded, he left his manuscripts to his nephew, Pierre M. Irving, who had been his assistant in some of his more important labors of research, as his literary executor." Mr. Irving afterwards published a memoir of his distinguished uncle. Mr. George P. Putnam, the New York publisher, issued a uniform edition of Washington Irving's works, in 1847, which yielded Mr. Irving and his representatives more than $150,000.

On the 3d of April, 1883, the centennial anniversary of Irving's birth was commemorated at Tarrytown by "The Washington Irving Association," which had been formed on the 19th of March for the purpose of appropriately observing the anniversary. The exercises took place on the evening of April 3d, at the Second Reformed Church. Judge Noah Davis presided, and from New York, Brooklyn and many adjacent points many came to swell the assemblage. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and evergreens. As a prelude to the addresses, Miss Hawes played the overture from the opera of "Rip Van Winkle" on the organ. Addresses were delivered by Judge Davis, Mr. James Wood, president of the Westchester County Historical Society; Rev. James Selden Spencer, Donald G. Mitchell, Charles Dudley Warner and Professor William C. Wilkinson. A poem by Mr. Stephen H. Thayer, of Tarrytown, was read by Rev. Washington Choate. Letters of regret from a number of invited guests were also read, among them being responses from Governor Cleveland, John G. Whittier, George William Curtis, John Jay and President Porter, of Yale. Miss Sears sang "The Lost Chord," and Professor T. S. Doolittle, D.D., pronounced the benediction. At the request of the committee of arrangements the Misses Irving opened "Sunnyside" to the public, and for several days persons from all parts of the country availed themselves of the opportunity to visit "Woolfert's Roost," which remained as it was at Mr. Irving's death. A memorial volume containing an account of the commemoration, with the addresses and poem, was afterwards published by the Irving Association. It is embellished by fine steel portraits of Irving and Matilda Hoffman and by views of "Sunnyside," Christ Church, the old mill in Sleepy Hollow and "Woolfert's Roost."

Among the literati of Westchester County the name of Henry B. Dawson suggests itself, at once, as among the most prominent of those identified with the work of historical research in America. Although not a native of the county, he has been so completely a part of its social and literary life for more than a generation, that he may justly be regarded as one of its representative men.

Henry Barton Dawson was born at Gosberton, in Lincolnshire, about ten miles southwest of Boston, England, on Friday, June 8, 1821. His father, Abraham Dawson, was born in July, 1795, at Wisbeach, in the neighboring county of Cambridge, where his grandfather, originally of Lincolnshire, was then residing. His father's mother, a Miss Culy, belonged to a family of French Huguenots, who lived on a farm called Guyhirn, near Wisbeach. His mother was Mary Barton, second daughter of John Barton, of the parish of Bicker, five miles north of Gosberton. Mr. Barton was a respectable farmer. His daughter, Mary, married Abraham Dawson, May 15, 1820.

Henry Barton Dawson was their only son and the eldest of six children. He received his first instruction from a school-mistress, who found him an apt and ready pupil. At nine years of age, having in the meantime had the care of the village school-master, he attended, for a year, the noted school of Mr. Moses of Donnington. The last school in his native county, at which he was taught, was kept by Mr. Greenfield, a pupil of Mr. Moses, who carried him through a course of practical surveying.

In the spring of 1834 his parents, with their family, removed from England to the United States. They landed at New York on the 9th of June in the same year. His father's chief reason for emigrating was his dissatisfaction with the British government. At Manhattanville, eight miles from New York, he established himself as a gardener, an occupation which he continued to pursue until a short time before his death, in January, 1872. Henry attended the public schools in West Seventeenth Street, New York, and at Manhattanville until the spring of 1836, except during the summer of 1835, when he was at work with his father. In March, 1836, he left school in order to assist his father, who was then gardener at the Bloomingdale Lunatic Asylum. Before he left the trustees of the Public School Society tendered him a free scholarship in college, but the limited means of his father would not admit of his acceptance. He continued to work in the garden of the asylum with his father until the fall of 1837, when the family removed to Ithaca, N. Y., with the intention of settling on a farm. His father, however, resumed his occupation of gardener, and Henry continued to assist him for a short time. He then became an apprentice to a wheel-wright, Mr. Ira Bower, and soon after a clerk in the book-selling and publishing house of Messrs. Mack, Andrus & Woodruff, at Ithaca. In the winter of 1838–39 he left the latter to take the position of confidential clerk for Judge Gere, a wealthy resident of the town, and in April, 1839, returned to New York, where his employer had established a large lumber-yard. His salary at this time was one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year. Mr. Dawson continued in this business, under successive employers, until May, 1844, when he was engaged by Messrs. Comstock & Co., of Cortlandt Street, large dealers in patent medicines, as book-keeper. He also performed the duties of their cashier and corresponding clerk. In June, 1846, he became book-keeper for Messrs. Cumming, Main & Co., druggists, with whom he remained one year.

Although Mr. Dawson had contributed articles for the daily press, generally on political topics, as early as the winter of 1840, his first pecuniary venture in literature was brought about in a rather singular way. Having, in 1845, while still employed by Comstock & Co., advanced some money to the proprietor of The Crystal Fount, a weekly temperance and literary newspaper, he was obliged to take the printing-office and paper in repayment of his loan. For more than a year he edited and published the paper besides discharging his duties as book-keeper, and finding the work too burdensome, he finally, in 1846, gave up his position with Cumming, Main & Co., and devoted all his time to the newspaper. In November of the same year he was obliged to discontinue its publication with the loss, not only of the original loan, but also of all his savings. The paper was the organ of the Order of the Rechabites, and Mr. Dawson's uncompromising spirit having involved him in difficulties with the principal officers of the order, the paper suffered from the enmities thus aroused.

Mr. Dawson next accepted the agency of the International Art Union, and in the following year, that of the American Art Union, which latter he retained until the concern was closed by the Supreme Court. After this he was an officer of the Wall Street Ferry to Brooklyn, and was successively connected with three different insurance companies in New York. In 1856, owing to the failure of the company of which he was secretary, he was again left without employment, and accepted an offer from Messrs. Johnson, Fry & Co., Publishers, to write a work for them on the military and naval history of this country. This was his first book, although he had already become known among historical writers, by "The Park and its Vicinity," written for and published in the "Manual of the Common Council of the City of New York" for 1855; the "Life and Times of Anne Hutchinson," written for the Baptist Historical Society; and "The Retreats through Westchester County, in 1776," written for the New York Historical Society.

"The Battles of the United States by Sea and Land," which is the title of the military and naval work, written for Messrs. Johnson, Fry & Co., was published, as a serial, in forty numbers, the first number appearing in the autumn of 1858. Besides its merits as a popular work, it is of recognized value as an historical authority, the events of each battle being given in detail with copious references, the principal documents relating to the engagement, and, occasionally, biographical sketches of the prominent actors. The success of the work was so decided that he undertook to write a complete military history of the United States, but the Civil War stopped the work as it also did the progress of the "Life and Times of Governor Daniel D. Tompkins," which he had undertaken at the request of the family.

While writing the "Battles," he became involved in a controversy concerning the merits of Major General Israel Putnam, with Messrs. Griswold and Deming, of Hartford, Conn., in the Daily Post of that city. The correspondence attracted the attention of scholars throughout the entire country, the Legislature of Connecticut being led by it to take special action on the subject; and the letters were subsequently collected and published in a handsome volume, copies of which have commanded prices as high as fifty dollars each.

In 1862 Mr. Dawson was enabled to make a complete transcript of the receipts and disbursements of moneys for the municipal purposes of the city of New York, during the entire occupation of that city by the Royal Army, 1776 to 1783, together with all the military orders on which those receipts and disbursements rested, and all the vouchers of the auditors appointed by the successive Commanders-in-chief through whom those accounts were settled.

As none of these were previously known and as the Finance Department of the city needed only these to make the financial records of the city complete from a very early period, this work of Mr. Dawson was welcomed by the city authorities as few such works have ever been welcomed. The mayor honored it by sending it to the common council with a special message; and the latter spread not only the message, but the entire financial and historical statement made by Mr. Dawson on its Minutes, made a liberal appropriation for his compensation; gave to him an official vote of thanks, a copy of which elegantly engrossed and framed ornaments his dining-room; and gave to him, also, the unusual privilege of copying and publishing any of its ancient records and files which he should, at any time, desire to employ.

Mr. Dawson's edition of the "Fœderalist" was the first of a projected series of historical works upon the Constitution of the United States, to be completed in seven octavo volumes, namely, "the Fœderalist," two volumes; "the Anti-Fœderalist, two volumes, which were to consist of contemporary articles written against the adoption of the Constitution; and a "History of the Constitution," an original work, written by Mr. Dawson, three volumes. Other engagements, however, prevented him from completing a work which would doubtless have proved a most important contribution to the political literature of the United States.

In 1863 the first volume of Mr. Dawson's edition of "The Fœderalist" appeared. The distinguishing feature of this edition was the restoration of the original text and the rejection of unauthorized mutilations. Prefixed was an historical and bibliographical introduction, giving a careful review of the political condition of the State of New York in 1787; an account of the causes which led its authors to write the series of articles of which the work is composed; the names of the writers of the several articles; a list of the different editions which Mr. Dawson had found; and a very elaborate analysis of "The Fœderalist" itself. The peculiar merit of that edition of this celebrated work was recognized by Harvard University, Williams College and several others, as well as by the Board of Education in the city of New York, all of whom added it to their respective lists of text-books; by the leading scholars of that period, led by the venerable Joshua Quincy, and by the Attorney General and the Secretary of State of the United States, each of whom adopted it as the edition of "The Fœderalist," which should, thenceforth, be used in their respective offices.

The publication of "The Fœderalist" called forth an attack on the volume and its editor by the Hon. John Jay, grandson of one of the authors of the original work and more recently United States minister to Austria-Hungary. It was also assailed by the venerable James A. Hamilton, son of Alexander Hamilton, another of its authors. These articles were printed in the New York Evening Post, and created much excitement among the politicians and historians. Mr. Dawson replied to each and the controversy proved highly interesting. The intercourse between Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Dawson was afterwards resumed and their personal relations were perfectly friendly until the death of the former.

In 1863 Mr. Dawson also published his work on "The Assault of Stoney Point by General Anthony Wayne." It was an elegant volume, illustrated by maps and fac-similes. The germ of the work was a paper read April 1, 1862, before the New York and Pennsylvania Historical Societies. In preparing it he had the use of the correspondence and other family papers of General Wayne himself.

In 1864 Mr. Dawson reprinted the "Fœderalist Correspondence" with John Jay and James A. Hamilton as the first number of a protracted series entitled, "Current Fictions Tested by Uncurrent Facts." In the following year he published "The Diary of David Dow," a soldier of the Revolution, which, like all of Mr. Dawson's publications, was exhaustively annotated, and an edition of Dring's "Recollections of the Jersey Prison-Ship," which was published originally at Providence, R. I., in 1829, being compiled from Mr. Dring's manuscripts by Albert Gorton Greene, the well-known scholar and poet. The value of the work was greatly enhanced by the addition of an elaborate appendix prepared by Mr. Dawson.

A new edition of "The Park and its Vicinity" has been printed as No. I. of his "Gleanings in the Harvest Field of American History," but has not been published. Several of his works already mentioned had been issued as numbers in this series—namely, the "Diary of David How" as No. IV.; "Putnam Correspondence" as No. V., and "Stoney Point" as No. XI. The series is elegantly printed, in uniform style, royal octavo, and the editions are all limited. Besides these various works Mr. Dawson has written a paper on "The Sons of Liberty in New York;" one on "The Battle of Harlem Heights," and one on "The City of New York on Sunday Morning, April 23, 1775," all of them for the New York Historical Society; one on the "Battle of Bennington" for the Vermont Historical Society; and one on the "Battle of Long Island" for the Long Island Historical Society, together with several minor tracts, and numerous articles for periodicals with which he has had no editorial connection; and he edited, in 1861, for the Mercantile Library Association of New York City a volume of original papers, generally of the Revolutionary War, to which he added voluminous notes. The introduction to the last-named volume, which bore the title of "New York City During the American Revolution," attracted much attention, since it contained a carefully prepared and minute description of the city as it was at that early period, as if written at the time and by one who was personally acquainted with every part of it, and with the principal persons who lived there. Like the greater number of Mr. Dawson's works this volume was printed in elegant form for private circulation, and commands very high prices when copies are thrown on the market. In 1866 he edited the official "Record of the Trial of Joshua Hett Smith, Esq.,, for Alleged Complicity in the Treason of Benedict Arnold," of which only fifty copies were printed; and five large octavo volumes of selections from the Historical Magazine, bearing the general title of "The Magazine Miscellany," and elegantly printed in an edition of only twenty-five copies, have also appeared under his editorial supervision.

In the spring of 1865, Mr. Dawson was invited to take the editorial charge of The Gazette, a Democratic newspaper, published weekly at Yonkers, N. Y., which invitation he accepted. During the eleven months of his connection with the Gazette, he gave a new character to the publication, and proved himself an able controversialist and critic. His last number appeared on the 31st of March, 1866. The historical and bibliographical material with which he occupied the first page of the Gazette, at once commanded attention from the leading men of the country. Judge Nelson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, ordered a great case to be re-argued, in order that articles bearing on it, which had appeared in the Gazette after the case had been argued, could be judicially admitted as authorities before the decision of the court was given; and it is said that the authoritative character of those articles, which were from Mr. Dawson's pen, were seen in the decision of the court given by that distinguished jurist. In Brodhead's "History of the State of New York," and in other works of equally high character, the historical articles which Mr. Dawson prepared for The Gazette, were repeatedly referred to as standard authorities. Odd numbers of the Gazette of that period are eagerly sought, and command high prices; files of it are bound and carefully preserved in the state and historical society's libraries; and it is known that, during the past year, fifteen dollars were paid for an unbound file of it for the twelve months during which Mr. Dawson was its editor.

Four volumes of selections from the more important articles in the Gazette have been printed under the general title of the "Gazette Series." The titles of the several volumes are: vol. i. "Papers concerning the capture and detention of Major John Andre," collected by Henry B. Dawson, Yonkers, N. Y., 1866; vol. ii., "Papers concerning the boundary between the States of New York and New Jersey," written by several hands, Yonkers, 1866; vol. iii., "Papers concerning the town and village of Yonkers, Westchester County," a fragment, by Henry

B. Dawson, Yonkers, 1866; vol. iv., "Rambles in Westchester County," a fragment, by Henry B. Dawson, Yonkers, 1866. The authors of the articles in vol. ii. were General John Cochrane, Attorney-General of New York; Hon. J. Romeyn Brodhead, (two articles); William A. Whitehead, of Newark, in reply to the last; Mr. Dawson himself, who endeavored to act as umpire between the two; Mr. Whitehead, in reply to Mr. Dawson; Mr. Dawson, in reply to Mr. Whitehead; and the Attorney-General of New York in closing the argument. The correspondence closes with a postscript by Mr. Dawson. The volume was subsequently printed for the use of the United States Court in one of the boundary suits; and the arguments and evidence which Mr. Dawson presented in his articles, are said to have influenced Judge Nelson in determining the case for New York. The Andre volume is probably the most perfect "Andreana" in print. The series of volumes has been sold at one hundred dollars for the set, the edition being very small, only twenty-six copies having been printed.

A month or two after dissolving his relations with the Gazette, Mr. Dawson purchased The Historical Magazine, of which he became the editor and publisher. His first number was that for July, 1866. Ten volumes having been completed at the end of the year, he began in January, 1867, a new and enlarged series of the work giving double the number of pages and making two volumes in a year. As editor of this publication Mr. Dawson has achieved wide reputation among literary people, and especially among the students of every branch of American history. The magazine became a mine of historical information, and continues to be regarded as one of the standard references of American literature.

In 1868 the "Manual of the New York Common Council" passed into the editorial care of the new clerk, Joseph Shannon, and his deputy, F. J. Twomey. It now began to be issued in an enlarged and improved form. Mr. Dawson, on invitation, furnished the historical material and added some new features to the work. The Charter of the city was collated by him, critically, with the ancient parchments, and was first printed accurately in the manual. Mr. Dawson also furnished an elaborate paper on the battle of Harlem Heights and the death of Colonel Knowlton. The State authorities of New York subsequently employed him to examine and report on the boundaries of that state on the lines of New Jersey, Massachusetts and Connecticut; and the vestry of Trinity Church, New York, invited him to become the historian of that ancient and noted parish. Mr. Dawson did nothing under either of these requests, but his selection indicates the estimation in which he is held as an authority on historical questions relating to New York.

Mr. Dawson has long conducted an extensive correspondence with literary people and conspicuous actors in public events. He has been elected a resident member of the New York Historical Society, the American Institute, and the American Geographical and Statistical Society; an honorary member by the Minnesota and the New England Methodist Historical Societies, and a corresponding member by the Massachusetts, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Wisconsin, Chicago, and New England Historic-Genealogical, the Long Island, the Oneida and the Cayuga County Historical Societies; and also by the Worcester (Massachusetts) Society of Antiquity, the American Statistical Association and the Albany Institute.

Mr. Dawson possesses a fine library on American history—the result of many years of historical inquiry, and undoubtedly one of the most valuable collections, for practical purposes, in the country. Not only on the special subjects of which he has written, but in the general field of American history, Mr. Dawson's searching and retentive intellect has stored up a mass of most valuable information, in the use of which he is skilled by long practice to such an extent as to make him one of the most formidable of controversialists.

In religious opinion he is a resolute and uncompromising Calvinistic Baptist; and in politics an old-fashioned "States-rights Democrat." He voted for Polk for President in 1844, and attached himself to that wing of the Democratic party known as the "Barnburners," which, in 1848, assisted in forming the Free Soil party. During the Presidential canvass of that year, he was a member of the New York City committee of that party, and in 1849 was on the "general committee" of the city—what was known as "the old men's committee"—of which S. J. Tilden, B. F. Butler, ex-Attorney-General of the United States, Wilson G. Hunt, George H. Purser, Mark Spencer, Anthony J. Bleecker, John Van Buren, David Dudley Field, Lucius Robinson, Nelson J. Waterbury and other well-known politicians were members. He adhered to the Free Soil party and its successor, the Republican party, till the War of Secession, to the last-named, however, not as a "Republican," but as "a Democrat opposed to the administration." Since the close of the War he has been, as he maintains he had been before the War, a Democrat and a rigid opponent of centralized power both in State and Federal government.

Mr. Dawson was married May 28, 1845, to Catherine, daughter of Abraham D. and Esther (Whelpley) Martling, of Tarrytown, Westchester County, N. Y., one of the oldest families of the county. They have had nine children—1, Spencer H. C., born May 11, 1846, died July 9, 1871; 2, Henry B., Jr., born December 19, 1847, died March 10, 1876; 3, William Martling, born August 27, 1849; 4, Stephen Van Rensselaer, born September 21, 1851; 5, George Cooley, born September 25, 1853, married Mary Kate Dean November 16, 1881; 6, Mary Dawson, born June 17, 1855, married William H. Halsey July 6, 1875; 7, Catherine Martling, born April 9, 1859; 8, Esther Martling, born July 17, 1861, died March 16, 1865; and 9, Caroline Dutcher, born August 31, 1863, died April 22, 1880. They have also had an adopted daughter, Anna Augusta, born October 30, 1851, who died May 31, 1878.

James Kirke Paulding, the friend of Irving and his associate in the production of the Salmagundi papers, was of Westchester extraction, though a native of Dutchess County. His grandfather, many years previous to the Revolution, settled in Westchester County on a farm at Tarrytown, still in possession of his descendants. The family removed to a tract of land in Dutchess County which had been granted them by King William III. This change was made in consequence of the fact that the Paulding residence being "within the lines," that is in the district intervening between the British Army at New York and the American forces in the Highlands, and the Pauldings being Whigs they were exposed to the depredations of the British troops and their Tory allies. Paulding was born at a place called Pleasant Valley in Dutchess County, August 22, 1779. His father was a leader of the Whig party in the county of Westchester, a member of the first committee of safety and subsequently Commissary General of the New York quota of troops. He was financially ruined by furnishing the army with supplies obtained on his personal credit for which he could obtain no compensation from the government.

After the close of the war, the family returned to their former home in Westchester, and Paulding was educated at the village school—a log house nearly two miles distant from his residence. Here he received all the education he ever obtained from tuition. On arriving at manhood in 1800 he removed to New York City, staying at first with Washington Irving's brother, William, who had married Paulding's sister. His first attempts in literature were his contributions to the Salmagundi papers. At the beginning of the War of 1812 he published a clever satire on the policy of England toward America with the title of "The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan" which was reprinted in one of the English journals. Following this was "The Lay of the Scottish Fiddle," a parody of the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," in which he satirized the predatory warfare of the British on the Chesapeake Bay, and described the burning and sacking of Havre-de-Grace at the mouth of the Susquehanna by Admiral Cockburn's fleet. It was republished in London in handsome style with a complimentary preface and provoked a fierce review from the London Quarterly. He next published "The United States and England," a strong defense of this country against the strictures of the Quarterly, which attracted the notice of President Madison. In 1815 he published his "Letters From the South by a Northern Man," written after a visit to Virginia, and in 1818 his principal poetical work "The Backwoodsman." He next published the novel "Konigsmark," or, as it was afterwards called, "Old Times in the New World," the scene of which is laid amongst the early Swedish settlers on the Delaware. These were followed by a number of tales and sketches and his "Life of Washington," prepared chiefly for the more youthful class of readers. In 1836 he published a defence of slavery under the title "Slavery in the United States." Most of his works were republished by Harper & Brothers in a uniform edition in 1835. Paulding was thoroughly American in spirit and feeling, and his writings did much to confirm and strengthen in the popular mind the sentiments of patriotism engendered by the Revolution and the war of 1812. Their value was recognized officially by his appointment in 1814 or 1815 as secretary of the Board of Navy Commissioners, then first established. He was transferred several years later to the post of Navy Agent for the port of New York, which he retained for twelve years under different administrations and resigned to accept the position at the head of the Navy Department, under the administration of President Van Buren. Upon the accession of President Harrison to office, he resigned and soon afterwards retired to a pleasant residence, "Hyde Park," on the east bank of the Hudson in the county of Dutchess, where he spent the closing years of his life. He died in the eighty-second year of his age, on the 6th of April 1860. The "Literary Life of James K. Paulding," by his son, William Irving Paulding, was published in 1867.

Near the road leading from West Farms to Hunt's Point, on the sound and on the edge of the marshes which border the Bronx River, stands an ancient burial place in which repose the remains of Joseph Rodman Drake, the poet who charmed the senses of thousands with the music of "The Culprit Fay," and strung the patriotic feelings of Americans to the highest tension when his muse sung of the national glory. Dying at the age of twenty-five, his was a life of promise cut short long before the maturity of his gifts could be reached. All readers know that he forever celebrated the rural beauties of the Bronx in some of his daintiest verse, and it was proper that he should be laid to rest near its banks. But whatever fitness there might have been in the selection of his burial place is lost in the neglect into which it was afterward permitted to fall. One who visited it in 1865 [1] gave a most depressing description of its forsaken and desolate appearance. The entire inclosure was covered with briers, weeds and rank grass, which grew thickly around the poet's monument. This was a neat marble shaft, eight feet high, bearing the inscription,— to the memory of

"Sacred
Joseph R. Drake, M.D., who died Sept. 21st, 1820,
Aged 25 years.
None knew him but to love him,
Nor named him but to praise."

The salt marsh surrounded the knoll on which the cemetery is laid out and the Bronx at that point is but a lazily flowing stream. At the rate of decay then in progress the people of a few generations later would be compelled to refer to books and maps to know where the grave of Drake was situated.

J. Rodman Drake was born in New York City, August 7, 1795. He studied medicine under Dr. Nicholas Romayne, and shortly afterwards married Sarah, the daughter of Henry Eckford, a connection that placed him in affluent circumstances. The youthful couple took a trip to Europe, but Drake's health soon after failed, and, after spending the winter of 1819 in New Orleans, in the hope of regaining it, he returned to New York fatally smitten with consumption, dying on September 21, 1820, at the age of twenty-five.

Drake was a poet from his boyhood. Some of his youthful compositions have been preserved and show great fluency and aptness of expression. In March, 1819, he published the first of the famous "Croakers," the verses to "Ennui," which were written in conjunction with his friend, Halleck. "The Culprit Fay" was written to refute an assertion, by Fenimore Cooper and Halleck, that the rivers of this country furnished no such romantic associations as the Scottish streams for purposes of poetical composition. The scene is laid in the highlands of the Hudson, but the chief associations relate to salt water, "the poet drawing his inspiration from his familiar haunt on the Sound, at Hunt's Point." "The Culprit Fay" is an exquisite creation of the fancy and will always retain for its author a niche in the gallery of American poets. A selection of his poems, including "The Culprit Fay," was made, and published in 1836, by his only child, the wife of Commodore McKay.

Edgar Allan Poe, wrote some of his most noted productions while a resident of Westchester County, including the famous "Raven". Although he was very poor during most of the time, this was probably the brightest period of his melancholy life; for he was happier in the companionship of his wife, the lovely Virginia Clemm, and her mother, than at any other stage of his chequered career. His wife's death, after a residence in the county of about three years, was a sad blow to the poet's sensitive organization; but it is pleasant to think that the sweetest as well as the saddest memories of his "dear heart" his "dear Virginia," were associated with the charming landscapes of Morrisania and Fordham. Poe was nearly thirty-four years old when, in the autumn of 1844, he removed to New York City from Philadelphia. Born in Boston, in January 1811, his early life was as chequered and eventful as his manhood was dark and stormy. The Poe family was one of the oldest and most respectable in Maryland. Edgar's grandfather was a quartermaster-general in the Continental Army and the friend of Lafayette. His father while a law student fell in love with a beautiful actress, Elizabeth Arnold, and went on the stage. He was discarded by his family, and he and his wife died within a few weeks of each other in Richmond, Va., leaving three children, Henry, Edgar and Rosalie, in a state of destitution. Edgar was adopted by Mr. John Allan, a wealthy merchant of Richmond, from whom he derived his middle name. Mr. and Mrs. Allan treated him with great kindness, and after a tour of the British Islands in 1816, placed him at school at Stoke Newington near London, where he remained four or five years. In 1822 he returned to Richmond, and in 1825 was entered as a student at the University of Virginia. His life at the University was marked by many youthful excesses, which finally resulted in his expulsion. He was very much in debt and upon Mr. Allan's refusal to satisfy the claims of some of his creditors he quarreled with his benefactor and set out to join the Greeks, who were then in the midst of their war with Turkey. After wandering in Europe for about a year, he finally made his way to St. Petersburg where he became involved in a quarrel with the Russian authorities, from which he was extricated through the kind offices of the American minister, Mr. Middleton. Returning to America he was again taken into favor by Mr. Allan, who sent him to West Point, where his conduct was so irregular that in ten months after his admission he was cashiered. He was again received into Mr. Allan's family but another rupture ensued, in consequence, it is said, of Poe's uncivil behavior toward Mr. Allan's second wife. Mr. Allan died a few years latter, leaving Poe nothing.

Thrown upon his own resources, Poe turned to literature for support. In 1829, he had published in

[1] Hist. Mag., Feby., 1872.

Baltimore a volume of poems, "Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane and Minor Poems," which had been received with favor. He seems to have had but little difficulty in obtaining employment from magazines and newspapers, but the pay was meagre. In despair he enlisted in the army and then deserted. Luckily for him, in 1833 he entered the competition for prizes offered by the Baltimore Saturday Visitor for a story and a poem. He was awarded both prizes but was subsequently excluded from the second prize and only given that for the story. His story was the "MSS. found in a Bottle" and his poem "The Coliseum." His productions attracted the notice of John P. Kennedy, the novelist, who befriended him and finally secured him employment on the Southern Literary Messenger. This may be said to have been the beginning of Poe's literary career. In 1835, he was made editor of that publication at a salary of five hundred dollars per annum and removed to Richmond, where he married his cousin, Virginia Clemm.

THE HOUSE IN WHICH POE WROTE "THE RAVEN."

In January, 1837, he left Richmond and returned to Baltimore, whence he proceeded to Philadelphia and New York. In Philadelphia he obtained employment as a contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine, and in May, 1839, was made its editor. In the following year he took charge of Graham's Magazine. In the spring of 1843, he wrote "The Gold Bug," for which he received a prize of one hundred dollars. He had previously written a number of critical papers and stories, among them "The Mystery of Marie Roget." In the autumn of 1844 he removed to New York. His residence at first was on what is now Eighty-fourth Street. The house, a large bleak structure, stands on a rocky elevation. It is said to have sheltered Washington and some of his generals in the days of the Revolution. The front windows command the Boulevard (formerly Bloomingdale Road) and the new Riverside Park. The Hudson is seen through the trees, with the lofty Palisades beyond, a view still meet for the poet, and far more picturesque and beautiful when Poe looked upon it. Poe was often seen walking along the banks of the river, and he and his wife no doubt were wont to sit at the western window and watch the decline of the sun as it sank to rest behind the embattled front of the Palisades. The room formerly occupied by Poe and in which "The Raven" was written, is an apartment of moderate size, on the second floor of the house. Its windows look out upon the Hudson. The mantel, a relic of by-gone days, is of wood, curiously carved and painted in imitation of ebony. Here, before the old fashioned fire-place, the poet sat and dreamed his wonderful dreams, the weirdest of which, perhaps, is embodied in "The Raven."

Poe's next place of residence was Fordham. In the winter of 1846, says one of his biographers, he was living in extreme destitution at Fordham. In the meantime he had been employed by Willis & Morris, as critic and assistant editor of The Mirror, a position which he retained about six months, and as associate editor with C. F. Briggs of The Broadway Journal. The latter publication ceased in January, 1846, and Poe then began a series of papers, "The Literati of New York City," which were published in The Lady's Book. Their pungency and personality created for him many enemies. His troubles now began to thicken. His wife's health, which had always been delicate, was failing rapidly and Poe was subjected to the agony of seeing her fading, day by day, without the means at hand to minister properly to her comfort. His necessities were finally made known by some friendly hand in the newspapers and a subscription was raised in his behalf. But, although his sufferings were extreme, he must have had many gleams of happiness in the little old-fashioned cottage at Fordham. It is a quaint little structure, a story and a half high, with a white shingled gable-end toward the street and a porch on one side. It is perched on the top of a hill and is surrounded by old fruit-trees, mossy stone walls and thickets of brambles and flowers. In one of his papers on the Literati, Poe severely criticised Dr. Thomas Dunn English, who retorted in a personal article which was reproduced in the Evening Mirror. Poe thereupon sued for libel and recovered from the Mirror several hundred dollars, with which he refitted his cottage. His life at this time was one of singular domestic tranquillity and sweetness. His mother-in-law, Mrs. Clemm, who seems to have been much attached to him, watched over him with tender kindness and solicitude, and managed the affairs of the little household with great skill and prudence. Poe's affection for his wife and her mother is the one bright spot in his sombre life. In a tender letter of June 12, 1846, to his wife he speaks of Mrs. Clemm as "our mother," and declares that his "dear Virginia" is his "greatest and only stimulus now, to battle with this uncongenial, unsatisfactory and ungrateful life." Nearly all the personal reminiscences of Poe which tell of his life at Fordham are of a bright and pleasing character. One of his friends describes his wife as looking very young. "She had large, black eyes and a pearly whiteness of complexion which was a perfect pallor. The pale face, her brilliant eyes and her raven hair gave her an unearthly look. One felt that she was almost a disrobed spirit, and when she coughed it was made certain that she was rapidly passing away." Mrs. Clemm, we are told, "was a tall, dignified old lady with a most lady-like manner, and her black dress, though old and much worn, looked really elegant on her." The same informant says, "the cottage had an air of taste and gentility that must have been lent it by the presence of its inmates. So neat, so poor, so unfurnished, and yet so charming a dwelling I never saw."

A short distance back of the cottage there is a rocky elevation, crowned with cedars. It overlooks a pleasant landscape and the hills of Long Island in the distance. Tradition asserts that this was a favorite spot of Poe's, and here, perhaps, he wove in his brain the ideas which found expression in "Eureka," "Annabel Lee," "For Annie" and "Ulalume," all of which were written while he lived at Fordham. Another favorite resort was the Aqueduct pathway, leading from High Bridge to Fordham.

A recently published description of the cottage and its surroundings says: "Two years ago the place was sold at public auction, under foreclosure, and it was bid in for five thousand seven hundred dollars. The unpaid taxes and accrued interest amounted to something more than that. From the railroad station the road winds up the Fordham hill to the cottage, with the native rock as a pavement. The cottage seems no more than a little paint-box, shingled on the sides as well as the roof, and covered with vines on which the foliage is now appearing. It is only a few feet from the road, but in summer is almost obscured by the trees. Within, the rooms are more spacious than they appear from the road. A cherry-tree planted by Poe, now vigorous and thrifty, shades a pleasant porch. There are two good-sized rooms, a bed-room and a kitchen on the lower floor. In the front room Virginia, Poe's invalid wife, lay through her sickness, and died. On the upper floor there are three rooms, one of them quite large. The old-fashioned chimney passes through it, affording an old-time fireplace, which in winter, when filled with crackling wood, would be a cheerful place. It was a favorite room with the poet, and here he wrote "Ulalume" and "Eureka."

EDGAR ALLAN POE'S HOME AT FORDHAM.

"Poe moved to Fordham from Amity Street. Washington Square was then the centre of the fine residences of the city, and his house in Amity Street, into which he moved when the 'Raven' had brought him a reputation, was only a short distance from the square. He had been engaged on the Evening Mirror at a salary of ten dollars a week, and in a suit against the paper for libel, after resigning his position, he secured a verdict and obtained several hundred dollars. With this money he secured the Fordham cottage, at a rental of one hundred dollars a year, furnished it and removed there with his wife and her mother, Mrs. Clemm, who remained there until Poe's death in 1849. The grounds, comprising about two acres, are as interesting as the house, and have associations reaching back to Revolutionary times, when this neighborhood was a part of the 'neutral ground' and the field of Cooper's 'Spy.' The lawn slopes into a grassy hollow. A massive ledge of blue-gray rock overlooks the valley at the height of a hundred feet and forms the eastern wall of the place. The site is said to have been occupied at one time by a British battery. Now a tennis club, composed of young men and women of Fordham, meets on the lawn in summer. The rocky ledge commands a view of the Long Island hills in purple background and against the horizon. In the growth of the city it is likely to become one of the choice sites for residences.

"The place rents for four hundred dollars a year. For several years it has been occupied by Mrs. E. D. Dechert, the widow of an engineer who drew many of the plans of Central Park, and afterward most of the avenues and drives of Fordham. A few of those who knew Poe and his family are still living in the neighborhood. One of these was his nearest neighbor, Mrs. Reuben Cromwell, then a young girl. She said recently that the first time she saw Poe he was up in a cherry-tree picking the fruit, and his wife stood beneath the tree. 'He was a nice-looking young man,' continued Mrs. Cromwell, 'and sociable.' His wife had come out here to get the good air, he said, and to dig in the ground and get well. But she was too thin and weak to dig. She soon became ill and never came out until she was buried. Her mother they called Muddie, and Mr. Poe they always called Eddie. They were awful poor; poorer than I ever want to be.

"Mrs. Cromwell describes going over to the house the morning that she heard of Poe's death. Mrs. Clemm was packing his things, having received a letter from him the day before, in which he wrote of his intended marriage to a Baltimore lady, and said that he would come on for her. She was overcome when informed of his death, and was sure that he would not have died had she been there to 'nurse him in his bad spell.' The neighbors raised money to enable her to go to Baltimore. Poe had not paid any rent for several months, and Mrs. Clemm afterwards returned and sold their few effects. Among these Mrs. Cromwell obtained the family Bible, a rocking-chair and a clock, which she still retained as relics of her distinguished but unfortunate neighbor."

In January, 1847, Poe's wife died and was buried in the church-yard of the old Dutch Church, on the King's Bridge road, about half a mile to the westward of the cottage. She was laid in the vault belonging to the Valentine family, who owned the cottage which Poe rented. In 1878 the remains were taken to Baltimore, to be placed beside those of her devoted "Edgar," and the vault itself has now disappeared. After the death of his wife, Poe's sister, Rosalie, came to live with him at Fordham. Poe continued to reside in the cottage until June, 29, 1849, when he started forth on the journey which terminated in his death. Before leaving, he arranged his papers and instructed Mrs. Clemm as to what disposition to make of them in case he died. After spending some time in Richmond he started on his return to New York, but got no farther than Baltimore when he was taken ill, and died in an infirmary on the 7th of October, 1849, at the age of thirty-eight.

Rev. Daniel Curry, D.D., the clergyman and author, was born near Peekskill, November 26, 1809; graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1837, and in the same year became principal of the Troy Conference Academy, at West Poultney, Vermont. In 1839 he became a professor in the Georgia Female College at Macon, and in 1841 entered the Georgia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He filled pastoral charges at Athens, Savannah and Columbus, and in 1844 was transferred to the New York Conference where he continued to engage in pastoral work until 1854, when he was chosen president of the Indiana Asbury University, at Greencastle, Indiana. After three years he returned to New York and in 1864 was elected editor of the Christian Advocate, at New York. He was re-elected in 1868 and 1872, and in 1876 became the editor of the Ladies' Repository of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Curry has written much for the periodicals of his church in addition to the articles which he gave to his regular editorial work. He has published a "Life of Wyckliff," "The Metropolitan City of America," and a "Life of Bishop Davis W. Clark," and has edited the writings of the late Rev. Dr. James Floy, and an edition of Southey's "Life of Wesley."

Rev. Robert Baird, D.D., the author and philanthropist, spent the closing hours of his busy life in Westchester County, dying at Yonkers on the 15th of March, 1863. Born in Fayette Co., Pennsylvania, in 1798, he was graduated at Jefferson College in 1818, and received the degree of D.D. in 1842. From 1835 to 1843 he was the most part of the time in Europe, striving to revive the Protestant faith in the south of the continent, and to promote the cause of temperance in the North. He published a number of valuable works. His son, Professor Henry M. Baird, D.D., LL.D., of Yonkers, professor of Greek in the University of New York, is a distinguished scholar and historian. He has published a book of travels entitled, "Modern Greece," and more recently a "History of the Rise of the Huguenots of France," 2 vols. 8vo., which has taken rank among the more important historical works of the day.

REV. DANIEL CURRY, D.D.

Another son, Rev. Charles W. Baird, D.D., is the author of two chapters of this work, the histories of the the towns of Rye and Harrison, and is a distinguished literateur. He was born in Princeton, N. J., August 28, 1828, and was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1848 and at the Union Theological Seminary in 1852. He was ordained for the ministry and in 1852–54 was the American chaplain in Rome, Italy. In 1859–61 he was the minister at the Reformed Dutch Church on Bergen Hill, Brooklyn, N. Y., and since May 9, 1861, has been pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Rye, N. Y. Dr. Baird has written "Eutaxia: Historical Sketches," New York, 1855; "A Book of Public Prayer," New York, 1857; "History of Rye, N. Y.," 1870; "History of Bedford Church," 1882; "History of the Huguenot Emigration to America," 2 vols., 1885.

Elias Cornelius, D.D., the educator and missionary, was born at Somers in 1794, graduated at Yale College in 1813 and died at Hartford, Conn., February 12, 1832. In early life he studied theology and in 1816 visited the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians as a missionary. In 1818 he went to New Orleans in the employ of the Missionary Society of Connecticut. In July, 1819, he was installed with Dr. Worcester at Salem, but upon being appointed, in September, 1826, secretary of the American Educational Society he was dismissed. He contributed to the Quarterly Journal and published the reports of his educational society.

His father was surgeon's mate of Colonel Angell's regiment during the Revolution, and at one time an inmate of the "Jersey" prison-ship. He died at Somers, June 13, 1823, aged sixty-five years.

Among the eminent men who, after having made high reputations for themselves in other localities, selected Yonkers as the home of their advanced life, is Professor William Holmes Chambers Bartlett. For more than forty years he was identified with the United States Military Academy at West Point, first as a cadet, and subsequently as Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy. The leading particulars of his life, obtained in outline from Cullum's "Register of the Officers and Graduates" of the academy, with such details as we have been able to gather from other sources, are as follows:

Professor Bartlett was born in Pennsylvania in September, 1804, but as his parents removed immediately after his birth to St. Louis, Missouri, his childhood and youth were passed in the latter State, and it was from it that he was in due time sent to West Point. His parents were poor, and as there were then no schools at the West, he had no home advantages for education. Attracting, however, the notice of Missouri men who were able to command the influence of Senator Thomas H. Benton, an appointment was procured for him as a cadet. He was received at West Point on the 1st of July, 1822, at seventeen years and eight months of age, stood at the head of his class through his whole four years of study, and was graduated at its head on the 1st of July, 1826, having served as Acting Assistant Professor of Mathematics during the last two years of his course. From August 30, 1826, to August 30, 1829, he continued to be employed at the academy, first as Assistant Professor, and later as Principal Assistant Professor of Engineering. In 1828 he took part as assistant engineer in the construction of Fortress Monroe, Va., and from 1829 to 1832 was engaged in the construction of Fort Adams, Newport Harbor, R. I. From 1832 to 1834 he was assistant to the chief engineer at Washington, D. C. In the latter year he returned to the Point, and became Acting Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy. To the full professorship in this department he finally received an appointment from General Jackson in 1836, and continued to fill the position until 1871, when he resigned and was appointed colonel in the regular army on the retired list. The instrument by which he was appointed to his professorship in 1836 is still in his possession. It was forwarded to General Cass, and sent by him, through his son, to Professor Bartlett. It was as follows:

"I hereby appoint Second Lieut. William H. C. Bartlett, of the Corps of Engineers, Prof. of Nat. and Exper. Philosophy (vice Courtney resigned.

(Signed,) ANDREW JACKSON.

During the student days of Professor Bartlett, as we have seen, he spent two years in teaching in the academy. Many men, afterwards distinguished in United States history, and several who, on both sides, in our civil contest, became men of mark, were at the institution. Leonidas Polk, a relative of James K. Polk, and afterwards Bishop of Louisiana, was his room-mate, and Albert Sidney Johnston, afterwards killed at the battle of Shiloh, was both his room-mate and classmate. Jefferson Davis, Robert E. Lee and Charles Mason (afterwards Judge Mason, of Iowa) were under his instruction, as were many others who in due time became widely noted.

While engaged in the construction of Fort Adams, between 1829 and 1832, Professor Bartlett contributed to Silliman's Journal a paper on "The Expansibility of Coping Stones," which has been frequently referred to by foreign writers. During his life in Washington (1832 to 1834), as first assistant to Chief Engineer (General) Gratiot, he had a great deal to do with the engineering on the Cumberland National road, and with fortifications all over the country. In 1840 he was ordered by President Van Buren, through his Secretary of War, Mr. Poinsett, to examine the European observatories, with a view to improving the course of instruction in astronomy, practical and theoretical, in the Military Academy. In this work he was absent from the country about five months, and made many valuable acquaintances in Europe. On his return he submitted to the War Department the report of his work, the receipt of which was duly acknowledged. It is a misfortune, however, that this valuable report has in some way been lost. Frequent search has been made for it, but without success. It suggested a plan for an observatory to be located in Washington City.

In addition to these labors, the Professor, during his long service at the Point, prepared several text-books for the use of the cadets. In 1839 he published a "Treatise on Optics;" in 1858, one on "Synthetical Mechanics," and another on "Spherical Astronomy," and in 1859 one on "Acoustics and Optics" and another on "Analytical Mechanics." Before finally retiring from his professorship he also published an article entitled "Strains on Rifle Guns," which will be found in the Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences, Volume I. It was also separately published. All this shows the years of his life at West Point to have been busy and productive. In 1847 Geneva College conferred upon the professor the degree of Doctor of Laws. The degree of Master of Arts had been conferred upon him as an honorary degree by the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, ten years before. He is a member of the Philosophical Societies of Philadelphia and Boston, and is one of the original corporators of the American Academy of Science, incorporated by Congress.

His books and his writings in periodicals are a monument to Professor Bartlett's scholarship and industry. The value of his books may be inferred from the fact that they have passed through a succession of editions. The ninth edition of "Analytical Mechanics" was published in 1874. We judge from a mere passing sentence in the preface to the second edition that, in the so-called conflict between scientists and the Bible, this eminent scholar and scientist has no sympathy with Anti-Theism. Speaking of a mathematical formula which he framed and which expresses the laws that govern the action and reaction of forces upon bodies, he says of this formula,—
